”in accord wherewith he made it smooth, uniform throughout, equidistant from its centre, a body whole and perfect, with perfect bodies for its parts. Then he set a soul in its centre, stretched it throughout the whole and further wrapped it about its body without. Thus he established a round revolving Heaven, one, sole, solitary, able, in its excellence, to be its own companion, needing nothing beyond itself, its own sufficient acquaintance and friend. In all these respects he begat it a blessed god.”
This is a real son-god formed by the creator of the world, a ”deuteros theos”, a god beside the original and everlasting God.
What Plato says in the Symposion about the original forms of man belongs also in this connection.
” . . . First, then, human beings were formerly not divided into two sexes, male and female; there was also a third, common to both the others, the name of which remains, though the sex itself has disappeared. The androgynous sex, both in appearance and in name, was common both to male and female; its name alone remains, which labours under a reproach...
”At the period to which I refer, the form of every human being was round, the back and the sides being circularly joined, and each had four arms and as many legs; two faces fixed up on a round neck, exactly like each other, one head between the two faces; four ears, and everything else as from such proportions it is easy to conjecture. Man walked upright as now, in whatever direction he pleased; but when he wished to go fast he made use of all his eight limbs, and proceeded in a rapid motion by rolling circularly round, - like tumblers, who, with their legs in the air, tumble round and round. We account for the production of three sexes by supposing that, at the beginning, the male was produced from the sun, the female from the earth; and that sex which participated in both sexes, from the moon, by reason of the androgynous nature of the moon. They were round, and their mode of proceeding was round, from the similarity which must needs subsist between them and their parent.

”They were strong also, and had aspiring thoughts. They it was who levied war against the Gods; and what Homer writes concerning Ephialtus and Otus, that they sought to ascend heaven and dethrone the Gods, in reality relates to this primitive people. Jupiter and the other Gods debated what was to be done in this emergency. For neither could they prevail on themselves to destroy them, as they had the giants, with thunder, so that the race should be abolished ; for in that case they would be deprived of the honours of the sacrifices which they were in the custom of receiving from them; nor could they permit a continuance of their insolence and impiety. Jupiter, with some difficulty having desired silence, at length spoke. ’I think,’ said he, ’I have contrived a method by which we may, by rendering the human race more feeble, quell the insolence which they exercise, without proceeding to their utter destruction. I will cut each of them in half; and so they will at once be weaker and more useful on account of their numbers. They shall walk upright on two legs. If they show any more insolence, and will not keep quiet, I will cut them up in half again, so they shall go hopping on one leg.’
”So saying, he cut human beings in half . . . . . ”
You see here, that the idea of this spherical being was extended to the primeval human beings.
Plato attributes a complete form to them, they were like God and, in Titanic recklessness, they levied war against the gods.
The alchemists’ conception of a divine being, although it is based on Plato’s, differs in an important respect from other conceptions, in that it is given into the hands of the doctor, chemist, philosopher or artist to create this divine being.
In this connection, I cannot resist drawing your attention to something further.
We find the idea of the hermaphrodite connected with certain other religiousideas, with Dionysus, for instance, and JULIUS FIRMICUS MATERNUS, a Christian apologist of the fourth century, quotes a mystic call belonging to the Bacchic mysteries: ”euoi dikeros dimorphe.”
This ” two-horned, two-figured” being, that is evoked, is a hermaphrodite.
These two horns are derived from the horns of the moon and were apparently a thorn in the flesh to Firmicus Maternus.
His book was dedicated to the three most Holy Emperors, the three sons of Constantine the Great, he tried to incite them to eradicate the heathen temples.
He writes:
7 ”The horns mean nothing other than the venerable signs of the Cross. The one supports the world and holds the earth together, and through the connection of the two, which go sidewards, the East is touched and the West held ; so that the whole circle should be stabilised threefold”, (He counts the vertical beam as one, and the horizontal as two.
One would expect the circle to be stabilised fourfold, but it had to be threefold.]
” and that the foundations of the united work should be made firm with immortal roots.”
(The expression ”roots” is a translation of the ”rhizomata” of Empedocles, a way of expressing the four elements.
You will remember the four in ”our masterly stone” in the ”Empress” poem from the ”Rosarium”
These are the four roots of the stone, and the ” immortal roots ” are undoubtedly four.)
” . . . These are the venerable horns (or ends] of the Cross, here is the immortal trace of sacred virtue, here the divine structure of the glorious work, Thou, Christ, with outstretched hands, thou supportest the universe and the earth, the heavenly kingdom, on thy immortal shoulders rests our salvation. Thou, Lord, bearest the signs of eternal life, with divine inspiration thou hast foretold it through the prophets: Isaiah says:
’Behold, a son is born unto us, the government is upon his shoulders, and his name is called : Messenger of the great thought’.”
(This i s quoted from Isaiah IX. 6 . but it i s quite different in our Bible.9]
”These are the horns of the cross through which the universe is uniformly supported and held together . . . ”
Firmicus Maternus regards the horns as the arms of the cross, which the devil placed on the head of Dionysus.
He means that the two horns of Dionysus are a sort of devilish anticipation of the idea of the cross.
He also insists that the cross is threefold.
The Christian form of the cross does lend itself to a certain extent to the idea of three; and it must be three, on account of the Trinity being the support of the universe, for objectively a cross has four ends and not three.

This question was taken up again by the medieval doctor and philosopher Gerardus Dorneus.
He was very much excited about it, and attributes not just two but four horns to the devil.
It was regarded as the invention of the devil, that the world should rest on a quaternity, for it must essentially rest on the Trinity.
This is one of the great mysteries in medieval psychology.
I dealt with the subject of the three and the four in my Terry Lectures.
Till about the sixteenth century, alchemy was founded on four roots, it was only then that the number three began to play a role and to compete with the four.
This basic quaternity goes far back into the history of alchemy, right back to Mary of Egypt, who is sometimes called the Jewess.
She had an axiom: One becomes two, two three, three four, and four one; and then it begins all over again from the beginning.
The alchemistic process is completed in four stages, the old Greek alchemists already discovered this.
The number four represents the four elements, and the process usually works up to the element of fire.
When the process reaches the nature of fire, the hottest, driest and most spiritual element, the goal is, so to speak, attained, in that fire comprises everything.
This idea of the eternal living fire goes back to Heraclitus (circa 540-475 B.C.); and corresponds also to the extra-canonical saying of Christ]:
”Who is near me is near to the fire. He that is far from me is far from the Kingdom.”
So the inmost nature of Christ is fire, that everlasting fire which is also the goal of alchemy.
The god Dionysus himself fits well into this connection, for his nature was also fire.
Perhaps you have seen the famous antique head of Dionysus, where a lock of his hair is a flame?
We find the same idea in the New Testament, when the cloven tongues of fire came down from heaven and sat up on each of the apostles, filling them with the Holy Ghost, the fiery breath of the Pneuma. Carl Jung, ETH Alchemy Lecture IX , Pages 73-80

Carl Jung on the attitude of Alchemists (2015-03-22 17:12)

Lecture IV 23rd May, 1941
We are dealing with the subject of the attitude of the alchemists to their work, and I must still mention some quotations from the later authors, because they shed an important light on the subject.
MICHAEL MAIER was a famous alchemist of his time (end of sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth centuries) and was one of the founders of the society of the Rosicrucians.
He says:
l. ”The philosophers have said: that no one could attain the science of the spiritual, unless his soul be divine and his nativity spiritual. ” ——-
It certainly sounds very strange to hear a chemist and doctor talking of the ”science of the spiritual”.
Michael Maier worked in his laboratory, with retorts and smelting pots, just like any of the earlier alchemists; and yet he speaks of the ”scientia spiritualis”, and means the alchemistic opus .
We can see from this how the alchemist understood his work: it was work which dealt with spiritual things.
And ”the philosophers” have said that only the man ”whose soul is divine” can attain it.
I do not know what Maier really meant by this, possibly he was alluding to the Christian conception of the soul, but he may also have meant something which is beyond my knowledge.
The spiritual nativity certainly refers to the horoscope.
Presumably there were signs in Maier’s own horoscope that he was an electus” (a chosen one), called to this work.
This point of view, which is often to be found in the old alchemistic literature, stands opposed to the Christian standpoint: everyone has access to the Church’s means of salvation, provided he has the necessary faith, obedience and submission.

But the alchemistic opus is born through the individual and for the individual. This remark of Maier's is no isolated case, there are a great many passages in the literature which point in the same direction.
We read in another seventeenth century treatise:
"It is by the revelation of the highest and greatest God that I have attained this art, and only through diligent study, wakefulness, and through constantly reading the authentic books."
By the revelation of God the author means the Gospel, and he puts this in the first place.
But besides this he has another source of information: the authentic books.
These are, of course, the alchemistic books.
Through diligent study and religious exercises, one can attain an art or knowledge which exists somehow beside Christianity.
Maier speaks clearly of another source of knowledge besides the Gospel.
Paracelsus says that man has a mind in order that he may understand the truths which are made known in the Gospel, and only for this purpose.
But on the other hand man has also a "lumen naturae" (a natural light), a source of knowledge hidden in nature, from which he can draw enlightenment.
This is the confession of a man who was one of the great reformers of medicine, and it states plainly that the Gospel is not the only source of enlightenment, but that there is another source of light and knowledge, concealed in nature.
Paracelsus was an alchemist himself, and has left a number of alchemistic treatises.
He had a considerable influence on the alchemy of the latter half of the sixteenth century, and still more on that of the seventeenth century.
Gerardus Dorneus, who lived at the end of the sixteenth century and was one of the most famous alchemists of his time, was a pupil of Paracelsus.
We read in another treatise:
"The materia must be understood, for the philosophers of all ages have held knowledge to be the most important thing in this work. One must have an untroubled fund of knowledge."
We find an important point here. In contrast to the contemporary Christian attitude, where the whole emphasis was laid on faith, this passage emphasises knowledge: the Gnosis.
I use the word "Gnosis" intentionally, because alchemy retained, or rediscovered, a great many things which played a very important role in the early days of Christianity.
These ideas belonged to Gnosticism, one of Christianity's most dangerous rivals.
Christianity really arose from the spirit of Gnosticism, but came into conflict with it later, because the Gnostics threatened to dissolve Christianity with their philosophical Speculations.
Therefore the fathers of the Church dissociated themselves from the Gnostics, and fought Gnosticism bitterly, declaring it a heresy.
Most of the writings of the Gnostics have disappeared eared, so there are many gaps in our knowledge of this subject; but fortunately one of the early fathers of the Church, Hippolytus, was very helpful in this respect.
He left a very complete treatise about the doctrines of the Gnostics; he was much more benevolently disposed towards them, and very much more careful and conscientious in his report, than his contemporaries.
The emphasis which is laid on knowledge, on the Gnosis, in our passage is one of the main characteristics of alchemy.
In the same treatise in the Musaeum Hermaticum, we read:
"He, who would attain this highest mystery, must realise that this art does not lie in man's power, but depends up on God's goodness, and that neither will nor desire can lead him to it, but only God's mercy. One must only exercise this art for the honour and glory of God (ad solam Dei gloriam) and for no other goal. Nature is one, true and simple, perfect in its essence, and a secret spirit lies hidden in it. If thou wouldst recognise it, thou must thyself be true, simple, patient, steadfast and devout, and must not harm thy neighbour, in short : thou must be a regeneratus, a new being."
A "regeneratus" means a re-born man, a regenerated human being; and the attitude which is recommended for such a man is very similar to that which Christianity has established as the "desideratum".
The result is called "the highest mystery".

There cannot be two highest mysteries, but only one.
The alchemists apply this term to their art; in other words: the attainment of this art is their highest mystery which excels even the Christian mystery.
This is not said in so many words, but nevertheless it is the conclusion which one is bound to draw from this passage. And, as I have pointed out before, it would have been far too dangerous to express themselves more clearly on this point in those days.
The author also tells us that a secret spirit lies concealed in nature, the ”spiritus absconditus”.
This concealed spirit cannot be proved to be in nature, but quite certainly it exists in man, for the human soul is for the most part hidden from us.
The old masters project the unconscious, and describe what is really an attitude to one’s own unconscious; though to talk of ”one’s own unconscious” is a facon de parler, for I cannot say anything is my own, unless I have it in my pocket or Another author says:
”Spirit, body and soul must all take part in this work.”
This means that the opus demands the whole man, and not just the intellect: though one might well think it was only the latter, because knowledge is so much stressed.
Another author says:
” In this art, which comes from God, no sensual, wicked or infernal spirits are admitted, but only a simple, straight, true and steadfast spirit whose essence is pure and devout. All others misunderstand the highest mystery.”
This passage needs no further explanation. We come now to another text:
”But when God grants his grace, to someone who understands it, this will appear incomprehensible in the eyes of the world and those who love this mystery will be scorned of men and looked down upon as . . . ”
They will be regarded as good for nothing people.
”Just as learned men also, doctors and others, cannot find it, because they have never looked at it, although it lies before their eyes, and do not trust it, although it contains such power in itself. And no one can teach them any better while they follow their nature and their intellect : therefore they cannot find it for very wisdom, because it transcends their power of comprehension, for it is the work of God and of nature and can only be reached through nature. Therefore they remain ignorant.”
If you assume that the alchemists were really, without knowing it, working on the unconscious, you can easily understand this text, we could still apply what it says today.
A further text says:
”Only a few attain the possession of this Kingdom, although many labour in the construction of our stone. The Creator has not given the true knowledge and possession of it to the multitude, but only to the few, who hate lies and cling to the truth, devote themselves to the art with heartfelt sighs and seek it conscientiously; but above all to those who love God without hypocrisy, and therefore pray to him.
”If he succeeds in finding a worthy, suitable man, and he begins to feel the weight of his own years, then he may impart the art to him, but not to several! For this science must always remain secret. Because, were a wicked man to have knowledge of it, the Christian world would be in great danger. Puffed up with pride (inflatus superbia) over his heritage, he would overthrow the legitimate rulers who govern others . . . God has hidden this knowledge from great doctors and has only given it to a few who were truly devout and humble. And as among the myriads of stars in the Heavens, there are only seven planets, so among millions of people, only a few attain this knowledge. Those, who think themselves wise although they know nothing, are not bidden to our feast.”
The fact, that this art is only for the individual, is emphasised here again.
It is not meant for the multitude, but is presumably only for the man who is chosen on account of his fate or disposition.
Moreover we see the contrast to the Christian world expressed in this passage.
Should someone, who understands the art, betray it to the multitude, he would come into conflict with Christianity, and the Christian world would be in great danger.
This shows us clearly, that the principle of the art of alchemy was opposed to the Christian ”Weltanschauung” of those days, in other words, alchemy concealed a heresy.

It was a spiritual endeavour which, far from running parallel to Christianity, opposed it, even dangerously.
Another text says:
”One should not begin to touch this secret, impenetrable work, and the spirit which lies hidden beneath it . . . before having explored it in the depths of its own singularities and characteristics, and in relation to the indispensable harmonising with nature. One gains nothing from this spirit, if one has not already clearly recognised and known it. God is wonderful in his works and his wisdom is infinite and he does not allow himself to be mocked. Many entangled themselves lightly in this work and have died in the laboratory, or have been otherwise pursued by misfortune. For the art is not easy, as some imagine, because the philosophers have likened it to the play of children and the work of women.”
The ”ludus puerorum ” (play of children) and ”opus mulierum” (work of women) are expressions which recur frequently in alchemy.
”A few philosophers have found it easy, simply because God granted them understanding. Therefore one should pray and begin with God’s help.”
Here again we hear of the ”spiritus absconditus” with which this art was, concerned.
One is really curious to know what this old master understood by this spirit.
For us, as I have said several times, it is the unconscious, but in those days they had no conception of the unconscious.
It was projected and was outside, it was not understood as a psychological fact.
We live, historically speaking, in a period of transition, when the psychical man is beginning to exist as an empirical fact, psychical man was unknown before.
The culture of India is pre-psychological, for instance.
The Indians are totally unpsychological, one cannot explain to them what psychology is, because they do not think in those terms.
Psychological facts are metaphysical facts to them and it is the same with orthodox Catholics.
It is very difficult to explain to such people what we mean by the unconscious, because classical Christianity is also pre-psychological.
These things are metaphysical, not psychological, entities to them, which naturally makes a considerable difference.
I will bring the excerpts from the alchemists’ writings about attitude to a close with a short passage from another treatise:
”So man must become as the corn of the field . . . therefore he must die outright and unfold completely.”
This is one of those assertions of the alchemists which remind us of Goethe, in this case of the last verse of his poem: ”Selige Sehnsucht”:
”Und so lang du das nicht hast, (All the while thou hast not part,
Dieses Stirb und werde! In this dying and new birth!
Bist du nur ein triib er Gast But a dismal guest thou art Auf der dunklen Erde. ”On the dark and gloomy earth.)
The old alchemists were also aware that they must have such an attitude, in order to do their work properly.
To sum up:
it is evident from all these excerpts that alchemy was not a natural science nor even a natural philosophy as we understand the latter; it was really a purely religious endeavour, in which the Christian attitude was taken for granted, but which really stood opposed to contemporary Christianity and is still opposed to the modern Christian attitude.
This whole effort is not an undertaking for the many, it does not contain social thoughts, it is essentially an individual matter, and, whether it is practised by one, ten or even a thousand people, each works alone.
This is an attitude which is foreign to us, for we have grown up in the congregational teaching of the Church, and in the more modern socialistic ideas which are ”plus papal que le pape”.
We think socially and talk socially, the individual has become a mass article.
But in those days one of the greatest and most important spiritual movements existed only for the individual.
And indeed it is as individuals that we are part of the world, and we cannot experience anything except as an individual.
We may feel safer and more protected in a crowd, yet the truth is that the individual is more unsafe and in greater danger in a crowd than anywhere else.

It is there that he goes under and loses himself.
The attitude of the alchemists arises from manifold admonitions to prayer, patience, purity of purpose, renunciation of all worldly gain, conviction that this work depends on the grace of God, that it cannot be completed without the intercession of the Deity and that it is a purely spiritual work.
The alchemist turns away from the materia, in spite of the fact that he works on it in his laboratory.
He has a secret purpose: to free the world soul (the deus absconditus) bound in matter.
The work is a source of divine knowledge; and therefore requires a man, who through attitude or predestination, is capable of understanding this divine mystery.
The work takes place through the will of God operating in individuals who are led on to this path by an inexorable fate.
It must be worked on through meditation, obedience to tradition and an introductory study of the authentic works.
It demands a good mind, great intelligence and industry.
The artist or philosopher also encounters a psychological difficulty in his work.
If, for instance, he produces the nigredo (blackness) in his retort, then his own soul also enters the nigredo.
This means that he must face the darkness of his own soul, its melancholia.
We also met with curious symbolic allusions in these passages.
The spring of Paradise, for instance, gushes forth again during the work, the eternal water which flows in the form of the four rivers.
This water represents the grace of God, or the Holy Ghost.
It is a parallel of the water which flowed from the wound in the side of Christ, which signifies the spiritus veritatis (spirit of truth) , and is the redeeming, refreshing water for mankind - in alchemy, however, only for the individual.
The opus itself, therefore, means a re-birth, a regeneration; and it is compared to the grain of wheat which must die and decay, in order that its new life should arise.
So the man, who gives himself to this work, must die in order to rise again.
We also hear that the work can be hindered by bad spirits, the demons Ophiuchus and Antimimus1 (the imitator) .
And, moreover, this work is the highest mystery and greatest secret which must be anxiously and zealously guarded.
We shall hear more of this later.
This represents roughly the attitude of the alchemist towards his work.
On the one side he worked in his laboratory, where he was busy with all kinds of minerals and with all the chemical substances that were known in his day; and, on the other side, he meditated, carried out exercises in meditation, so to speak, for meditation was an essential part of the work.
His subjects of meditation were the so-called operations and the authentic books.
We must try to realise, therefore, what these old philosophers meant by meditation; as we tried in previous lectures to get a clear picture of how Ignatius, the Devoti and the Christian mystics understood meditation, and earlier, of the Indians' conception of Yoga.
VII. Meditatio.
We find the word "meditation" in one of the earliest monuments of alchemy:
"The Tabula Smaragdina" attributed to Hermes Trismegistus .
We read there:
"And as all things proceed from one, through the meditation of the One . "
This sentence is of course very obscure.
Is it the meditation of one man or of this one thing?
Probably the latter.
The expression "meditation", as it is used here, has a parallel in the process of the creation where God meditated the world into existence.
He thought the world with his logos, and the world originated in this thought.
And the alchemist also thought that he could complete the miraculous work through meditation.
We read in the Turba (a text which was also transmitted by the Arabs but which goes back to antiquity and was translated into Latin about the eleventh century):

”One must reflect on the books:”
The books play, so to speak, the role of the gospel in alchemy and must be meditated up on.
Another old authority, GEBER (who is only alleged to be of Arabic origin) wrote a book called: ”Summa perfectionis” (the sum total of perfection) , and he says in it:
”And indeed thou must work with greatest concentration of unlimited meditation ; for with it thou wilt find, and without it thou wilt not.”
The alchemistic work is worth nothing at all without meditation, and in this passage meditation is made the most important part of the alchemistic work.
A similar but rather more recent text says:
” Understand then and meditate up on it . . . . Meditate upon these words, and with the will of God, thou wilt find.”
In another part of the same text we read:
”It is a stone and yet no stone. Moreover, if thou art a seer, and meditatest on it, then thou canst hope to perceive it.”
We see here that this meditation has not only the character of reflection, but also of visualisation.
We should now call this.: “active imagination”, that is, intentional imagining. This something which we also found in the Ignatian exercises, certain pictures were intentionally visualised.
You will remember the very concrete meditations on hell and on the life of Christ, which had to be realised with all the senses; sight, hearing, taste, smell and touch.
But there is this difference: the subject is prescribed from Ol outside in the Ignatian exercises, and in alchemy it is not, or at most it can be found in the books, and if you read such a book, you will see how vague any directions are.
It is the stone which must be visualised until it is actually seen, until it becomes a reality.
Another treatise, the ”Liber Quartorum”, which also goes back into antiquity, says:
”It is therefore necessary, that we principally discern the soul, through the intelligence. If we do this, we shall reach the goal and be exalted by the science through meditation: But this is the procedure of the philosophers, and the philosopher begins in the teaching (sermone) at this place, at the more subtle end of nature.”
One sees here how these people understood their materia.
Nature, as a material manifestation, had two ends: a material and a spiritual end.
The philosophers began their meditation with the spiritual end of matter, in order to transform it from that side.
We only handle matter from the physical end, because we do not assume that nature contains a spirit.
For these people, however, nature still contained the projection of the soul.
So this text says the most important thing is to discern the soul through meditation, which entails beginning at the. more subtle end of nature.
The author says in this same Liber Quartorum:
”I have spent much time in meditating on the teaching, in understanding the words, and in meditating on the meaning.”
You see that these old masters meditated on the words of the still older masters, these were their classics.
They meditated on them much as a Christian mystic meditated on the word of the Lord; or perhaps as the Buddhists meditate on, or rather imagine, the teaching of Buddha and the traditional dogma until they become reality.
The mechanism is the same as that of the Ignatian exercises: whoever strives to carry through those exercises, renounces his ego through imagination, and dissolves himself, so to speak, in the figure of Christ.
And in alchemy also, the thoughts or words of these old masters are meditated on in such a way that a curious result comes about.
It is not formulated as Christ, or - to use Buddhist language - as Buddha or Atman, but as the lapis philosophorum, the ”stone” or as the ”red tincture”, a chemical product, a ”thing” so to speak.
It is admitted that this ”thing” is highly mysterious, and that it is not possible simply to say what it is ; it can only be realised by long investigation.
What it was, that the alchemists were really searching for, has therefore always remained obscure, and there are still people who think that perhaps they really had a receipt for making gold and that this was the secret fascination.
But we know nothing of any such receipt, and we have a great many passages in the literature which say that they did not mean ordinary gold at all, that such language is only eye-wash for the stupid.

We shall return later to this expression: ”prima materia”, and consider then what the alchemists meant by it.
We come now to the famous pupil of Paracelsus: GERARDUS DORNEUS, who was a doctor in Frankfurt and lived at the end of the sixteenth century.
He says:
”The human mind is composed of nothing better than the spagiric and meditative procedure, ap art from the divine gift of grace.”
The alchemists mention the gift of grace, or God, again and again, but apart from this the important thing in this passage is the ”spagiric and meditative procedure”, which is given Paracelsus’ name for it here: ”dispositions spagirica”.
The word ”spagiric” probably originated with Paracelsus, and is a combination of two Greek words: ”spai” (to tear) and ”ageir” (to bring together).
”Solve et coagula” (dissolve and coagulate) and ” fac fixum volatile et volatile fixum ” (solidify the volatile, and evaporate the solid) are expressions which we meet again and again in alchemy; and since the sixteenth century the spagiric art or procedure is also a current phrase.
You see that Dorneus also lays the chief emphasis on meditation.
He says in the same treatise:
”No one can truly know himself, if he does not investigate through diligent meditation, and know who he really is.”
This is a piece of real meditation.
The alchemists evidently assumed that, during their frequent meditation on the words of the old masters, they would learn to know themselves and God.
Meditation was a means of learning to know God, and, at the same time, themselves.
This is something which we find also in the other forms of meditation, be they Christian, Hindu or Buddhist, namely self-knowledge:
he who knows himself knows God, and he who knows God knows himself.
It is the culmination of wisdom in India to know that that which one can recognise inside and outside of man is the Deity.
We learn from the sixteenth century alchemist, KHUNRATH, whom I have often mentioned, that visions, and conversations with God and his good spirits took place during the meditation; and he speaks of: ”Good apparitions, visions and answers ” and says further:
”Direct therefore thy feeling, senses, reason and thoughts toward this salt alone.”
The word salt is of course only used symbolically as the ”sal sapientiae” (the salt of wisdom) .
So the important thing is the words of wisdom, and while those are being meditated upon, visions take place, apparitions, conversations with spirits and so on. Khunrath says later:
”Therefore study, meditate, sweat, work, cook . . . and in this manner a wholesome flood will burst forth, which comes from the heart of the son of the great world.”
Through this procedure a flood wells up , which is the eternal water of Paradise ; the water of redemption will burst forth again, which comes from the heart of the son of the great world.
This son is the ”filius macrocosmi ” that Khunrath contrasts to Christ as ”filius microcosmi”.
Christ exists for man, and is called ”the son of man”, but the ” filius macrocosmi”, which alchemy is concerned with, is called the son of the cosmos, of the great world and of the whole of nature. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Pages 161-170.

Carl Jung on the “Eros Theory.” (2015-03-23 05:12)

The Eros Theory
In the light of this discovery, the question of the trauma was answered in a most unexpected manner; but in its place the investigator was faced with the problem of the erotic conflict, which, as our example shows, contains a wealth of abnormal elements and cannot at first sight be compared with an ordinary erotic conflict.

What is peculiarly striking and almost incredible is that only the pretense should be conscious, while the patient's real passion remained hidden from her. In this case certainly, it is beyond dispute that the real relationship was shrouded in darkness, while the pretended one dominated the field of consciousness.
If we formulate these facts theoretically, we arrive at the following result: there are in a neurosis two tendencies standing in strict opposition to one another, one of which is unconscious.
This proposition is formulated in very general terms on purpose, because I want to stress that although the pathogenic conflict is a personal matter it is also a broadly human conflict manifesting itself in the individual, for disunity with oneself is the hall-mark of civilized man.
The neurotic is only a special instance of the disunited man who ought to harmonize nature and culture within himself.
The growth of culture consists, as we know, in a progressive subjugation of the animal in man.
It is a process of domestication which cannot be accomplished without rebellion on the part of the animal nature that thirsts for freedom.
From time to time there passes as it were a wave of frenzy through the ranks of men too long constrained within the limitations of their culture.
Antiquity experienced it in the Dionysian orgies that surged over from the East and became an essential and characteristic ingredient of classical culture.
The spirit of these orgies contributed not a little towards the development of the stoic ideal of asceticism in the innumerable sects and philosophical schools of the last century before Christ, which produced from the polytheistic chaos of that epoch the twin ascetic religions of Mithraism and Christianity.
A second wave of Dionysian licentiousness swept over the West at the Renaissance.
It is difficult to gauge the spirit of one's own time; but in the succession of revolutionary questions to which the last half century gave birth, there was the "sexual question," and this has fathered a whole new species of literature. In this "movement" are rooted the beginnings of psychoanalysis, on whose theories it exerted a very one-sided influence.
After all, nobody can be completely independent of the currents of his age.
Since then the "sexual question" has largely been thrust into the background by political and spiritual problems.
That, however, does nothing to alter the fundamental fact that man's instinctual nature is always coming up against the checks imposed by civilization.
The names alter, but the facts remain the same.
We also know today that it is by no means the animal nature alone that is at odds with civilized constraints; very often it is new ideas which are thrusting upwards from the unconscious and are just as much out of harmony with the dominating culture as the instincts.
For instance, we could easily construct a political theory of neurosis, in so far as the man of today is chiefly excited by political passions to which the "sexual question" was only an insignificant prelude.
It may turn out that politics are but the forerunner of a far deeper religious convulsion.
Without being aware of it, the neurotic participates in the dominant currents of his age and reflects them in his own conflict.
Neurosis is intimately bound up with the problem of our time and really represents an unsuccessful attempt on the part of the individual to solve the general problem in his own person.
Neurosis is self-division.
In most people the cause of the division is that the conscious mind wants to hang on to its moral ideal, while the unconscious strives after its—in the contemporary sense—unmoral ideal which the conscious mind tries to deny.
Men of this type want to be more respectable than they really are.
But the conflict can easily be the other way about: there are men who are to all appearances very disreputable and do not put the least restraint upon themselves.

This is at bottom only a pose of wickedness, for in the background they have their moral side which has fallen into the unconscious just as surely as the immoral side in the case of the moral man.
(Extremes should therefore be avoided as far as possible, because they always arouse suspicion of their opposite.)
This general discussion was necessary in order to clarify the idea of an ”erotic conflict.”
Thence we can proceed to discuss firstly the technique of psychoanalysis and secondly the question of therapy.
Obviously the great question for this technique is:
How are we to arrive by the shortest and best path at a knowledge of what is happening in the unconscious of the patient?
The original method was hypnotism: either interrogation in a state of hypnotic concentration or else the spontaneous production of fantasies by the patient while in this state.
This method is still occasionally employed, but compared with the present technique it is primitive and often unsatisfactory.
A second method was evolved by the Psychiatric Clinic, in Zurich, the so-called association method.
It demonstrates very accurately the presence of conflicts in the form of ”complexes” of feeling-toned ideas, as they are called, which betray themselves through characteristic disturbances in the course of the experiment.
But the most important method of getting at the pathogenic conflicts is, as Freud was the first to show, through the analysis of dreams.
Of the dream it can indeed be said that ”the stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner.”
It is only in modern times that the dream, this fleeting and insignificant-looking product of the psyche, has met with such profound contempt.
Formerly it was esteemed as a harbinger of fate, a portent and comforter, a messenger of the gods.
Now we see it as the emissary of the unconscious, whose task it is to reveal the secrets that are hidden from the conscious mind, and this it does with astounding completeness.
The ”manifest” dream, i.e., the dream as we remember it, is in Freud’s view only a façade which gives us no idea of the interior of the house, but, on the contrary, carefully conceals it with the help of the ”dream censor.”
If, however, while observing certain technical rules, we induce the dreamer to talk about the details of his dream, it soon becomes evident that his associations tend in a particular direction and group themselves round particular topics.
These are of personal significance and yield a meaning which could never have been conjectured to lie behind the dream, but which, as careful comparison has shown, stands in an extremely delicate and meticulously exact relationship to the dream facade.
This particular complex of ideas wherein are united all the threads of the dream is the conflict we are looking for, or rather a variation of it conditioned by circumstances.
According to Freud, the painful and incompatible elements in the conflict are in this way so covered up or obliterated that we may speak of a ”wish-fulfilment.”
However, it is only very seldom that dreams fulfil obvious wishes, as for instance in the so-called body-stimulus dreams, e.g., the sensation of hunger during sleep, when the desire for food is satisfied by dreaming about delicious meals.
Likewise the pressing idea that one ought to get up, conflicting with the desire to go on sleeping, leads to the wish-fulfilling dream-idea that one has already got up, etc.
In Freud’s view there are also unconscious wishes whose nature is incompatible with the ideas of the waking mind, painful wishes which one prefers not to admit, and these are precisely the wishes that Freud regards as the real architects of the dream.
For instance, a daughter loves her mother tenderly, but dreams to her great distress that her mother is dead.
Freud argues that there exists in this daughter, unbeknown to herself, the exceedingly painful wish to see her mother removed from this world with all speed, because she has secret resistances to her.

Even in the most blameless daughter such moods may occur, but they would be met with the most violent denial if one tried to saddle her with them.
To all appearances the manifest dream contains no trace of wish-fulfilment, rather of apprehension or alarm, consequently the direct opposite of the supposed unconscious impulse.
But we know well enough that exaggerated alarm can often and rightly be suspected of the contrary. (Here the critical reader may justifiably ask: When is the alarm in a dream exaggerated?)
Such dreams, in which there is apparently no trace of wish-fulfilment, are innumerable: the conflict worked out in the dream is unconscious, and so is the attempted solution.
Actually, there does exist in our dreamer the tendency to be rid of her mother; expressed in the language of the unconscious, she wants her mother to die.
But the dreamer should certainly not be saddled with this tendency because, strictly speaking, it was not she who fabricated the dream, but the unconscious.
The unconscious has this tendency, most unexpected from the dreamer's point of view, to get rid of the mother.
The very fact that she can dream such a thing proves that she does not consciously think it.
She has no notion why her mother should be got rid of.
Now we know that a certain layer of the unconscious contains everything that has passed beyond the recall of memory, including all those infantile instinctual impulses which could find no outlet in adult life.
We can say that the bulk of what comes out of the unconscious has an infantile character at first, as for instance this wish, which is simplicity itself: "When Mummy dies you will marry me, won't you, Daddy?"
This expression of an infantile wish is the substitute for a recent desire to marry, a desire in this case painful to the dreamer, for reasons still to be discovered.
The idea of marriage, or rather the seriousness of the corresponding impulse, is, as they say, "repressed into the unconscious" and from there must necessarily express itself in an infantile fashion, because the material at the disposal of the unconscious consists largely of infantile reminiscences.
Our dream is apparently concerned with a twinge of infantile jealousy.
The dreamer is more or less in love with her father, and for that reason she wants to get rid of her mother.
But her real conflict lies in the fact that on the one hand she wants to marry, and on the other hand is unable to make up her mind: for one never knows what it will be like, whether he will make a suitable husband, etc.
Again, it is so nice at home, and what will happen when she has to part from darling Mummy and be all independent and grown up?
She fails to notice that the marriage question is now a serious matter for her and has her in its grip, so that she can no longer creep home to father and mother without bringing the fateful question into the bosom of the family.
She is no longer the child she once was; she is the woman who wants to get married.
As such she comes back, complete with her wish for a husband.
But in the family the father is the husband and, without her being aware of it, it is on him that the daughter's desire for a husband falls.
But that is incest!
In this way there arises a secondary incest-intrigue.
Freud assumes that the tendency to incest is primary and the real reason why the dreamer cannot make up her mind to marry.
Compared with that, the other reasons we have cited count for little.
With regard to this view I have long adopted the standpoint that the occasional occurrence of incest is no proof of a universal tendency to incest, any more than the fact of murder proves the existence of a universal homicidal mania productive of conflict.
I would not go so far as to say that the germs of every kind of criminality are not present in each of us.
But there is a world of difference between the presence of such a germ and an actual conflict with its resulting cleavage of the personality, such as exists in a neurosis.

If we follow the history of a neurosis with attention, we regularly find a critical moment when some problem emerged that was evaded.
This evasion is just as natural and just as common a reaction as the laziness, slackness, cowardice, anxiety, ignorance, and unconsciousness which are at the back of it.
Whenever things are unpleasant, difficult, and dangerous, we mostly hesitate and if possible give them a wide berth.
I regard these reasons as entirely sufficient.
The symptomatology of incest, which is undoubtedly there and which Freud rightly saw, is to my mind a secondary phenomenon, already pathological.
The dream is often occupied with apparently very silly details, thus producing an impression of absurdity, or else it is on the surface so unintelligible as to leave us thoroughly bewildered.
Hence we always have to overcome a certain resistance before we can seriously set about disentangling the intricate web through patient work.
But when at last we penetrate to its real meaning, we find ourselves deep in the dreamer's secrets and discover with astonishment that an apparently quite senseless dream is in the highest degree significant, and that in reality it speaks only of important and serious matters.
This discovery compels rather more respect for the so-called superstition that dreams have a meaning, to which the rationalistic temper of our age has hitherto given short shrift.
As Freud says, dream-analysis is the via regia to the unconscious.
It leads straight to the deepest personal secrets, and is, therefore, an invaluable instrument in the hand of the physician and educator of the soul.
The analytical method in general, and not only the specifically Freudian psychoanalysis, consists in the main of numerous dream-analyses.
In the course of treatment, the dreams successively throw up the contents of the unconscious in order to expose them to the disinfecting power of daylight, and in this way much that is valuable and believed lost is found again.
It is only to be expected that for many people who have false ideas about themselves the treatment is a veritable torture.
For, in accordance with the old mystical saying, "Give up what thou hast, then shalt thou receive!" they are called upon to abandon all their cherished illusions in order that something deeper, fairer, and more embracing may arise within them.
It is a genuine old wisdom that comes to light again in the treatment, and it is especially curious that this kind of psychic education should prove necessary in the heyday of our culture.
In more than one respect it may be compared with the Socratic method, though it must be said that analysis penetrates to far greater depths.
The Freudian mode of investigation sought to prove that an overwhelming importance attaches to the erotic or sexual factor as regards the origin of the pathogenic conflict.
According to this theory there is a collision between the trend of the conscious mind and the unmoral, incompatible, unconscious wish.
The unconscious wish is infantile, i.e., it is a wish from the childish past that will no longer fit the present, and is therefore repressed on moral grounds.
The neurotic has the soul of a child who bears ill with arbitrary restrictions whose meaning he does not see; he tries to make this morality his own, but falls into disunity with himself: one side of him wants to suppress, the other longs to be free—and this struggle goes by the name of neurosis.
Were the conflict clearly conscious in all its parts, presumably it would never give rise to neurotic symptoms; these occur only when we cannot see the other side of our nature and the urgency of its problems.
Only under these conditions does the symptom appear, and it helps to give expression to the unrecognized side of the psyche.
The symptom is therefore, in Freud's view, the fulfilment of unrecognized desires which, when conscious, come into violent conflict with our moral convictions.

As already observed, this shadow-side of the psyche, being withdrawn from conscious scrutiny, cannot be dealt with by the patient.
He cannot correct it, cannot come to terms with it, nor yet disregard it; for in reality he does not ”possess” the unconscious impulses at all. Thrust out from the hierarchy of the conscious psyche, they have become autonomous complexes which it is the task of analysis, not without great resistances, to bring under control again.
There are patients who boast that for them the shadow-side does not exist; they assure us that they have no conflict, but they do not see that other things of unknown origin cumber their path hysterical moods, underhand tricks which they play on themselves and their neighbours, a nervous catarrh of the stomach, pains in various places, irritability for no reason, and a whole host of nervous symptoms.
Freudian psychoanalysis has been accused of liberating man’s (fortunately) repressed animal instincts and thus causing incalculable harm.
This apprehension shows how little trust we place in the efficacy of our moral principles.
People pretend that only the morality preached from the pulpit holds men back from unbridled license; but a much more effective regulator is necessity, which sets bounds far more real and persuasive than any moral precepts.
It is true that psychoanalysis makes the animal instincts conscious, though not, as many would have it, with a view to giving them boundless freedom, but rather to incorporating them in a purposeful whole.
It is under all circumstances an advantage to be in full possession of one’s personality, otherwise the repressed elements will only crop up as a hindrance elsewhere, not just at some unimportant point, but at the very spot where we are most sensitive.
If people can be educated to see the shadow-side of their nature clearly, it may be hoped that they will also learn to understand and love their fellow men better.
A little less hypocrisy and a little more self-knowledge can only have good results in respect for our neighbour; for we are all too prone to transfer to our fellows the injustice and violence we inflict upon our own natures.
The Freudian theory of repression certainly does seem to say that there are, as it were, only hyper-moral people who repress their unmoral, instinctive natures.
Accordingly the unmoral man, who lives a life of unrestrained instinct, should be immune to neurosis.
This is obviously not the case, as experience shows.
Such a man can be just as neurotic as any other.
If we analyse him, we simply find that his morality is repressed.
The neurotic immoralist presents, in Nietzsche’s striking phrase, the picture of the ”pale felon” who does not live up to his acts.
We can of course take the view that the repressed remnants of decency are in this case only a traditional hang-over from infancy, which imposes an unnecessary check on instinctual nature and should therefore be eradicated.
The principle of ecrasez Vinfame would end in a theory of absolute libertinism.
Naturally, that would be quite fantastic and nonsensical.
It should never be forgotten—and of this the Freudian school must be reminded—that morality was not brought down on tables of stone from Sinai and imposed on the people, but is a function of the human soul, as old as humanity itself.
Morality is not imposed from outside; we have it in ourselves from the start—not the law, but our moral nature without which the collective life of human society would be impossible.
That is why morality is found at all levels of society.
It is the instinctive regulator of action which also governs the collective life of the herd.
But moral laws are valid only within a compact human group.

Beyond that, they cease.
There the old truth runs: Homo homini lupus.
With the growth of civilization we have succeeded in subjecting ever larger human groups to the rule of the same morality, without, however, having yet brought the moral code to prevail beyond the social frontiers, that is, in the free space between mutually independent societies.
There, as of old, reign lawlessness and license and mad immorality—though of course it is only the enemy who dares to say it out loud.
The Freudian school is so convinced of the fundamental, indeed exclusive, importance of sexuality in neurosis that it has drawn the logical conclusion and valiantly attacked the sexual morality of our day.
This was beyond a doubt useful and necessary, for in this field there prevailed and still prevail ideas which in view of the extremely complicated state of affairs are too undifferentiated.
Just as in the early Middle Ages finance was held in contempt because there was as yet no differentiated financial morality to suit each case, but only a mass morality, so today there is only a mass sexual morality.
A girl who has an illegitimate baby is condemned and nobody asks whether she is a decent human being or not.
Any form of love not sanctioned by law is considered immoral, whether between worth-while people or bounders.
We are still so hypnotized by what happens that we forget how and to whom it happens, just as for the Middle Ages finance was nothing but glittering gold, fiercely coveted and therefore the devil.
Yet things are not quite so simple as that.
Eros is a questionable fellow and will always remain so, whatever the legislation of the future may have to say about it.
He belongs on one side to man's primordial animal nature which will endure as long as man has an animal body.
On the other side he is related to the highest forms of the spirit.
But he thrives only when spirit and instinct are in right harmony.
If one or the other aspect is lacking to him, the result is injury or at least a lopsidedness that may easily veer towards the pathological.
Too much of the animal distorts the civilized man, too much civilization makes sick animals.
This dilemma reveals the vast uncertainty that Eros holds for man.
For, at bottom, Eros is a superhuman power which, like nature herself, allows itself to be conquered and exploited as though it were impotent.
But triumph over nature is dearly paid for.
Nature requires no explanations of principle, but asks only for tolerance and wise measure.
"Eros is a mighty daemon," as the wise Diotima said to Socrates.
We shall never get the better of him, or only to our own hurt. He is not the whole of our inward nature, though he is at least one of its essential aspects. Thus Freud's sexual theory of neurosis is grounded on a true and factual principle.
But it makes the mistake of being one-sided and exclusive; also it commits the imprudence of trying to lay hold of unconfinable Eros with the crude terminology of sex.
In this respect Freud is a typical representative of the materialistic epoch, whose hope it was to solve the world riddle in a test-tube.
Freud himself, with advancing years, admitted this lack of balance in his theory, and he opposed to Eros, whom he called libido, the destructive or death instinct.
In his posthumous writings he says:
After long hesitancies and vacillations we have decided to assume the existence of only two basic instincts, Eros and the destructive instinct. . . . The aim of the first of these basic instincts is to establish ever greater unities and to preserve them thus—in short, to bind together; the aim of the second is, on the contrary, to undo connections and so to destroy things. . . . For this reason we also call it the death instinct.

I must content myself with this passing reference, without entering more closely into the questionable nature of the conception.
It is sufficiently obvious that life, like any other process, has a beginning and an end and that every beginning is also the beginning of the end.
What Freud probably means is the essential fact that every process is a phenomenon of energy, and that all energy can proceed only from the tension of opposites. Carl Jung, CW 7,

Carl Jung on Active Imagination and Yoga Meditation. (2015-03-23 14:17)

Lecture III 11th November, 1938
I began to read you an old text in the last lecture.

This text will show us how the eastern mind understands meditation with in Yoga.
The meditation is guided in a certain direction.
If we gets some understanding of the eastern way we shall be more able to understand the parallel line in the West.
The East has a high degree of consciousness of such things, it values much which we do not even dream of, or rather at best we only dream of it.
We are enormously surprised when we meet these things or we dismiss them as unhealthy, yet it is often the most healthy people who produce just these things.
We are simply prejudiced because we know nothing of them.
Eastern texts show us how processes, which we have forgotten or never knew, can in the course of thousands of years become an elaborate technique.
We shall find symbols in this eastern material which we shall meet again in our western examples.
But we shall only find fragments in the latter, poor indeed when we compare them with the rich perfection and wealth of detail in the eastern texts.
I read you a shortened version of the beginning of the Amitayur-Dhyana-Sutra in the last lecture.
The text goes on to say that the imprisoned King called for the help of Mahamaudgalyayana.
This name is a wrong transcription of Moggallan a who was a personal pupil of the Buddha.
All these pupils became saints in Buddhism as Christ's disciples did in Christianity.
They possessed special powers, Buddha powers, because they had been completed or perfected.
They had the strength of an elephant and other wonderful supernatural gifts.
Moggallana appeared at once in the spirit before the King, coming with a speed equal to the flight of a falcon or an eagle, and told him of the eight precepts (the eightfold path).
Day after day did he come.
This eightfold path is the foundation of Buddhism.
We find a description of it in another text in the Sacred Books of the East. Vol. XI. p. 146 ff.
The Foundation of the Kingdom of Righteousness.
Dhamma-Kakka-Pavathana Sutta. " Reverence to the Blessed One, the Holy One, the Fully-Enlightened One.
1. Thus have I heard. The Blessed One was once staying at Benares, at the hermitage c alle d Migadaya. And there the Blessed One addressed the comp any of the five Bhikkhus."
Bhikkhus are begging monks who wear yellow robes; they stand silently with down-cast eyes and wait before the houses, holding out their begging bowls. The people usually fill these bowls with rice. These Bhikkhus never thank and if they do not receive anything they move on. They are only allowed to eat food which is given to them.
"And Buddha said:
2. There are two extremes, 0 Bhikkhus, which the man who has given up the world ought not to follow - the habitual practice, on the one hand, of those things whose attraction depends up on the passions, and especially of sensuality - a low and pagan way (of seeking satisfaction), unworthy, unprofitable, and fit only for the worldly-minded - and the habitual practice, on the other hand, of asceticism (or self-mortification), which is painful , unworthy and unprofitable.
3. There is a middle path, 0 Bhikkhus, avoiding these two extremes, discovered by the Tathagata" - "Tatha" means thus and "gata" going. Thus -going, or he who behaves like this. Tathagata is always translated as the perfect one but this is not really accurate. "a path which opens the eyes and bestows understanding, which leads to peace of mind, to the higher wisdom, to full enlightenment, to Nirvana!
3. What is the middle path, 0 Bhikkhus, avoiding the two extremes, discovered by the Tathagata - that path which opens the eyes and bestows understanding, which leads to peace.
of mind, to the higher wisdom, to full enlightenment, to Nirvana? Verily! it is this noble eightfold path; that is to say:
Right views;
Right aspirations;
Right speech ;
Right conduct;
Right livelihood;
Right effort;

Right mindfulness;
Right contemplation (or concentration).
This 0 Bhikkhus, is that middle path, avoiding these two extremes, discovered by the Tathagata - that path which opens the eyes and bestows understanding, which leads to peace of mind, to the higher wisdom, to full enlightenment, to Nirvana!"
These are the classical precepts of Buddhist teaching.
We will now return to the Amitayur-Dhyana-Sutra.
When the Crown Prince heard that his mother was nourishing the King, he wanted to kill her but his ministers did not agree to this; his wise physician Jiva (the living one, the liver) was particularly against it.
He rebuked the Prince in a way that made an impression.
But, though the Prince refrained from killing his mother, he imprisoned her in a hidden palace.
She appealed to Buddha and implored him to send the Wise One to her also, and his other pupil An and a Buddha grants her wish and Moggallana and An and a come immediately.
And Sakyamuni, the Buddha himself, also appears before her eyes.
The Buddha shows her all the ten worlds in order that she may chose in which she would like to be born (eight of these worlds lay on the horizon at the four points of the compass and the Four intermediate points the other two are the zenith and nadir (above and below).
She chooses the western kingdom of Amitabha (or Amitayus).
Buddha now teaches her the meditation (the Yoga) through she can be reborn in the kingdom of Amitabha.
"Buddha then replied:
Thou and all other beings besides."
Namely those with the same purpose.
"ought to make it their only aim, with concentrated thought, to get a perception of the western quarter".
"looking in the western direction and prepare thy thought for a close meditation on the sun; cause thy mind to be firmly fixed (on it) so as to have an unwavering perception by the exclusive application (of thy thought), and gaze upon it (more particularly) when it is about to set and looks like a suspended drum. After thou hast thus seen the sun, let (that image) remain clear and fixed, whether thine eyes be shut or open; - such is the perception of the sun, which is the First Meditation."
The text takes for granted that we know what a meditation is, but the West has no such training, we are not taught by trained teachers as the East is, so we are inclined to imitate foolishly.
"Next thou shouldst form the perception of the mater; gaze on the water clear and pure, and let (this image) also remain clear and fixed (afterwards); never allow thy thought to be scattered and lost. When thou hast thus seen the water thou shouldst form the perception of ice. As thou seest the ice shining and transparent thou shouldst imagine the appearance of lapis lazuli. Transparent and shining both within and without. Beneath this ground of lapis lazuli there will be seen a golden banner with seven jewels, diamonds and the rest, supporting the ground."
This is a very curious idea. We can understand the sun and the ground but when things go underground they become incomprehensible. They go from the conscious to the unconscious in psychological language. But the Queen should be able to see things which are not seen consciously, so Buddha tells her to produce the golden banner through effort. This effort is not made by the head, it is very difficult for us to grasp because we have no training. The East has the faculty of vision but we take no trouble to acquire it. There are some exceptions, the Roman Catholic Church, for instance, has some exercises of the kind, but most people know nothing about them.
"This banner extends to the eight points of the compass, and thus the eight corners (of the g round) are perfectly filled up."
The image that should be seen is as follows:
Keep this image well in mind.
"Every side of the eight quarters consists of a hundred jewels,"
It is thought of as an octagon.
"every jewel has a thousand rays, and every ray has eighty four thousand colours which, when reflected in the ground of lapis lazuli, look like a thousand millions of suns, and it is difficult to see them all one by one."
It is easy to imagine the difficulty!

The train of thought here is: hold fast to the sun, the source of light; then to the water and then to the ice, both mirroring surfaces.
Lapis 'lazuli is blue and polished, so it is also a mirroring surface.
We sometimes dream of it as an image of the unconscious.
"Over the surface of that ground of lapis lazuli there are stretched golden ropes intertwined crosswise; divisions are made by means of (strings of) seven jewels with every part clear and distinct."
We come now to the cross lines, these are golden ropes which are stretched over the lapis lazuli.
"Each jewel has rays of five hundred colours which look like flowers or like the moon and stars. Lodged high up in the open sky these rays form a tower of rays, whose stores and galleries are ten millions in number and built of a hundred jewels.
Both sides of the tower have each a hundred millions of flowery banners furnished and decked with numberless musical instruments.
Eight kinds of cool breezes proceed from the brilliant rays.
When those musical instruments are played, they emit the sounds 'suffering', 'non-existence', 'impermanence', and 'non-self'."
The "non-self" equals Maya, illusion, that is, the things which we mistake for the Self.
"Such is the perception of the water, which is the Second Meditation. When the perception has been formed, thou shouldst meditate on its (constituents) one by one and make (the images) as clear as possible, so that they may never be scattered and lost, whether thine eyes be shut or open. Except only during the time of thy sleep, thou shouldst always keep this in thy mind."
We should always keep the image before our inner eye.
"One who has reached this (stage of) perception is said to have dimly seen the Land of Highest Happiness (Sukhavati). One who has obtained the Samadhi (the state of supernatural calm) is able to see the land (of that Buddha country) clearly and distinctly: (this state) is too much to be explained fully; - such is the perception of the land, and it is the Third Meditation."
This image, represented in our diagram, is then the highest happiness.
The text continues with the meditation on the jewel-trees of the Amitabha Land and with the meditation on the water of the Amitabh a Land.
. . . "The perception of the water is as follows: - In the Land of Highest Happiness there are waters in eight lakes; the water in every lake consists of seven jewels which are soft and yielding." Precious-stone water.
"Deriving its source from the King of Jewels."
This is Cintamani, the most precious jewel.
It is the wishing pearl that fulfils all wishes.
It is really our picture, and is connected on the one hand with the teaching of Buddha and on the other with the Perfect One himself.
. . . "In the midst of each lake there are sixty millions of lotus flowers, made of seven jewels; all the flowers are perfectly round and exactly equal (in circumference), being twelve yoganas . The water of jewels flows amidst the flowers and rises and falls by the stalks (of the lotus); the sound of the streaming water is melodious and pleasing, and propounds all the perfect virtues (Paramitus) , 'suffering', 'non- existence ', ' impermanence' , and 'non-self'; it proclaims also the praise of the signs of perfection, and minor marks of excellence of all Buddhas. From the King of jewels (Citamani) that fulfils every wish, stream forth the golden-coloured rays excessively beautiful, the radiance of which transforms itself into birds possessing the colours of a hundred jewels, which sing out harmonious notes, sweet and delicious, ever praising the remembrance of Buddha, the remembrance of the Law, and the remembrance of the Church ; - such is the perception of the water of eight good qualities, and it is the Fifth Meditation."
The Sixth Meditation considers the way in which the Amitabha Land is divided.
"Each division of that (Buddha) country, which consists of several jewels, has also jeweled stores and galleries to the number of five hundred millions; within each story and gallery there are innumerable Devas engaged in playing heavenly music . . . . If one has experienced this, one has expiated the greatest sinful deeds which would (otherwise lead one) to transmigration for numberless millions of Kalpas;"

We find Kalpas in Hindu cosmological ideas.
Here the word means an endlessly long time.
There is a piece of fantastic Indian numbering which I would not like to keep from you. Kalpas are 4 yugas of 4800, 3600, 2400, 1200 years of the gods x 360 = Maha-yuga = 4. 3 2 million years, 2000 x Maha-yuga: Kalpa: 8 milliards 640 million years. A Kalpa is really very long!
The twilight of the gods begins and ends such a period.
The Indians are pessimistic about the age in which we live.
Truth reigns for a certain period at the beginning of a Kalpa, in the next period there is less truth and now we are in the last Yuga, the Kali Yuga, a period when very few people can bear the truth.
”after his death he will assuredly be born in that land.”
The aim of Yoga is to produce this land and it is really created as thought substance.
Indians think of thought as something thinly substantial, thought is not vaporous to them, as it is to us.
They speak of an intuition as an entity which comes to the me; and when they phantasy they make thought beings and put power into those figures.
They have made the land mentioned in the text and live in it.
The text continues with the teaching of the Buddha concerning the Meditation of Amitabha:
.. . ”Those who wish to meditate on that Buddha ought first to direct their thought as follows: form the perception of a lotus-flower on a ground of seven jewels, each leaf of that lotus exhibits the colours of a hundred jewels, and has eighty four thousand veins, just like heavenly pictures; each vein possesses eighty four thousand rays, of which each can be clearly seen.”
This is not just a technique or a phantasy, but a goal; whoever wishes to reach this land is obliged to go through this process, he must take the trouble to see such things in detail.
This is no idle talk but a very serious matter.
The whole imagination is drawn into this and they work for days on these pictures.
I met a Lama in India, who told me that a mandala, such as the one in our diagram, could only be created by a Lama, ordinary people should not even try.
In Tibetan monasteries they take infinite pains over these exercises; it is really impossible to imagine the psychology of people who spend years in such extreme concentration, producing forms of a purely psychic nature.
Mme David-Neel tells us about these people in her books.
The text continues:
”Every small leaf and flower is two hundred and fifty yoganas in length and the same measurement in breadth. Each lotus-flower possesses eighty four thousand leaves, each leaf has the Kingly pearls to the number of a hundred millions, as ornaments for illumination; each pearl shoots out a thousand rays like bright canopies. The surface of the ground is entirely covered by a mixture of seven jewels. There is a tower built of the gems which are like those that are fastened on Sakra’s head” . . .
Sakra is an Indian God, also called Indra.
. . . ”On that tower there are miraculously found four posts with jeweled banners; . . . Such is the perception of the flowery throne, and it is the Seventh Meditation.
. . . When you have perceived this, you should next perceive Buddha himself. Do you ask how? Every Buddha Tathagata is one whose (spiritual) body is the principle of nature (Dharma-Dhatu-Kaya), so that he may enter into the mind of any beings.”
This (spiritual) body is usually called the ”subtle body”, breath or smoke resembling.
This passage is very difficult to understand.
The Dharma-Dhatu-Kaya is complete identity with Buddha.
Dharma is the highest perfection, Dhatu means element and Kaya body.
When the Yogin has perceived what he is, he is Buddha.
And everyone who is Buddha has attained a (spiritual) body which is identical with the principle of nature, the one thing which has no qualities or extension.

The Yogin is the all-pervading essence which is everywhere and in everyone, so ”he may enter into the mind of any beings.” Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Pages 20-26.

Carl Jung on the Meditations of Buddha. (2015-03-24 05:27)

Lecture IV 25th November, 1938
I had only intended to give you an approximate idea of the content of the Amitayur-Dhyana-Sutra, but it may interest you to hear it in more detail.
Last time we had just begun the eighth meditation.
The text continue :
”Consequently, when you have perceived Buddha, it is indeed that mind of yours that possesses those thirty-two signs of perfection and eighty minor marks of excellence (which you see in Buddha. In fine, it is your mind that becomes Buddha, nay, it is your mind that is indeed Buddha . The ocean of true and universal know ledge of all the Buddhas derives its source from one’s own mind and thought. Therefore you should apply your thought with an undivided attention to a careful meditation on that Buddha Tathagata, Arhat, the Holy and Fully Enlightened One. In forming the perception of that Buddha, you should first perceive the image of that Buddha; whether your eyes be open or shut, look at an image like Gambunada gold in colour, sitting on that flower (throne mentioned before).
When you have seen the seated figure your mental vision will become clear, and you will be ab le to see clearly and distinctly the adornment of that Buddha country, the jeweled ground, etc. In seeing these things, let them be clear and fixed just as you see the palms of your hands. When you have passed through this experience, you should further form (a perception of) another great lotus-flower which is on the left side of Buddha, and is exactly equal in every way to the above-mentioned lotus flower lower of Buddha. Further, you should form (a perception of) another lotus-f lower which is on the right side of Buddha. Perceive that an image of Bodhisattva Avalo kitesvara is sitting on the left-hand flowery throne, shooting forth golden rays exactly like those of Buddha. Perceive then that an image of Bodhisattva Mahasthama is sitting on the right-hand flowery throne ."

A Bodhisattva is a god like being on the way to completion as a Buddha, or one who has already been a Buddha.

"When these perceptions are gained the images of Buddha and the Bodhisattvas will all send forth brilliant rays, clearly lighting up all the jewel-trees with golden colour."

. . . "When this perception has been gained, the devotee should hear the excellent Law "

The excellent law is a standing phrase expressing the teaching of the Buddha. "by means of a stream of water, a brilliant ray of light, several jewel trees, ducks , geese, and swans."

A mandala is a technical term for a magic circle which is used for meditation, but it is also used in a lower form for purpose of witchcraft; the witches' circle was well known in the Middle Ages.

There is a mandala over the entrance of a chapel at Ajanta in Hyderabad where geese appear and the lotus in the centre.

Such mandalas are specifically Buddhistic.

I do not know why it should be just geese and duck .

I asked, but no one could enlighten me. I imagine it is because geese, ducks and swans are water birds and the lotus also is a water flower.

In the olden times in India the swan, the Hams a , was the image used for a wise man; the swan can fly over land and empty spaces, it is wisdom to keep above the water or in the air.

We usually find the Buddha sitting on a lotus or in the air. "Whether he be wrapped in meditation or whether he has ceased from it, he should ever hear the excellent Law.

What the devotee hears must be kept in memory and not be lost, when he ceases from that meditation; and it should agree with the Sutras."

The Sutras are the teachings or the treatises.

The expression refers here to the Tripitaka, (the threefold basket) which contains all the Sutras.

"for if it does not agree with the Sutras, it is called an illusory perception, whereas if it does agree, it is called the rough perception of the World of Highest Happiness; - such is the perception of the images, and it is the Eighth Meditation."

This piece is especially interesting because it is admitted here that perceptions exist which are not to be found in the fixed knowledge of the dogma: but Buddhism, like the Roman Catholic Church, is inclined to judge these pieces by the Canon and to reject everything which does not agree with it as invalid.

We see by this that the Sutra is very orthodox and makes little allowance for individual experience.

. . . " Further, when this perception is gained, you should next proceed to meditate on the bodily marks and the light of Buddha Amitayus. "

The text describes the light which emanates from the Buddha, his height, the colour of his hair and of his eyes, the halo of the Buddha and his surroundings and it remarks that the Buddha Amitayus carries no fewer than 84,000 signs of perfection on his body.

You notice that the meditation is not on the spirit of the Buddha, but on the body of the Buddha; the highest truth grows from the deepest roots of the body and not from the spirit.

That is a difference in point of view between the East and the West which makes it very difficult for us to understand the East ; because the Christian, on account of his whole upbringing, does not believe this truth, the body is the unspiritual par excellence for him.

. . . "If you pass through this experience you will, at the same time see all the Buddhas of the ten quarters.

. . . Those who have practised this meditation are said to have contemplated the bodies of all the Buddhas. Since they have meditated on Buddha's body, they will also see Buddha's mind."

Here is the absolute proof that it is the body which is intended, the contemplation of the mind arises from it.

"It is great compassion that is called Buddha's mind. It is by his absolute compassion that he receives all beings.

Those who have practised this meditation will, when they die, be born in the presence of the Buddhas in another life, and obtain a spirit of resignation wherewith to face all the consequences which shall hereafter arise . Therefore those who have wisdom should direct their thought to the careful meditation up on that Buddha Amitayus. ”
The text continues with the repetition of an injunction as to how to meditate on the Buddha Amitayus’ signs of perfection, and this ends the ninth meditation.
. . . ”When you have seen Buddha Amitayus distinctly, you should then further meditate upon Bodhisattva A valo kitesvara.”
A further description of this Bodhisattva and his attributes follows, which continues till the end of the tenth meditation.
. . . ” Buddha, especially addressing Ananda, said: ’Whosoever wishes to meditate on Bodhisattva Avalo kitesvara must do so in the way I have explained. Those who practise this meditation will not suffer any calamity ; they will utterly remove the obstacle that is raised by Karma, and will expiate the sins which would involve them in births and deaths for numberless Kalpas.”
These sins would thus involve them, if the sins were not redeemed.
”Even the hearing of the name of this Bodhisattva will enable one to obtain immeasurable happiness. How much more, then, will the diligent contemplation of him!”
The text continues with a similar instruction as to how the Bodhisattva Mahasthma ma should be meditated up on and this is the content of the eleventh meditation. It is said, of those who practise this meditation, that they will no longer live in an embryonic condition, but will have free access to the excellent and admirable countries of the Buddhas.
. . . ”After thou hast had this perception, thou shouldst imagine thyself to be born in the World of Highest Happiness in the western quarter, and to be seated cross-legged on a lotus-flower there.
Then imagine that the flower has shut thee in . . . ”
The flower now closes over him.
”and has afterwards unfolded; when the flower has thus unfolded, five hundred coloured rays will shine over thy body, thine eyes will be opened so as to see the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas who fill the whole sky; thou wilt hear the sounds of waters and trees, the notes of birds, and the voices of many Buddhas preaching the excellent Law, in accordance with the twelve divisions of the scriptures. When thou hast ceased from that meditation, thou must remember the experience ever after.”
This is the content of the twelfth meditation.
This meditation shows the transition, the transformation of the human being, who meditates first on the Buddha and then on himself and thus becomes changed.
He is closed into the lotus, which is as it were an egg and after a time the egg opens on a lotus pond and he hears the noise of the waters and the sound of the birds and the rustling of the trees, and is, presumably, surrounded by geese, ducks and swans, In other words he is in the centre of the Buddhistic mandala in the circle of geese and swans and is, so to speak, changed into a divine b eing.
It is a matter of re-birth.
. . . ” Buddha then spoke to Ananda and Vaidehi (the Que en): ’Those who wish, by means of their serene thoughts, to be born in the western land, should first meditate on an image of the Buddha, who is sixteen cubits high, seated on (a lotus-flower in) the water of the lake. As it was stated before the (real) body and its measurements are unlimited,”
Here again it is clear that the meditator is re-born.
”incomprehensible to the ordinary mind. But by the efficacy of the ancient prayer of that Tathagata, those who think of and remember him shall certainly be able to accomplish their aim.”
And this is the chief content of the thirteenth meditation.
The goal is re ached, through the meditation of the Sutra .
. . . ”Buddha then spoke to Ananda and Vaidehi: ’The beings who will be born in the highest form of t h e highest grade (i . e . to Buddha -hood) are those, whoever they may be, who wish to be born in that country and cherish the threefold thought whereby they are at once destined to be born there . What is the threefold thought, you may ask. First, the True Thought ; second, the Deep Believing Thought ; third, the Desire to be born in that Pure Land by bringing one’s own stock of merit to maturity.”

This meditation concerns the karma which has collected in earlier existences.
Karma is usually thought of as debit, as guilt, but there is also positive, creative karma.
The Buddhists strive to acquire virtue, through Yoga meditation, in order to remove the obstacle of their negative karma.
They can thus cast off the bonds of the klesas which are similar to our hereditary dispositions involving us in sin.
In this way these forces are freed and transformed.
”Those who have this threefold thought in perfection shall most assuredly be born into that country. There are also thee classes of beings who are able to be born in that country. What, you may ask, are the three classes of beings? First, those who are possessed of a compassionate mind, who do no injury to any being , and accomplish all virtuous actions according to Buddha’s precepts; second, those who study and re cite the Sutras of the Mahayana doctrine, for instance, the Vaipulya Sutras; third, those who practise the six-fold remembrance.”
This refers to recollections of the Buddha life .
”These three classes of beings who wish to be born in that country by bringing (their respective stocks of merit) to maturity, will become destined to be born there if they have accomplished any of those meritorious deeds for one day or even for seven days.”
This is regarded as one of the highest grades of the instruction, it is like the Roman Catholic doctrine of indulgence.
In the sixteenth meditation there is a description of increasingly low grades o f enlightenment. The highest form of the lowest grade is represented as the case of a man:
. . . ”who commits many evil deeds, provided that he does not speak evil of the Maha Vaipulya sutras, he, though himself a very stupid man, and neither ashamed nor sorry for all the evil actions that he has done, yet, while dying, may meet a good and learned teacher who will recite and laud the headings and titles of the twelve divisions of the Mahayana scriptures. Having thus heard the names of all the Sutras, he will be freed from the greatest sins which would involve him in births and deaths during a thousand Kalpas. A wise man also will teach him to stretch forth his folded hands and to say, ’Adoration to Buddha Amitayus’ (Namo-mitabhaya Buddhaya, or, Namo-mitayushe Buddhaya).”
”Adoration to Buddha ”is the classical Buddhist phrase, and has a corresponding gesture.
The way we fold our hands in prayer is only used as a greeting in the East and is quite banal.
In their divine services they stretch their hands, folded together, forward and over their heads.
It is a wonderful sight to see these brown people doing this by the light of torches.
”Having uttered the name of the of the Buddha, he will be freed from the sins which would otherwise involve him in births and deaths for fifty millions of Kalpas. Thereupon the Buddha will send a created Buddha, ”
A created Buddha is an image of the Buddha which is difficult to explain.
The contemplator creates this figure in his meditation, but the figure is nevertheless a real Buddha who actually exists, but who disappears when the meditation ceases.
He is omnipresent and perfect all over the world.
When he disappears he no longer has that form, but he is not lost when he is not visible, for he exists always, in essence.
”and the created Bodhisattvas Avalokitesvara and Mahasthama to approach that person with words of praise , saying: ’0 son of a noble family, as thou hast uttered the name of that Buddha, all thy sins have been destroyed and expiated, and therefore we now come to meet thee. After this speech the devotee will observe the rays of that created Buddha flooding his chamber with light, and while rejoicing at the sight he will depart this life.”
This is a description of a situation which is also described in the Bardo Thodol.
It is there a vision which the dying man has as life is leaving his body, he perceives the Dharma-kaya, the divine body of truth, [Dharma - law, kaya – body).
If the dying man has still much karma to work off he cannot stand this white light; but if he cannot, he sinks through the darker coloured lights and eventually finds himself involved in rebirth.
” Seated on a lotus -flower he will follow that created Buddha and go to b e born in the jewel-lake.
After the lapse of seven weeks, the lotus-flower will unfold, when the great compassionate Bodhi will stand before him, flashing forth magnificent rays, and will preach to him the deepest meaning of the twelve divisions of the scriptures.”

And so on.
Bodhi or Buddhi is full enlightenment. Buddhi a means the enlightened one, the enlightenment is personified here as the great compassionate Bodhi In some other texts it appears in a feminine form.
It is said of the beings who are born into the lowest form of the lowest grade:
”If there be anyone who commits evil deeds, and even completes the ten wicked actions, the five deadly sins and the like; that man, being himself stupid and guilty of many crimes, deserves to fall into a miserable path of existence and suffer endless pains during many Kalpas. On the eve of death he will perhaps meet a good and learned teacher who will, soothing and encouraging him in various ways , preach to him the excellent Law and teach him the remembrance of Buddha, but, being harassed by pains, he will have no time to think of Buddha. Some good friend will then say to him: ’Even if thou canst not exercise the remembrance of Buddha, thou mayst, at least, utter the name, ’Buddha Amitayus’. Let him do so serenely with his voice uninterrupted ; let him be (continually) thinking of Buddha until he has completed ten times the thought, repeating (the formula), ’Adoration to Buddha Amitayus’ (Namo-mitayushe Buddhaya). On the strength of (his merit of) uttering Buddha’s name he will, during every repetition, expiate the sins which involve him in births and deaths during eighty millions of Kalpas. He will, while dying, see a golden lotus-flower like the disc of the sun appearing before his eyes; in a moment he will be born in the World of Highest Happiness. After twelve greater Kalpas the lotus flower will unfold; thereupon the Bodhisattvas” . . .
And so on. This is the main content of the sixteenth meditation.
This meditation anticipates the idea of the Bardo Thodol.
The Lama usually reads the Tibetan Book of the Dead for the person who is already dead, partly in order to teach him that he is dead.
He may not know this and then he has to be taught.
He is told to do something like go through a wall, and when he finds he can, he begins to understand that he is dead.
We find this same idea, curiously enough, in the early American spiritualists, though they knew nothing of the Bardo Thodol.
It is a primeval idea which springs up in different places and ages.
The text continues:
”When Buddha had finished this speech, Vaidehi, together with her five hundred female attendants, could see, as guided by the Buddha’s words, the scene of the far-stretching World of the Highest Happiness, and could also see the body of Buddha and the bodies of the two Bodhisattvas. With her mind filled with joy she praised them, saying: ’Never have I seen such a wonder !’ Instantaneously she became wholly and fully enlightened, and attained a spirit of resignation, prepared to endure whatever consequences might yet arise.”
You see here that the highest ideal of Buddhism, namely the spirit of resignation, the overcoming of desire, comes out of the body and not out of the spirit.
”Her five hundred female attendants too cherished the thought of obtaining the highest perfect knowledge, and sought to be born in that Buddha country. The World-Honoured One predicted that they would all be born in that Buddha country, and be able to obtain the Samadhi (the supernatural calm) of the presence of many Buddhas. All the innumerable Devas (gods) also directed their thought toward the attainment of the highest Bodhi.”
This is very characteristic of Buddhism.
The Devas are gods who have not yet even attained the rank of Bodhisattvas.
Such gods came to the Buddha, he corrected them and then they had to be born again as men.
To be a god is due to karma; the highest god is the god who is born again as the highest man, the Buddha himself.
The end of the Sutra is concerned with the name which should be given to it.
The name should have a symbolic meaning which expresses the whole.
”Thereupon Ananda rose from his seat, approached Buddha, and spoke thus : ’0 World-Honoured One, what should we c all this Sutra? And how should we receive and remember it (in the future)? Buddha said in his reply to Ananda: ’0 Ananda, this Sutra should be called the meditation on the Land of Sukhavati, on Buddha Amitayus, Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara, Bodhisattva Mahasthama; or otherwise be called (the Sutra on) the entire removal of the obstacle of Karma, (the means of) being born in the realm of the Buddhas’.”
Sukhavati - the Land of Highest Happiness.
” Thou shouldst take and hold it , not forgetting nor losing it . Those who practise the Samadhi”

The highest condition, rapture .
”(the supernatural calm) in accordance with this Sutra will be able to see, in the present life, Buddha Amitayus and the two great Bodhisattvas.”
. . . ”Know that he who remembers that Buddha is the white lotus (pundarika) among men, it is he whom the Bodhisattvas Avalokitesvara and Mahasthama consider an excellent friend. He will, sitting in the Bodhi-mandala”
”Bodhi-mandala is the circle of Bodhi, the home of the Buddha, the so-called round terrace of enlightenment. This circle is the ground on which the Asvattha Tree stands, under which Sakyamuni (another name for the Buddha) repulsed the attack of Mara and eventually attained Bodhi, the highest enlightenment. Buddha did not allow himself to be misled into existence but became non-existent. Therefore it is not always the Asvattha-Tree which is represented in the centre of the circle, called also the Bodhimandavara, but sometimes the empty seat of the Buddha. Devils attack this seat in vain. ”be born in the abode of the Buddhas’. Buddha further spoke to Ananda:
’Thou shouldst carefully remember these words. To remember these words is to remember the name of Buddha Amitayus’.” Carl Jung, ETH Lecture V, Pages 27-33.

[Carl Jung on the Bodhi Mandala. (2015-03-24 07:30)

Lecture V 2nd December, 1938
We stopped last time when we were nearing the end of Amitayur-Dhyana-Sutra.
I will now read you another text which gives a description of the Bodhi-mandala, it comes from the classical Mahayana Buddhist literature.
You can find it in the Sacred Books of the East. Vol. XXI, p. 155.
Sad dharma - Pundarika. VII. 7.
Sad means good or true, dharma law and pundarika the white lotus.
Its name, therefore, in English is: ”The Lotus of the True Law”.
”In the beginning when the Lord had not yet reached supreme, perfect enlightenment and had just occupied the summit of the terrace of enlightenment, he discomfited and defeated the whole host of Mara,”
The Buddha who is spoken of here is not Buddha Sakyamuni, but a far more ancient, primeval Buddha.
Buddha Sakyamuni was one of a long line of Buddhas.
A Buddha appeared from time to time as the need for one arose.
The one who is spoken of here has an eight syllable name and is separated from our era by an unfathomable distance of time.

Here is the description of it :
”remember the great Seer, Mah Abhig nag nanabhibh ii, the most high of men, who existed many kotis of Aeons ago as the superior Gina of the period. If, for example, some men after reducing this universe to atoms of dust took one atom to deposit it a thousand regions farther on. If he deposited a second, a third atom, and so proceeded until he had done with the whole mass of dust, so that this world were empty and the mass of dust exhausted. To that immense mass of the dust of these worlds, entirely reduced to atoms, I liken the number of Aeons past. Fifty four hundred thousand myriads of kotis of Aeons.”
Another interesting text gives a description of light spreading through the universe, wandering aimlessly for countless aeons till at last the Buddha came and brought it back into himself.
The Saddharma-Pundarika continues:
”After which he (the primeval Buddha) thought: I am to reach perfect enlightenment. But those laws (of perfect enlightenment) had not yet dawned up on him. He stayed on the terrace of enlightenment at the foot of the tree of enlightenment during one intermediate Kalpa. He stayed there a second, a third intermediate kalpa, but did not yet attain supreme perfect enlightenment . . . . He remained for 10 intermediate kalpas (12 hours) on the terrace of enlightenment at the foot of the tree of enlightenment, continuing sitting cross-legged without in the meanwhile rising. He stayed, the mind motionless, the body unstirring and untrembling, but those laws had no t yet dawned up on him. Now, monks , while the Lord was just on the summit of the terrace of enlightenment, the gods of Paradise prepared him a magnificent royal throne, a hundred yoganas high, on occupying which the Lord attained supreme, perfect enlightenment; and no sooner had the Lord occupied the seat of enlightenment than the Brahmakayika gods scattered a rain of flowers all around the seat of enlightenment over a distance of a hundred yoganas; in the sky they let loose storms by which the flowers, withered, were swept away. From the beginning of the rain of flowers, while the Lord was sitting on the seat of enlightenment, it poured without interruption during fully ten intermediate kalpas, (12 hours) covering the Lord. That rain of flowers having once begun falling continued to the moment of the Lord’s complete Nirvana. The angels belonging to the division of the four guardians of the cardinal points made the celestial drums of the gods resound; they made them resound without interruption in honour of the Lord who had attained the summit of the terrace of enlightenment. ”
This is the original description of the Bodhi-mandala.
The mandala stretches to the horizon, it is not just a circle round the tree itself, the four doors are the four points of the compass.
The outer world comes in through these doors, or emanates out from him who is sitting up on the lotus.
The Bodhi-mandala is also called the Bodhimandavara, vara means circuit.
It is not just a static circle but has a circular movement to the right.
You see this in the classical Stupas of India and Ceylon.
I will give you a rough drawing (see p. 35).
There are 4 doors (1) and as you go in you are forced to walk round clockwise, there is a wall to prevent you going the other way.
The Buddhists go in, bow to the Buddha and walk round the circle three times.
The stairs (2) lead to a second circle (3) where the process may be repeated.
There are three umbrellas (4) above the dome representing the three worlds:
a) The Dharma Kaya = the world of absolute truth.
b) The Sambhoga Kaya = the world of subtle bodies.
c) The Nirmana Kaya = the world of created things.
One could also call these three: Self, anima and body.
The stupas in the region of Nepal and Tibet are called Chorten.
They are white, shaped like an onion and have a gold peak and are surrounded by flag staffs.
I saw these in the neighbourhood of Darjeeling.
The prayer or mantra which is repeated while they walk round these stupas is ”om mani padme hum”.
Om is a primeval sound, you find it in every culture which is still growing on its original foundations, and we ourselves make the same sound to express natural pleasure , we m-m about food , for instance.

It is a very impressive sound in India.
Mani means pearl or great treasure, padme is the lotus and hum, like om, has no definite meaning, it is a sound like the humming of bees.
So we find the pearl and the lotus sandwiched between a singing sound and a humming sound.
The stupas are a concretisation of the Bodhimandavara, the terrace of enlightenment, the circular course of the mandala.
They are in fact the symbols of our text in a concrete form.
I will read you the end of the Amitayur-Dhyana-Sutra:
”When Buddha concluded these words, the worthy disciples Mahamandgalyayana , and Ananda, Vaideha, and the others were all enraptured with excessive joy. Thereupon the World-Honoured One came back, walking through the open sky, to the Mount Gridhrakuta, Ananda soon after spoke before a great assembly of all the occurrences as stated above. On hearing this, all the innumerable Devas (gods), Nagas (snakes), and Yakshas (demi-gods) were inspired with great joy; and having worshipped the Buddha they went their way. Here ends the Sutra of the Meditation on Buddha Amitayus spoken by Buddha. (Sakyamuni.)”
We see here the attitude which the Devas (gods) had towards Buddha.
They appear at the important moments of his life as human people might, they are in no way above him but are pupils of the Buddha.
I will give you a short resume of the text of the Amitayur-Dhyana-Sutra.
It is interesting, for it is exceedingly typical of the process of Buddhist Yoga.
The process takes place on very strict lines from which it is not possible to deviate, there is no freedom from beginning to end, the details are all incarnated so that a Buddha will necessarily be created as a psychic image at the end.
The East regards the psychic as half physical, it is not immaterial for them as it is for us, it is definite, it has a given concreteness; so that you can actually create a Buddha through imagination.
The process begins with seeing the sun, the Yogin fixes it, so to speak, before his inward eye.
This is done in order to have a point of concentration, which is used as a ”point de depart”.
This is somewhat like self-hypnotism.
Then he must see the water and then the ice.
Both are quite transparent, so that he can see into the depths beneath and find the lapis lazuli which again is transparent.
It is only a spiritual eye which can see these things.
We have established a ground or floor, and now we discover a dhvaja under it.
Dhvaja is the Sanskrit word for banner.
It is a great pity that the original Sanskrit text of this sutra has disappeared, as I said before there is only a Chinese translation, though it has now been retranslated into Sanskrit.
The dhvaj a is not just an ordinary banner, but an emblem or a symbol; so it is under the surface, under the lapis lazuli, that you create the symbol.
This diagram represents the fundamental foundation of all the Mahayana Buddhist mandalas, there are 8 points, held together by golden ropes.
There are some exceptions in Tantrik Yoga where the mandalas are sometimes based on different numbers.
The Tantrik books are the text book on the subject.
They are scholastic and correspond to western culture.
Tantrik Yoga has played a big role in Tibetan Buddhism.
A peculiar form is the Kundalini Yoga, the serpent fire Yoga, but this is Hindu, not Buddhist.
It is despised by some but prized by many Indians.
It is much more mysterious than ordinary Yoga and is not so dogmatised.
I have brought a Lamaistic Mandala to show you.
There are three great teachers sitting above.
Two belong to the yellow hat school (those with the hats shaped like hoods) and one to the red hat school.
The latter belongs to the Bon religion, a very early Tibetan religion which is full of magic; and the former belong to Buddhism.

The large double ring is the ring of concupiscentia, that is the fire of passion, desire, envy, etc. It is represented in four colours , green, magenta, blue and red.
The inner circle is black, and is a magic circle, protecting the mandala from the fire of the concupiscentia.
The picture is fourfold and has gates to the four points of the compass.
The square is divided into four colours, yellow, red, green and white.
Such a mandala is built in butter every year in Peking.
They build it five metres high and colour it.
There is a Dorje in the centre of the mandala.
This is the thunderbolt, diamond centre and is the symbol for collected energy. All the energy is drawn in from outside into this diamond centre and is fixed there.
There is another black magic circle round this to protect it.
I have two such mandalas, copies of the larger originals in the China Institute at Frankfurt.
The other is much darker in colour, too dark to be clear.
The circle is half embedded in the earth.
You see the mountains below, coloured green, and representing the Himalayas.
This corresponds to the idea of Buddha's tomb.
When his disciples asked him how he wished to be buried, the Buddha took two cooking bowls and explained that he should be buried inside and between two such bowls.
This makes a sphere, half of which is hidden in the earth and the other half is visible above it.
The sphere is a very important fundamental form which means transformation.
Such mandalas must not be thought of as static, for they hold the idea of circumambulation.
We find them in the form of passages in the temples.
Those in the Shiva temples are circled to the right and those in the Shakti temples to the left.
The right has a masculine significance and has a spiritual effect, whereas the movement to the left is connected with the feminine and leads down into the earth, into the depths of the body.
It is a sort of spiral formation, one leads up and one down.
The mandala, which is describe d in the Amiyiyur-Dhyana-Sutra, must be thought of as radiating light and brilliance.
It is sending forth t h e 84,000 rays of light and 84,000 colours which are the signs of the perfection of the Buddha.
The light of the mandala, and therefore the mandala itself, is already the Buddha, although he himself is not yet visible. T he mandala is not just the seat of the Buddha, it is identical with him.
We come next to the eight lakes. The lotus must be imagined to be floating on the shining surface of the water.
The flowery throne of the Buddha is in the lotus, and this throne must be thought of as a tower.
"There are four posts with jewelled banners miraculously found on that tower".
Indian temples have four flag staffs, symbolic pillars of this flowery, towered throne.
Buddha himself is imagined as sitting upon his throne and the devotee goes on to imagine that he is the Buddha.
He is then transformed into the Buddha and knows that his consciousness is the consciousness of all the Buddhas.
"It is your mind that is indeed Buddha", and not only the mind of the Buddhas but also that of all the Bodhisattvas.
The East sees everything which exists as an emanation of human consciousness.
We come here to an enormous difference in point of view between the East and the West: we regard human consciousness as an extremely humble affair, but for the East it is the Buddha, the god who creates the world.
Consciousness is Buddha, Buddha is the lotus, and we can work back through the identity of the symbols till we reach the sun with which we started, and then we arrive at the fact that consciousness equals the sun.
This is an important concept of the East and of all eastern philosophy, Buddha is the inner sun.
Naturally we must not fall into the mistake of thinking that our ordinary everyday consciousness is identical with Buddha, there is no question of that.
We are speaking of that consciousness which is formed by meditation, induced by Yoga, Bodhi enlightenment, that is what the East means by the inner sun.
We find a bridge here to the West, to Christian mysticism.

The Christian mystic also sees Christ as the inner light.
This point of view is not exactly official and theologians gladly overlook the passages in the New Testament which testify to the same truth.
They do not fit into the Christian dogma, so they are explained differently.
The passage, for instance, which runs: ”Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?” (II Cor. XIII 5) is explained as among you. I admit that with an effort it is possible to translate the Greek in that way, but there is a passage (Gal. II: 20) where it becomes impossible:
” I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.”
Here it is impossible to interpret the Greek word as among.
The interpreters of the Bible could not conceive of individual experience, they were convinced that such experience needed a congregation, a whole Church.
In these days where everything is thought of in terms of the state, I should like to emphasize the fact of the existence of the individual and of individual experiences.
The State consists of a mass of individuals and only the individual gives it meaning and value.
What is collectivity without the individual?
No god can be made out of such an idol. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 25Nov38, 34-40.

Carl Jung on Buddhist Yoga processes (2015-03-24 14:00)

Lecture VI 9th December, 1938
I hope that I have given you some idea of the course which a Buddhist Yoga process takes.
We have been studying a classical text, based on broad simple lines.
This was Buddhist, but many philosophical movements in India have other forms of Yoga which one could s ay run a physiological course.
The knowledge obtained is produced by exercises in which only the body is concerned; these exercises, however, have a psychological sous- entendu.
But when we imitate these things in the West they become mere gymnastic exercises for the psychological nuance escapes us.
We get, it is true, a foggy idea of such terms as Dhyana and Samadhi, the words sound wonderful to us, but such words are no mere concepts, and they mean nothing unless one has oneself experienced the states they denote.
It is really impossible for us to realise what such things mean to an Indian who has grown up in the specific spirit of Yoga.
The other day I came across a small English book by Yeats Brown, the author of ”Bengal Lancer”.
He, like Paul Brunton the well-known journalist, is an amateur in Yoga.
There are pictures in Yeats Brown’s book of the peculiar positions of the body prescribed in that form of Yoga, and philosophy is poured thinly over the gymnastic exercises , as oil and vinegar are over a salad.
On no account should you meditate on such a text as that which we have read.
But some knowledge of eastern methods is a necessary preparation towards understanding the spirit of European active imagination, and is a great help in obtaining a right attitude towards it.
We spoke in the last lecture of the resemblance between the Buddhist conception of the inner sun and the western mystical idea of an inner Christ.
We find the same idea in the Indian Atman, a word which is related to the German Atem (breath]; it is the breath of life, which goes through everything, corresponding to the Buddha essence.
Prajapati, the world creator, has almost the same meaning.
Atman is the foundation, the primeval beginning, of our existence, and the universal being, the Self itself.
This Atman is not only the non-personal Buddha but al so the personal Atman.
Everyone has a personal Atman, a personal Self, which is one aspect of the universal.
One emerges from the personal Atman into the universal Atman through Yoga, the Yogin becomes aware of himself as the universal essence.
We will now study another form of Yoga, Tantrik Yoga.
This also belongs to Buddhism but not to classical Buddhism.
The Tantrik texts are as yet only partially accessible.
The little we know of them comes mainly from Sir John Woodroffe, who writes under the name of Arthur Avalon.
Both these names are taken from the Grail Legend. I nteresting as it is, his book ” The Serpent Power”, on Kundalini Yoga, is very difficult to read.
Tantrik Yoga is in rather bad repute in India; it is criticised because it is connected with the body, particularly with sex.
It has a good many adherents in Bengal, however, and Tantrism has had a great deal of influence on Tibetan literature.
The text, which I am going to read, attracts one by its peculiar symbolism.
It is very difficult to understand but is exceedingly helpful in the task of understanding western parallels.
It has not a classical character and speaks of a sphere which springs from physiological levels.
It’s very important symbolism is full of significance from the psychological point of view.
This text is very difficult to date but it probably belongs somewhere in the Middle Ages.
Shri-Chakra- Sambhara Tantra.
Shri means holy, chakra means wheel or mandala, Sambhara means collection and tantra, weaving loom or war , text in other words.
So we could translate it: the holy wheel collected text.
It begins with an invocation:
Vajra-yogini, Shri Mahamaya and Tiirii.
Vajra means thunderbolt or diamond.

Vaj = hard and ra = bolt.
Yogini means consort or female companion, the yoked one, a goddess.
A divine being expressed as the consort.
A female being, a Shakti, a power or effective force that emanates from the male god, from the masculine principle.
Shri means holy and Maha means large.
Ma or maya is building material, it is the stuff of which the world is made.
Materia and mater are words which come from rna : rna is the mother or material of the world.
It is as if God made himself visible in his female aspect.
We speak of mother earth and in German of Frau Welt (Mrs. World).
Shri Mahamaya then is the holy great illusion, or the holy great reality which is also an illusion.
Tara is the white Tara, a goddess of Mahayana Buddhism.
”This is a clear exposition of the ritual of the Mandala of Shri Chakra (holy wheel) of Great Bliss. ”
The text is going to tell us how this mandala should be used.
I will give you a rough diagram and I showed you such a picture in the last lecture (see P. 38).
The square with the four gates is contained in a circle.
The mandala is represented in this text in its ritual function.
”Obeisance to the Guru and Shri Heruka.”
The Guru who is mentioned here is not a human teacher but a god.
The god of the mandala, the holy Heruka.
He is a kind of patron saint, a Devati.
We find Devatas already in the Pali Canon, whenever Buddha preached Devatas attended.
There are descriptions of Devatas who came to Buddha at night and filled the room with light, and conversations took place between Buddha and these semi divine beings.
”Having bowed with reverence to the Guru, the essence of all the Buddhas and to Shri Heruka, I now expound the Sadhana of Shri Chakra Mahasukha.”
Sadhana is ritual; a note to th e text says that it is a ”practice whereby Siddhi [success, here spiritual attainment) may be obtained”.
It produces a magical atmosphere.
Shri Chakra Mahasukha means the holy mandala of great bliss.
The underlying thought has a magic effect. The god who is invoked here is an aspect of the Guru-essence.
You find these Gurus or spiritual leaders all over India, they are specifically Indian, they never offer themselves but are chosen.
It is the natural course of events in all good families for the young men to choose a Guru.
There are indeed exceptions to this rule.
I was talking, for instance, one day in India to a well-educated Hindu. He was speaking of education, so I asked him about his Guru.
He gave a classical name which surprised me and I asked him whether this Vedic name was still used.
”Oh no” he replied ”the original one is my Guru”.
The man he spoke of had been dead for 2,000 years but this intelligent Hindu of 70, who with us would b e a worthy Town Councilor or something of that kind, said perfectly calmly that this ancient Guru had introduced himself in a dream, and that he had realised at once he was his Guru and that he therefore had no need of a human one.
This man was a friend of Gandhi’s.
According, therefore, to the eastern conception Shri Heruka is a spiritual Guru , though such an idea is very difficult for the West to understand.
. . . ”The devotee when about to go to sleep should firstly, imagine his body to be that of Buddha Vaj ra-Sattva.”
This Buddha has the surname of Vajra-Sattva, Vajra as we have seen means diamond or thunderbolt, and Sattva means essence of being.
We know from the texts that, on the primitive level of B on, the thunderbolt was exceedingly important as a magic projectile, but later the diamond aspect plays the greater role, symbolizing the most durable thing.
The diamond is the subtle body in Chinese philosophic Yoga.

The lapis philosophorum of the alchemists is the same thing as the Vajra, it is the thing which is produced in the laboratory of a man's life and which is far more durable than he is.
These thoughts run parallel both in the East and West.
The text tells us that the body of the sleeper is imagined to be the body of the Buddha, we should understand that as the diamond body.
So it is the transformation of the ordinary body into the eternally durable body that is meant.
"and then at length merge into the tranquil state of the Void. "
This text has been translated by a Tibetan, Kazi Dawa-Sandup.
He was a Lama and became a professor in Calcutta but unfortunately fell a victim to the climate which was fatal to him after his native mountain air.
He was the Guru of Evans-Wentz who brought out the Bardo Thodol, the Tibetan Book of the Dead.
We owe this Lama a great debt of gratitude for the help which he gave to Evans-Wentz and to Sir John Woodroffe , the editor of this text.
Shunyata is a Sanskrit word for this tranquil state of the Void.
The devotee must dive into the absolute Void and immerse himself in it for a long time in order to make his spirit receptive.
"Arising from that state he should think that the double drums are resounding from the midst of the heavens proclaiming the Mantras of the twenty-four Heroes."
You will remember the four points of the compass in our last text and here it is the drums which come from the four corners of the earth.
The ritual of the drummers is a very important one in the East and is full of significance.
At Kandy in Ceylon there was a drum ritual every evening at 7 o'clock.
Five drummers with big double drums came into the vestibule of the Temple and stood in the four corners.
The master-drummer was in the centre with a still bigger drum, but only the four corner drummers, the representatives of the four gods of the mandala (apparently they represent the guardians of heaven) se their drums at first.
They march through the temple and only in the Mandapam, at the entrance of the innermost sanctuary, does the master drummer begin with his perfect drumming.
It is a most impressive ceremony, the temple is very dark and in the depth of the temple you see a golden Buddha smothered in flowers.
They use j as min flowers and the air is laden with the scent, they use the blossoms without stems so that they shall fade quickly.
Women and girls bring these flowers and sing a mantra to the effect that as the flowers fade so do our earthly lives.
As the Master Drummer reaches the sanctuary one's whole being is nolens volens shattered by the vibration.
It produces a supernatural agitation and phantastic atmosphere.
The drum melody is a sacrifice of tone to the Buddha, the music is brought to the temple in order to be sacrificed.
This theme, as we have seen in the passage that I have just read, appears right at the beginning of our text.
"Arising from his sleep in this state of divine body he should regard all things around him as constituting the Mandala of himself as Vajra-Sattva."
In other words he should regard his surroundings, his bed, room, house, etc., as part of the Bodhi-mandala, the place of enlightenment, where his body becomes the diamond body, the body of the Buddha.
"If beneficial to his devotion, he may perform the ablutions as he had done while receiving initiation."
We should call this baptism, and s ay that he could, f beneficial, repeat the baptism which was his initiation from a personal existence to a supra personal existence.
"Then seating himself with ease facing the South let him sanctify his body by tasting the drop of Amrita."
Amrita is a drop of the wine of the gods, a nectar.
It is ordinary wine but it may only be used in the ritual, and has the same characteristics as the Christian communion wine.
Amrita is taken on the tip of the ring finger, which then moistens the lip s and thus fills the participator with the divine spirit.
"Then he should begin by repeating the Refuge formula. (I take refuge in Buddha, the Law and the Assembly.)"

Sangha is the Sanskrit word for Assembly and plays a great role in Buddhism.
”and the Good Wishes formula. (May all sentient beings have happiness and be endowed with the cause thereof. May all sentient beings be free of pain and its causes. May all sentient beings ever enjoy happiness unalloyed with pain. May they feel supremely equable.)
Then let him meditate on himself as Demchog” Demchog is the Tibetan word for Mahasukha, meaning the great bliss of this mandala.
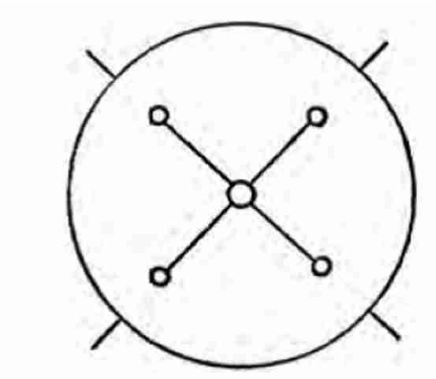
”and his Consort.”
We come here to the place in the text where it becomes clear that it is not just the god but also his consort who is meant.
So, at the beginning of the process, the Yogin is transformed into a body which is female as well as male, he is Yogin and Yogin!,
He is identified with the lord of the mandala in his male and female form. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 9Dec38, Pages 41-45.

Carl Jung on “Tantric Meditations” (2015-03-25 06:26)



Lecture VII 16th December, 1938
We began a Tantrik text in our last lecture and we will penetrate further into its depths today.
This text is very difficult, it requires a great deal of explanation but by taking sufficient trouble it is possible to understand it.
”Imagining his own body to be that of the Devati (Demchog) is the bliss pertaining to the body.
Saying ’Shri He-ru-ka Aham’, he should meditate on each syllable of the Mantra as follows:”
The mantra is ” Shri He-ru-ka Aham”. Heruka is the Guru and Lord of the Mandala, he must be imagined or created by the devotee.
The text prescribes dividing the mantra into syllables in order to elucidate the holy text.
It is necessary for the devotee to take infinite pains.
He can only understand and fully realise the meaning of the mantra through analyzing it minutely.
”Shri is non-dual experience;”
This is literally ”not two knowledge ” , advaita experience.
The term is used of Brahman, the world principle.
Shri expresses here the devotee’s own non-dual experience.
”He is the cause and the Void or Dhatu;”
”He is the primal cause and Shunyata, the Void or the ultimate formless reality.
Dhatu is the element or principle.
Literally ”He ” is the primal cause of the element, and the Void which is only absolute nothingness from the point of view of the contemplator, for it is also absolute fullness . (We cannot define it so we think of it as empty.)

The Yogin must realise as he pronounces this syllable, that he is not only outside time but also at the beginning of all things.
" 'Ru' is uncompounded ;" Separation from combinations, not a compound. " \'Ka' is not abiding anywhere."
This is the Buddha essence which cannot be said to be in any place for it is all-pervading, and dependent on nothing.
The Yogin comes to this first cause or essence by meditating on the four syllables.
"Thinking oneself to be the Self which embodies all these,"
He must be able to think of the all-pervading essence as himself.
This is almost impossible for the West to comprehend, for when we say " myself " we just mean the body, the three dimensional animal, but the text is perfectly clear on this point.
"whatsoever a man says is Mantra."
This again is amazing to western ideas .
We think that what man says is "human all too human".
But we have to accept the fact that we have in our text the case of a man who thinks of himself as the Self, the primal cause , the Buddha essence.
We think of this as an inflation and wonder where it will end, yet we must allow that it expresses a psychological fact.
We can find parallels in the West, the Christian mystics experienced the inner Christ, a direct contact with the godhead.
If an Indian has really fulfilled the conditions which allow him to be the Self, the Atman, then he is himself the truth and what he says is a Mantra, a holy sentence, the truth.
A Mantra is repeated again and again, you can also use it as a sort of magic spell and it acts like a suggestion when directed towards our own psyche.
"Let him imagine in the centre of his own heart the letter 'A' "
"A" is the first letter of Aham.
"evolved from the experience which knows that forms are unreal."
This is a circumlocution, literally the Sanskrit sentence means:
"'thinking not' knowledge: that is Jnana which is that Wisdom which knows that all forms have no real existence as such in themselves, that is, which knows that the true nature of forms is Shunyata."
The ego form is also unreal.
Buddhism holds that there is no individual soul.
When there is a collision in the streets in the East things are quite different to here.
Pandemonium breaks out here when two vehicles hit each other.
But in Ceylon, for instance, a mantra is spoken to the effect that all disturbances pass, everything is illusion, therefore my ego, which could become excited, is also an illusion.
Obviously this point of view has its advantages.
"On i t let him think of the clear Lunar disc which symbolises world experience,"
This again is a circumlocution.
A note to the text calls it Vishaya Jnana = world knowledge of objects, that is doubtful knowledge so it is related to the moon.
There is an Upanishad text which says that out of manas came the moon.
The word manas is connected with the Middle High German word mana, meaning moon.
The English word mind is also related to manas.
All these words have a common root.
The moon lays a magic spell over a landscape, everything appears in a deceptive light.
So th e Yogin is really saying: everything which we know about the things of the world is doubtful, deceptive like moonlight.

The text continues:
”and upon that the Mantra ’Hum’,”
This is the second syllable of the word ’Aham’.
It is the mystical sound which corresponds to ’Om’.
We have already met it in the mantra” Om mani padme hum.” (See Lecture V. p. 36)
”Om” was the invocation and ”hum” closed the mantra.
”which symbolises mind devoid of objective content.”
Mind is here that consciousness which is free of objective thoughts and contents, there are only subjective contents left.
And even these are only a subjective conception, an illusion, for we have just seen Buddhism holds that there is no individual soul.
”Of this ’Hum’ the letter ’U’ stands for the knowledge which accomplishes all works; the body of the letter ’H’ for that knowledge which distinguishes; the top of the letter ’H’ for the equalizing knowledge;”
Literally ”equal intensifying of knowledge”.
Here it is the sameness of all, Samata Jnana, in contrast to the last form of knowledge mentioned, the ”knowledge which distinguishes”, which recognizes differences.
”the crescent (Chandra) for the mirror-like knowledge;”
This crescent moon is very peculiar, it is doubtful where it comes from.
It plays no role in India.
Perhaps it comes in through Tibetan influence.
I know very little about Tibet.
”and the Hindu (Thigle) above that for the changeless knowledge.”
Dharma-dhatu-Jnana, the changeless knowledge, is that knowledge which knows that things are not liable to change or transition but are all of the same essence, that is, the Buddha essence, the Self.
In other words:
”The wisdom which knows that the things which are coloured differently and the like are really not so, but they are all of one nature and taste. ”
The Hindu (Sanskrit) or Thigle (Tibetan) is a point above, it is of special significance in Tantrik Yoga.
It is the Mantra expression for Ishvara (lord and creator) in India, and for the highest truth in Tibet.
You find it also in the Bardo Thodol where it is called the Dharma Kaya.
It would lead too far for me to go into further detail but the many aspects of consciousness mentioned here amount to a whole psychology and repay study.
”Meditation on these different parts of the Mantra symbolizing the mind is the method by which the latter is qualified for pure experience
And enjoys the bliss which arises from contemplation on the bliss of the divine mind.”
The Yogin must make a real analysis of all these different consciousnesses.
”From the Mantra ’Hum’ rays of blue, green, red and yellow light shoot forth through the four heads of the Devata and gradually fill the whole Universe.”
The Yogin must be imagined in a magic circle, the four heads of the Devatas making a square.
The Yogin is in the centre, saying ”Hum”, the first quality of consciousness, the world principle.
The four colours emanate from the c entre, the four qualities of consciousness, that is the four functions of consciousness, the four possibilities of consciousness.
I have spoken of the seat length in earlier lectures.

This image has a psychological meaning, the four heads of the Devatas, permeated with light, radiate out into the universe.
”Then think in the following order : - ’May all sentient beings enjoy happiness and be endowed with the cause thereof’ –
’May they be freed of all pain and of the causes thereof’ - ’May they never be separated from the highest happiness’ - ’May they be free both of attachment as well as hatred, and may they have all their eight worldly wishes pruned and levelled.’
Think fully on these wishes in their order the one after the other.
Then snapping the thumb and middle finger of the left hands and pointing the latter in the ten directions ”
These are the eight points of the compass , zenith and nadir.
These peculiar gestures are very foreign to us but they belong to this Yoga.
I will now read you a passage out of a Mithraic Liturgy, second century A.D :
”After you have repeated the second prayer, in which Silence is called for twice, whistle twice and snap your fingers twice and you will at once see stars coming forward from the disc of the sun, many, many stars, five-pointed, filling the whole air. S ay again ’Silence, silence’ and when the disc of the sun has opened you will behold an infinite circle and fiery doors that are closed.”
This is a parallel and is also filled with magic significance.
It is apotropaic in the Mithraic Liturgy, it says clearly in another place that it is when the gods come too near you that you should snap your fingers and click with your tongue.
You feel the gods approaching too closely, so you make a propitiatory gesture as you would to an animal , and ask them to keep a little further off to prevent them from becoming threatening.
This is a very foreign idea to us now, though such things were common in the Middle Ages.
A sorcerer, who wanted to dig up a treasure, for instance, would isolate himself by drawing a magic circle.
He was still vulnerable and there were ghosts and demons ready to attack him.
You can still find Swiss peasants who use the magic circle to prevent bad spirits doing them harm, and the same idea app ears here in Tibetan Buddhism.
The snapping of the fingers in our text is a propitiatory gesture as in the Mithraic Liturgy.
The text continues:
”let him think it to be such directions and repeat the Mantra ’Sukhe bhavantu’ [Be happy.)”
A formula of welcome.
”By this means he dedicates all the merits that he acquires to the benefit of others. This is the meditation on the four abodes.”
The four abodes are the four states of Dhyana.
He is performing a meritorious action and dedicating his merits to the benefit of others.
He propitiates the world powers in this way.
These are the dangers which we also saw in the Mithraic Liturgy.
Until you are ”non- dual” another exists who could harm you. I will read you another passage from the same Mithraic Liturgy:
”But you will see how the gods fix their eyes up on you and press themselves against you. Then lay your forefinger on your lip sand say:
’ Silence ! Silence! Silence!’ the sign of the living, immortal god, ’Protect me, Silence!’ Then give a long whistle and snap your fingers and speak and then you will see how graciously the gods look up on you, no longer pressing themselves against you but going rather to the scene of their own activity.”
We see here that it is possible to pacify and avert these supernatural powers.

If the Yogin is ”non- dual” no one else exists for him to fear but yet the apotropaic gestures have remained in our text.
This originated in the time when the gods were the therianthropic, partly man and partly beast. We still project part of our psyche which does not seem to belong to us into animals.
This is particularly evident with primitives, who become very disturbed when an animal departs from its usual habits.
The coyote, for instance, is a very shy animal and never shows its lf by day and, if one should be seen in an Indian village in daylight, all the inhabitants are convinced that it is a doctor coyote, a daemon, supernatural, a medicine man among coyotes.
The American Indians are afraid of such an animal and have ceremonial usages and sacrifices to avert the danger, for the animal has broken the world order.
You find the same idea among the Africans, when unusual events take place on an ant heap, for instance, the natives dig out the ants and perform sacrifices.
When an animal departs from its usual nature the primitive feels entirely disoriented and expects water to begin running up hill.
We are insufficiently aware of the animal side of our nature .
We find animal headed people in the Mithraic Liturgy I have just quoted, like the old gods in Egypt and elsewhere.
When a god is called a bird or a falcon it is no facon de parler. He is a bird or a falcon, that is, his peculiar behaviour gives the impression of a bird or falcon.
There were many animals in early Christianity, three of the Evangelists are represented with animals’ heads.
An Indian who went to England was very much surprise d to find that Christianity was an animal cult!
He saw it with his own eyes, he reported, eagles, lambs and doves were to be found in every Church!
The human being is much more ”en evidence” in Indian temples, though the elephant-headed Ganesha is an exception.
We are only gradually laying aside the idea of animal gods.
Our text continues:
”Again think that rays of various coloured light beam forth from the Mantra ’Hum’ filling the whole body and shining there out in all space, cleansing the sins and ignorance and the propensities born of habit of all sentient beings, changing them all into myriad forms of Khorlo-Demchog.(Shri-chakra-mahasukha)“-
The holy chakra of the highest bliss.
”Then having withdrawn inwards all the rays of light and absorbed them into one’s own self, meditate again as follows:”
This is very typical, first the light beams forth out of the Mantra, and then it must be withdrawn into the centre.
The rays have gone out of the body and must be brought back into it again, and when the emanations have been gathered in from the whole world, the Yogin should meditate as follows:
”Let the worshipper think the Rupa-skandha (bodily aggregate)”
The form element. (Rupa = form, skandha = aggregate or element.)
This is another eastern psychological idea, namely the element which brings about all forms, i.e. imagination forms, ideas.
”to be Vairochana; his Vediina-kandha (aggregate of sensation) to be Vaja-suryya;” Diamond sun.
Vajra means diamond or eternal, and suryya sun. ”his Samjna-skandha (aggregate of feeling)”
The translator has left these ”skandhas” in the Sanskrit, the bracketed aggregates come from the notes on the text.
These say that Samjnii-skandha is an ”aggregate of feeling”.
Feeling is a rational function and the Sanskrit word ”samjna” has more the meaning of harmony. I hardly know whether it can be rendered as feeling.

”to be Padme-nateshvara, (Padma Lord of Dances); his Sangskiiraskandha (aggregate of tendencies);”
Padma means lotus and the Sangskara-skandha could be given as the element of instinct.
”to be Raj a-Vajra” Kingly diamond.” and his Vijniina-skandha (aggregate of cognition) to be Buddha Vajrasattva.”
The aggregate of cognition (knowledge) is the Buddha, the enlightened diamond essence.
The highest essence proceeds out of the four functions as the final result.
”Meditate thus upon all the principles constituting the self as having become each a Tathagata: the whole constituting the revered and glorious Heruka.”
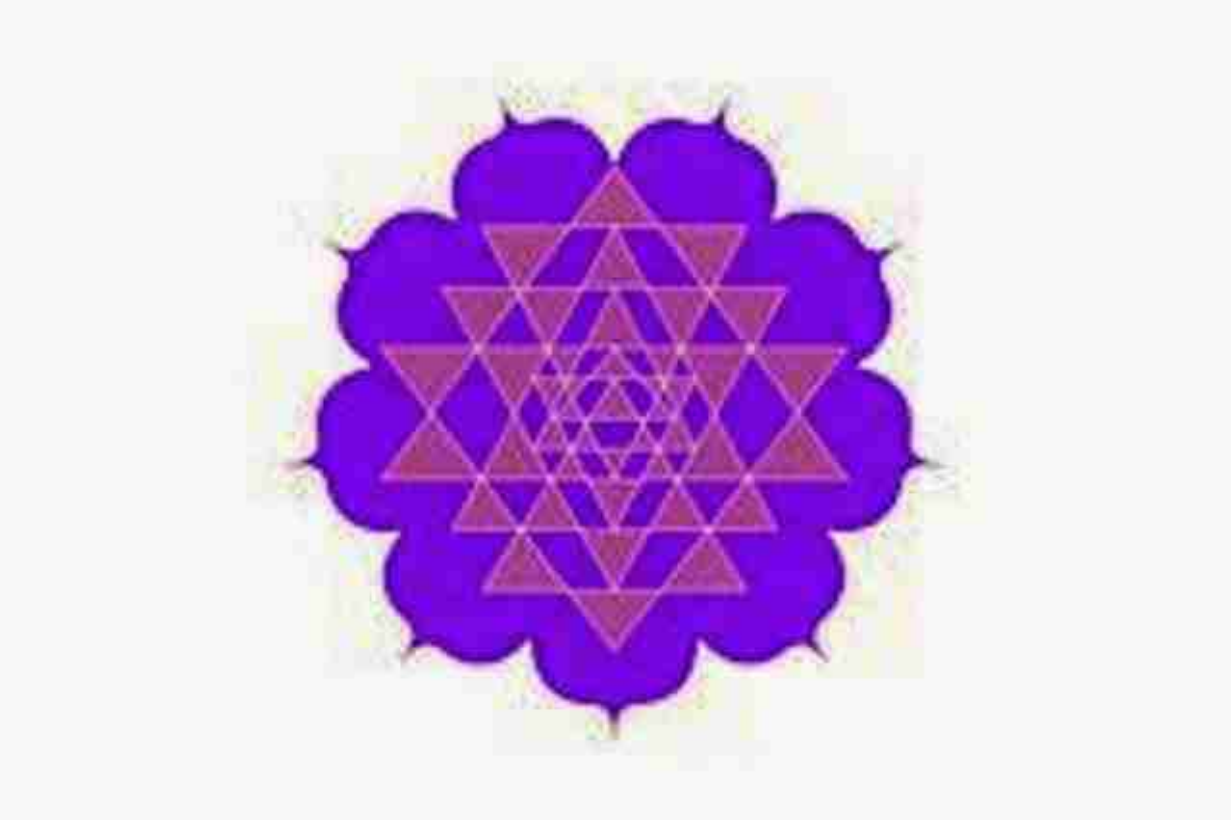
The text here is a kind of conscious analysis of the four functions.
The Yogin tries to establish a fourfold consciousness and the fifth in the centre, uniting all, is Buddha consciousness.
The quaternity is dissolved in the essence of the Yogin, and the fourfold image of consciousness disappears. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 16Dec1938, Pages 46-51.

Carl Jung’s “Synopsis of Shr’i-Chakra-Sambhara Tantra.” (2015-03-25 15:26)



Lecture VIII 13th January, 1939
You will remember that we left off before Christmas in the middle of a Tantrik text, the Shri-Chakra-Sambhara Tantra.
It is a very important exposition of Buddhist Yoga but exceedingly difficult.
We know very little about it but it is probably an instrument used only by Lamas who are specifically engaged in such exercises and who perhaps spend their whole lives in studying them.
As it is so difficult I have made a synopsis of it.
It falls into three phases, thesis, anti-thesis and synthesis.
We completed the first phase, the thesis, in our last lecture.

Synopsis of Shr'i-Chakra-Sambhiira Tantra.

I will give a short resume of the thesis before continuing.
The text begins with the Lama declaring his identification with Buddha.
He is speaking of his corpus incorruptibile, of his Vaj ra (diamond) body.
Vajra is not only hard and durable but it is als o penetrating, for it is the thunderbolt of the gods.
The Christian analogy is the incorruptible, glorified body, spoken of by St. Paul, which is to be put on a t the Last Judgement.
It was this body which the alchemists tried to produce, they looked for it in matter, because they thought of it as having substance, a subtle substance.
The incorruptible essence as such can draw in the whole surroundings and this is done by the Yogin through the Yoga exercise as Buddha, just as if I should draw you all in as part of my mandala.
The text goes on to declare the identity of the Yogin with Mahi'isukh a (great bliss) and his Yogin.
The Yogin declares that he is himself the god of highest bliss and his female companion, his Shakti.
The god appears as man-woman, eternally yoked together.
We find this also in Greece and Babylonia, the Greek word syzygia means a god yoked with a goddess.
The male and female always being together is a very important motif in psychology.
Then we come to Shr'i Heruka Aham.
Heruka is a Tibetan Devati, Lord of this Mandala.
Heruka is much the same as Mahasukha, psychologically they are both expressions of the Self, the totality, consciousness plus the unconscious.
We find the god of this mandala expressed in many forms.
The Shri Heruka Aham mantra is so holy that it should not only be murmured and sung, but divided into syllables and each syllable should be meditated upon.
It is through this operation that identification with its essence is brought about.
Shr'i = I am "non-dual", only one; He = I am the primal cause; ru = I am uncompounded ; ka = I am omnipresent, all pervading, nowhere and everywhere.
In other words: I am the Buddha essence and can thus spread myself through the whole of space.
The four are there so the fifth is bound to be present also, my Self, the god of this mandala.
This is not logical western thinking, we think in series, 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 would just be the next number.
But the East thinks in circles, and then 5 is not just the next figure but the centre, it is the quinta essentia, the essence of all.

We used to think like this in the Middle Ages also, but scientific thinking put a stop to it.
The East thinks clockwise, pradakshina, as a rule; as far as one can tell most stupas are circled by the path of the right hand, which belongs to Shiva; and Shakti temples are circled to te left, apradakshina, the path of the left hand, and, where both are concerned, half the circle is pradakshina and half apradakshina (see diagram] , and the same method seems to be adhered to when the barques of Shiva and Shakti sail on the Temple pool.
The text continues with the analysis of the knowledge.
The meditation on the syllables of the mantra leads to identification with the highest Self.
This condition, sometimes reaching ecstasy, is dangerous to the Yogin, for if the human being believes that he is the absolute he may explode.
So as a precautionary measure he analyses his knowledge, he uses reason to safeguard himself, as though he were using the critique of pure reason.
Kant himself emphasises that God, the Highest Being, is in no way affected by what we know about him.
So the Yogin analyses what he knows about Buddha and takes the last word in the Mantra: ”Aham ” for this purpose.
A is divided into two kinds of knowledge.
The first is Shunyata (Void) and the second is Vishaya (doubtful) knowledge.
The first consists of the knowledge which knows that the true nature of forms is the Void, and the second is world knowledge of objects, doubtful knowledge, knowledge that is as questionable as the moon, as if things were seen dimly in the moonlight, everything might be something else.
This is why ”world-experience” is connected with the symbol of the ”clear Lunar disc ”.
The second syllable Hum is meditated on in four stages.
The first stage is the perfecting knowledge, synthetic ; the text calls it ” the knowledge which accomplishes all works”.
The second stage is the knowledge which distinguishes and discriminates.
The third is the equalising knowledge, the sameness of all, showing everything as analogous.
The fourth is the ”mirror-like” knowledge, that is empirical knowledge.
Then comes the fifth, the quinta essentia, in the form of a sentence, ”Dharma-dhatu-]nana”, the changeless knowledge.
This states that I have recognised the highest knowledge, so the Self is insured.
Then the light of consciousness shoots forth from the ”Hum ”, the humming is dissolved into four colours.
These symbolise the four functions, the truth of the four ways of knowing, the four different qualities of light and the four points of the compass.
The apotropaic snapping of the fingers in the ten directions follows, the Yogin is in the centre of the world system and says: I am the centre, the eight directions of space, zenith and nadir.
Then he assimilates all beings into the mandala.
One could say that the Yogin hangs like a spider in its web, and draws all beings through the rays of light into the mandala of his personality.
He establishes himself as the centre of the world. The light, which emanated from the ”Hum”, is withdrawn and absorbed by the Self.
The fifth, or quinta essentia, follows in the form of an analysis of the functions.
These are personified as four Buddhas and differentiate d as the Vedana-skandha, the element of the senses which is the Vajra Suryya,
(the Diamond Sun,) and is certainly the function of sensation.
The Samjna-skandha is translated in a note by the Editor as the feeling aggregate.

It is the Padma-nateshvara, (the Lotus Lord of the Dances).
I do not feel quite sure that feeling is the right translation, it is more harmony, agreeing with.
The Rupa-skandha is the form element so as a hypothesis we will call it thinking.
It is Vairochana (Bodhisattva) .
The Sangskara-skandha, which the Editor calls the aggregata of instinct, would be the function of intuition, that is perception via the unconscious.
The western psychological equivalent of the eastern Sangskara is the idea of heredity.
As we have already seen that Karma is the sum-total of what we bring over from former lives, our debit and credit account, merits and losses.
Sangskara is the sum-total of the mind that we have created in former existences.
This eastern point of view would explain many mysterious fates and why certain things have to be lived.
Everyone in the East takes this point of view.
Very highly developed people can remember their former lives, even back into animal lives.
Buddha remembered innumerable lives and spoke freely of them.
There are curious cases of this kind to be found even now.
An Indian doctor reported two cases of children who distinctly remembered where they had lived in a previous existence and the names of their parents; he investigated the facts and found every detail corresponded to actually real people and places.
How are we to explain this?
The East is absolutely convinced that we actually lived former lives but such assertions are open to doubt.
We call the same thing hereditary tendencies, our disposition, certain things run in the family, etc.
The function which helps us to discover these things is intuition, it perceives via the unconscious.
In the West we are always using our intuition on outward things, but the East turns their Sangskara-skandha inwards.
The terms are not synonymous but intuition is our best analogy.
We have now established the four functions and must add the fifth, the Vijniina-skandha, the Buddha Vajra-sattva.
This is the quinta essentia, the highest essence, the eternal being, the enlightened diamond body.
The Yogin realises that he knows all his four functions which are Buddha, so his existence as Buddha is insured.
The text then says:
”Meditate thus up on all the principles constituting the self as having become each a Tathagata: the whole constituting the revered and glorious Heruka.”
The conclusion here is that the Yogin is the glorious Heruka, that is the Buddha essence.
We now enter the second phase, the anti-thesis, which is quite different.
It begins with the Five Senses.
”[Then meditate on the five senses as five male Devas.)
Heruka’s eyes are Vaj ra-delusion (Moha); ears Vajra-anger; mouth Varagre ed; nose Vajra-miserliness; body Vajra-jealousy; and all the senses
(A.yatana) Vajra-Ishvara.”
Vajra means diamond or eternal, so we could say eternal delusion, eternal anger and so on.
These are the typical vices of Buddhism, the Lama realises here that the divine essence contains all the bad qualities and vices.
When people are foolish enough to imitate the East their bodies rise up against them and teach them better.
If we say ”I am the Eternal Being” we are put in the asylum, or rather we should hurry to shut ourselves up if we found ourselves possessed by such an idea.
But there is nothing crazy in such an assertion in the East, for they do not mean: ”I am Buddha ” but ”I as the eternal Being am Buddha”, a totally different thing.
There must be a long preparation to be Buddha, if we do not realise this we are taking part in a holy ceremony with dirty hands.

Primitives are very much aware of such truths, they never undertake a ritual dance, for instance, without careful preparation to reach the right state of mind.
When a Pueblo Indian is going to take p art in a Buffalo dance, he prepares himself by going on to the roof of the highest house in the village.
The Pueblo Indian village is the original pattern for the modern American town, its outline is similar to that of the sky-scrapers on a small scale.
The Indian goes on to the highest ”sky-scraper ” in his village and fills himself with the sun.
Then he goes down into the underground Temple, the Kiva where the ceremony takes place, for it is only as the son of the father, (when he is identified with the sun,) that he can dance, and then the dance is filled with magic effect.
The Central Australian natives have a very clear conception of this idea.
They know that they cannot perform their ritual dances in their civil condition but only when they are transformed into their ancestors, ”les eternels increes” who lived in the Alchera, the time when there was no time and when no one had been created.
As such and as such alone are they the eternal being and can dance.
The Lama in our text, through the critique of reason, through analysing his knowledge, realises that he is identical with the giver of all thoughts.
When he is this he can really meditate.
But it is only through such a realisation that we can in a sense become one with the highest being.
And there the Lama meets the negative side.
The eastern gods all have two aspects, Kwannon, the well-known goddess of kindness, is also the goddess of hell.
They appear in their benevolent and malevolent aspects and here the Lama meets all the vices which as a man he is forbidden to have. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 13Jan1939, Pages 52-57

Carl Jung on Active Imagination and Buddha Essence. (2015-03-26 04:41)

Lecture IX 20th January, 1939
We began these second phase of our text in the last lecture.

The important statement in the first phase, which is laid down as a thesis, is that the Yogin is identical with the eternal Buddha essence.
This statement is supported by active imagination and by the analysis of the functions.
The text alters suddenly, the thesis comes to an end and the anti-thesis presents itself.
There is no indication of this in the outer form of the M. S.
It is not divided into chapters but runs straight through.
An incisive change, however, appears in the point of view.
In the first phase Heruka was spoken of as entirely positive and now quite suddenly we hear that his eyes are delusion, his ears anger, his nose miserliness, his mouth greed and his whole body jealousy.
This is the quintessence and all his senses are Vajra=Ishvara.
It is just the senses and the sense organs which bind us to the earth.
They belong to the Nidanas, the chain of causation, which entangles us in life and makes us take p art in the world, in the life which ends in death.
This chain appears later in the text and I shall speak of it then.
We meet something here which is wholly negative, so we can say that the statement: 'I am Buddha" comes up against the narrow limitations of t he body of the individual.
The body revolts against such an unheard of statement, and says it is monstrous.
We find, therefore, that the beautiful idea of identity with Buddha has been checked.
The second phase begins with a denial of this idea and a threatening denial.
The text continues:
"(The five constituent elements of the body should then be meditated up on as five female Devatas). The Earth element is ' She who causes fall'; the water element is 'She who kills'; the fire element 'She who summons'; the air element 'The Lady of Dances' and the ether element is 'She who has the net of Lotuses'."
We meet the four elements here, every component of matter.
In the Middle Ages we too thought in these terms.
Everything which lives and moves is composed of the four elements, so they are the four exponents of the physical reality of things.
These four are feminine in our text and so is the ether element which is the quintessence and embraces the other four.
Everything was explained by the scientific concept of ether when I was a student, and everyone was convinced that we had advanced far beyond the old alchemists who spoke of the quinta essentia, but ether is really the metaphysical quinta essentia of physics.
The chemists speak of it as the blue ether, the Lapis aetherius, the Philosopher's Stone, and so on. It is des crib ed here as "she who has the net of Lotuses".
This is a difficult idea, one supposes that the purpose of a net is to catch something.
Alchemistic philosophy also sees the apparent world, matter, as a trap.
This idea is to be found in the Tibetan Book of the Dead, the Bardo Thodol, as well, according to which the soul is in the Bardo for an interval of 49 days, after which sexual phantasies attract it to some place where it gets caught by a uterus.
There is an interesting legend in one of the books of Madame David-Nee!.
A young girl was fetching water at a spring when a man suddenly approached her and tried to have intercourse with her.
She was very much frightened and escaping from him ran back to her mother.
The mother listened to her story and asked her to describe the man.

The girl did so and the mother said: ”That was a Holy Man, you should have done as he asked. Put on your best dress and run back to the spring and offer yourself to him.
”The girl obeyed but when she got back the Holy Man replied:
”It is too late now, it has already happened. A rich lama who was lazy and ignorant has just died in complete darkness. His soul immediately sought for reincarnation and I wanted to give him a better Karma with you. But you refused, and while you were away the male donkey in that field covered a female donkey and the lama’s soul was caught in that uterus, so now he will be born as a donkey.”
This story is exceedingly typical of the eastern point of view.
Souls have sexual phantasies and by that they are attracted to the places where such things are happening and then they are caught in the life which the East calls Maya.
Easterners think of the visible world as an illusion, a sort of thought stuff.
The lady with the lotus net is the mistress of that prison.
The Yogin sees the visible world as the distinctness of divine thought.
The text continues:
”As one desires a precious object by means of which only one can acquire merits the purification and mental transmutation of all the aggregates the elements, and the functions of the various organs of the senses into Devata furnish such an object.”
The meaning of this passage age is that through active imagination the Yogin succeeds in making his senses and functions independent.
It is the purification of the senses.
They are Devatas, autonomous beings, it is no longer my act but a divine being. There is enormous psychological merit in such a procedure.
We saw before that the functions became ”each a Tathagata”, a Buddha.
It is possible, through active imagination, to make all the psychic activities into separate entities.
In this way they are removed from oneself.
One’s thinking, for instance, becomes a separate being, you see it no longer as your own action but as a daemon.
If all the parts of myself are outside myself I become helpless,
I cannot think.
I must say to Mr. A: ”Think please.”
Or if feeling is called for I must ask Miss B: ”Smile a little please.”
Through delegating the functions I become a whole theatrical company, instead of one person, who act me to myself.
I am emptied of them, and then I find that I am Shunyata, the Void, everything is outside me.
We, in the West, do the same thing but not in the same way, we simply naively project.
We keep a best enemy who acts us to ourselves!
Every neurotic does this, but in this case we need make no such distinction, the ”normal” do it just as much.
Projection can even lead to ideas of persecution.
Everything which we do not want to see in ourselves is there all the same and we must get excite d about it, so we excite ourselves about someone else, he does it, anything in order not to see it in ourselves.
We can see this process everywhere, the generous person with the miserly friend, the spendthrift who saves matches, etc., etc.
This process is entirely unconscious with us, the things leave us, and we are free of them but we are bound to the people who do them for us.
Our family , friends, and whole social circle are all put to this unconscious use.
The process, which we are considering in our text, simply makes this mechanism conscious.
The burden is taken off other people, everything is projected, not on to human beings, but on to Devatas which are then set up all round the Yogin.

They have Devatas or gods in Tibet and elsewhere for these projections.
Heruka is such a god, he mirrors all the negative things which lead to sickness and death.
Everything is personified here, if such a process is successful it results in entirely emptying the human being, my sight, my eye, for instance, is an autonomous Devati.
The Yogin no longer does anything himself, he no longer has any direct connection with any object because there is another there.
The Yogin wishes to cut himself off from reality, he is an infinite distance from objective reality, you feel you could never reach such people, they look right through you.
Through taking endless pains, and by the utmost perseverance, they obtain eternal peace through these personifications, and they do not even feel the pain of separation any longer.
This is how the eternal repose which we see portrayed in the images of Buddha is obtained.
The Yogin in our text obtains great merit in attaining this personification and purification.
”Again with the beams of light shooting forth from the ’Hum’ in the heart, let the worshipper invoke his Vajra-guru; His immortal, spiritual guide.
”surrounded by the line of Gurus in the upper Heavens before him. Below them is the principal Devata surrounded by the sixty-two Devatas of the Shri:-Chakra-Sambhara.”
This is our mandala, and a multitude of Devatas have come round him, a whole theatrical company.
”Then having imagined that the above Divinities are seated on the fronting Heavens let the worshipper think that he is himself multiplied Innumerably.”
This is exactly what I was saying before.
”Each of his counterparts should repeat salutation to the Gurus and salutation of the Mandala of Shri-Chakra-Sambhara in honour of the Guru and the Devatas respectively and let each bow down to them.”
Here the Yogin has dissolved into innumerable counterparts, a whole chorus, and each one of these figures is himself and every one of these must salute the Gurus and the Mandala.
When he himself salutes, he must, through active imagination, see that every one of his counterparts does the same.
This repetition is very typical of Tibet, they write mantras on their flags which flutter in the wind.
And they have wheels, wind and water wheels, which endlessly turn round repeating the mantras.
I have brought a picture to show you of Tibetan origin. (See sketch p. 61)
It depicts the Yogin, sitting as Buddha on the Lotus , with his figures round him.
The picture must be thought of as streaming with light. The Yogin is multiplied innumerable times, all the figures are himself and yet different; he is empty, entirely empty.
The question is what remains when the whole personality is dissolved in such figures?
When you try to touch such a person, you only touch one of the figures, you are aware that there is a great deal more in the personality, but it is not affected, it does not respond to you.
The disintegration of schizophrenia is somewhere on the same path, it is analogous, but there the process is left to the unconscious, and then it is no multiplication, but a split.
Disintegration is consciously undertaken in our text with the purpose of emptying the ego consciousness and integrating a central consciousness, the totality of the personality; it is undertaken because the problem of the body has come up.
All this means that in time and space I am only here in my body, I cannot be identical with Buddha, but if I can rid myself of all my personal contents, if I can distribute them as Devatas all over the universe, I can sit in the heaven of the gods and reach eternal peace.

We come now to the Sacrifice and Worship.
”Then let him offer the offerings in their order ... Saying the following Mantra ’Om Sarva-Tathagata-Shri:-Chakra-Sambhara-Mandala-ChakraSarva-Vira-Yogin!’.”
This is an invocation to the Tathagatha.
It means:
Om, Sarva = all,
Tathagatha =perfect,
Shri:=holy,
Chakra=wheel, Sambhara=collection, Mandala, Chakra =wheel,
Sarva=all,
Vajra=man,
Yogini=woman.
So translated roughly the sentence runs: ”Om all-perfect-holy-wheel-collection-Mandala-wheel-all-manwoman.”
So the Tathagatha who is invoked is the wheel, the mandala and the male and female Devatas, a totality, a hermaphroditic being - Ardhanarishvara.
We find the symbol of the hermaphrodite very often in mediaeval alchemy representing the Conjunctio.
There is such a close conjunctio in our text that it is practically a hermaphrodite.
This is the Buddha, the universal wheel, the circle, the totality.
Of all the opposites the male and female are the hardest to reconcile and this symbol means that the Yogin has overcome these opposites.
”This (Mantra) should be repeated before each of the offerings.”
The elements are sacrificed here.
Water is poured into a silver bowl in such rituals, flowers are showered on the image, fans are set in movement and wind wheels in order to sacrifice air, a fire is lit so as to sacrifice fire.
The senses are also sacrificed: I dedicate my vision to you, music is made on drums in order to sacrifice tone.
Incense is burnt and fragrant smells, such as the scent of sandalwood, are made in order to sacrifice the sense of smell, and food is sacrificed for the sense of taste.
In order to sacrifice the sense of touch the worshippers touch the Image, they smear it with ghee or rub it.
We can see this also in the West, the pilgrims to the shrine of St Anthony of Padua, for instance, rub themselves against it in the hope of obtaining the mana of the saint and with the idea of sacrificing their body to him.
The prostrations which one sees in India mean: ”Here is also my body, take it” and in our text the Yogin goes further and says: Take all these figures around me, they all belong to you.
If we do this and dedicate every piece of our personality to the gods, these pieces are ruled by the gods, we can no longer give them orders or even say what we want to say.
We find something of the same idea in the West, in the astrology of the Middle Ages, in the Aderlassmensch (the bleeding man).
Physicians consulted the position of the stars when they bled their patients, for they held that every part of the body was influenced or ruled by a sign of the Zodiac.
They believed that the stars themselves ruled the destiny of man.
We find people now with the same psychology, pieces of themselves are projected all over the universe.

This is a remnant of a state of primordial nature, an uncivilized state, and is totally different to the super culture displayed in our text.
The Lama takes infinite pains and his production is a work of art.
We have nothing in the West which can be compared to it. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 20Jan1939, Pages 58-63.

Carl Jung on Buddhist Mantra Meditation (2015-03-26 09:32)

Lecture X 27th January, 1939
We will continue with our text:
" . . . Then after the last Mantra having offered music let the worshipper think of every possible object worthy of offering which is not anyone's private property."
The music which is sacrificed is not only the drumming, but whistling, singing and instrumental music.
Every possible object must be sacrificed which is not anyone else's private property.
The temple must be sacrificed, all public buildings and objects which belong to everyone, such as mountains, but one must not sacrifice the neighbor's ox or house.
"Let his mind create for itself every imaginable article of worship and worship with them."
It is not only outer objects that should be sacrificed but also creative ones.
You bring your creative activity as well and sacrifice your thoughts and your phantasies.
"Then making the Mudra of the heavenly treasury, he should say: " I cannot tell you which Mudra this is, for there are a great number of Mudras.
" Obeisance by the grace of the Dharma-Dhatu,"
The essential truth, the essence of Buddha.
"the Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, Mantras and the power of Mudra;"
Mudra, as we saw earlier in these lectures, is the position of the hand , a symbolic action with magic meaning.
The meaning is indicated through the gesture of the hands, and the Yogin assumes that the things thus suggested will be magically brought about.

”by the grace of my own faith”
This is very interesting.
We should compare this idea with the Christian analogy.
The Christian would never think of it being his own grace , he hopes to obtain God’s grace through his own faith, whereas the Buddhist believes that he creates the actual grace by his faith.
”and Samadhi and by the power of all my good wishes; let every kind of offering for worship existing in this world, not held in possession by any one, which is as inconceivably grand and magnificent as the cloud of offering that was offered by the Bodhisattva Samanta Badra appear before my Guru and the Buddhas of the Mandala Chakra and let them be on the grandest scale.’”
The Bodhisattva Samanta Bhadra is mentioned here, Samanta means equalising and Bhadra blessed.
”Having uttered this wish he should snap with his fingers and thumb.”
Here again we have a propitiatory gesture to influence and attract the gods, though it is at the same time a defensive gesture.
These are remnants of the Bon religion and do not belong to Buddhism proper.
Bon is an old Tibetan popular religion.
”Again making the Mudra on the heart, he should repeat this mantra:
’Om, all-knowing one, fulfil (my desire) , fulfil (my desire) ; come forward, come forward; be round and round (the Mandala); Salutation to Thee; I remember the Samanta Buddha; let this upper space be clear (of obstacles) ; Let the Dharmadhatu the unchanging be everywhere; May the Tathagata be in the petalled Mandala which is opposite to, and made by, me. Svaha to all the Tathagatas who are holy, knowledge and power, who are the fuel of strength (strong as fire issuing from fuel], who are the Power of this Mandala, and who are all mighty. ”
This is the Invocation All-knowing one be round and round, and with this we come to the end of section
A in the second phase.
It is an invocation to that being that has been created by the Lama or into which the Lama is transformed.
This is apparently an extraordinary contradiction.
The Lama is himself Buddha and the Bodhisattva Samanta Bhadra and yet he worships them.
It seems entirely superfluous to invoke himself, but he is the Buddha and he is not the Buddha, so it is impossible to explain logically.
It is very easy for a European to get upset by such a lack of logic and to give up the whole thing as valueless.
But the human being is full of such contradictions, we are all composed of the opposites but, if we do not know this, the other side lives its existence in the dark and we know nothing of it.
The Yogin’s Buddha is a subjective and objective image.
It lies in the Yogin’s power to create him or to leave him uncreated and yet the Buddha has an objective existence.
This is connected with a psychic peculiarity which is most antipathetic to the West.
The whole West assumes that the psyche is a subjective concern, and fights against the fact it is also objective.
We think of our consciousness as our own, and in one way it is, yet it contains a great deal which is not.
We know that twice two are four, for instance, but we cannot call that our subjective knowledge.
We simply take over such facts ready-made and play chess with them; for we can to some extent use the fact that twice two are four for our own purposes even though it does not belong to us.
On the other side, we are confronted with psychic facts which are also objective.
We do not suffer from the delusion that a cherry could not hang on its stalk without our help , yet it never occurs to us that we are just as powerless in our own dreams.
We find ourselves in a certain dream atmosphere, it comes from a background which we cannot control.
The essential thing is: we are not master in our own psyche but, as this fact is not recognised, all psychic disturbances are regarded as illness.
The idea of a normal man, perfectly healthy, is in itself an illusion.
All mankind is liable to illness for we are not our own masters.
Both in the East and the West it is possible to undertake a ”training ”, by which we can change ourselves considerably.
Yoga is not always undertaken in order to create a Buddha, but as a training of the will and to repress the emotions which is possible.

We often see people here in the West who are acting their whole feeling life artificially.
There is nothing real in this, their eternal smile is an artificial product and is wholly a deception.
The result of such training depends entirely on the motives for which it is undertaken.
I can say that I look cheerful and am kind for the sake of society but it is quite possible that if I exaggerate it it will have exactly the contrary effect.
People cannot stand having unnatural virtue around them all day, it makes them feel inferior and they may even be come criminals in order to compensate it.
If such cheerfulness and virtue become too widespread, there is even a bloody revolution against it.
Think what awful children really " nice" parents usually have; we have a Swiss rhyme:
"(Parson's sons and miller's cows, cost a lot and come to naught.)
So this Invocation of the Divine Figure is an enantiodromia from the identity with Buddha.
There is a great tension between the opposites and both are in us.
But we never recognise this fact and always see it " de !'autre cote de la riviere".
The white side is our side whichever side we happen to live on!
Every little town has the same psychology as nations in this respect, we have our bete noire and say with the old Pharisee: "God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are".
We don't want to know that we are the "other men", it is a frightfully awkward truth.
Such projections blind us entirely to the fact that we have a shadow, and when we suddenly get a dash of neurosis we feel as if our willing and reliable horse had jibbed without warning.
Patients often come to see me in a panic, they have had a peculiar idea and are sure it is mad.
Occasionally their fear is justified but far more often it is not.
I wish very much that psychic objectivity were recognised in the West.
Our text is full of this recognition.
The subjective image has its own objective existence, one can stand outside and worship it.
The reason of this whole procedure is to give its separate objective existence to everything subjective.
I hope I have made this clear, for recognising the objectivity of the psyche is typical for the eastern point of view, whereas we regard it as merely subjective.
I went for a walk one day with a young doctor friend, he was morose and silent, and hummed the tune of:
"(As I stand in the dark midnight hour, so lonely on my silent watch, I think of my distant love and wonder whether she remains faithful and well-disposed towards me.)
At last I said:
"Well, what is it, what is wrong with your love affairs? "
"How did you know? " he exclaimed in amazement.
He was just obsessed by the tune and in no way connected it with his secret preoccupations.
Apparently he wished to hum that tune, yet really he was suffering from being possessed by it.
We want to sleep when we go to bed, yet how often it won't let us, it takes every kind of form, a tune, an obsessing idea, a fear and so on ; but our will is powerless, it won't go.
It is really essential to know that we are not master in our own house or we are in a false position, deluded by our own logic.
We come now to section B of the second phase.
The text continues:
"Snap the fingers and thumb again, and worship with the above Mantra.
Then let the worshipper say:
(1) I seek absolution for the sins which I have committed, or attempted to commit, or in which I have taken pleasure when committed [by others) by body, speech, mind; proceeding from motives of lust, anger, sloth, stupidity during all the states of my previous existences time without beginning."
He seeks absolution for everything which remains in his karma.
His transformation has been threatened, a doubt has arisen as to whether it will succeed.

So he seeks to be absolved from his sins for they may wreck his purpose.
”I seek absolution for each and every sin so committed in the presence of my Guru and the Devaki’s of this holy Mandala:
(2) I will not commit them again [and then he should further say) :
(3) I [naming himself) do hereby seek refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha”.
Sangha is a word that we shall often meet with, it means community.
Originally it meant the community of the Buddhists, though later it came to mean the community in monasteries.
”From this moment until I attain the glorious state of Shri-ChakraMahasukha:”
The lord of the Mandala.
Now we come to the good resolutions, the 8 vows:
”(4) I vow to continue in the practice and observance of the rules and conditions imposed by Shri-Chakra-Sambhara:
(4) I will feel satisfaction and take delight in the merits acquired by laymen, noble Shravakas,” Shravakas are pupils of the Buddha.
”Pratyeka Buddhas,”
These are hermit Buddhas.
They have reached individual enlightenment but they take no interest in the good of the community, in mankind.
They have escaped from the wheel, they are no longer bound by the passions and have deserted the world altogether.
”Bodhisattvas and by all the highest perfect Buddhas:
(5) I will free those persons who yet remain unfreed:
(6) I will give courage to those who are dispirited:
(7) I will help those who have not attained complete Nirvana to gain the same:
(8) I will entreat those Buddhas of the ten directions who do not set the wheel of truth in motion to do so:
(9 } I will pray and entreat such of the Tathagatas who intend passing away into Nirvana not to pass away into Nirvana:”
He speaks here of those Buddhas who have reached perfection and are on the point of leaving the world and passing into Nirvana.
The Yogin promises to beg them to remain for the sake of the world.
(10) I will remain sincerely and earnestly in the “twofold path of ShriChakra-Sambhara.”
Why twofold path?
Because there is the subjective imprisoned ego and the objective Buddha.
The thesis is ”I am Buddha” but the Yogin is forced to recoil from this statement when he meets the anti-thesis which throws him back on his subjective prison and his sins.
So he is forced to walk on a twofold path.
”And by the merits of my practice of these resolutions may I and all sentient beings speedily attain the state of Shri-Chakra-Sambhara.”
The Yogin has not yet attained this state.
We come here to the end of the prayer for absolution and the good resolutions.
”The worshipper should repeat this clearly and distinctly three times, remembering at each time the deep meaning of the words which he is repeating.
Then he should think that the Divine Beings whom he has invoked are addressing him in reply, thus:
’Oh, son of noble descent, well have you adopted your abode. If you abide therein of a surety you will attain the highest stage.’ Then again worship the Devatas with the brief form of worship already given.”
We have now come to B. 3 in our synopsis, the answer of the Devatas.
The Yogin’s dialogue with the Devatas is anticipated, the dogma asserts itself. The reason for this is that the Yogin has reached an ecstatic condition, the created Buddha has become so objective and so living that he will answer, and perhaps in a terrifying way, a way that could endanger the dogma.
Dogma yokes the klesas but it kills many creative seeds.
The possibility of such a seed springing up here is foreseen and the Yogin is told the answer he must hear.
The aim of dogma is to provide a vessel in which the unconscious may be caught. The makers of dogma show a marvellous finesse, not entirely conscious, in providing a symbolic form into which the unconscious will be willing to flow so that it can be held in a frame.

If this frame is based on the real nature of the unconscious the latter is quite willing to flow into it.
This state of things may last for a long time, hundreds or even thousands of years.
But sooner or later the dogma gets too far from the nature of the unconscious, or the unconscious itself, in the course of the years, changes, and, in either case, psychic conflicts break out in the individual human being.
While the frame contains the unconscious, people must remain within the dogma, they have no choice.
So Tertullian could say in the second century: ”The soul is Christian”, it was perfectly true then.
And an Indian could say ”My soul is Buddha”, it was equally true for him.
But Buddhism has almost disappeared in India today, though you find it in Nepal on the borders of Tibet, in Tibet itself and in Ceylon.
Ceylon is very different to India, more like a South Sea island, and here Buddhism still flourishes in its dogmatic form.
In India it has given way to Hinduism, in which Buddha is merely the ninth, that is the last, incarnation or avatar of Vishnu.
The Hindus believe that the time of Buddha has passed and that a tenth avatar of Vishnu in the form of a white horse will soon appear.
As Buddha and his teaching are still recognised within the frame of the Hindu religion, you find traces of him everywhere; but his achievement, amazing consciousness and highest integrity are no longer to be found in India today, though Rishis and Yogins still make private efforts to reach its illumination.
One can hardly use the word Yogin, for it has come to be connected with swindle.
Yoga is mainly found in India now as a business proposition and woe to us when it reaches Europe.
I do not know why India was not able to keep Buddhism, but I think probably its present polytheistic religion is a better expression of the Indian soul today than the one perfect Buddha.
It is a great blessing for mankind when the soul is contained in the dogma and there is always a great deal of misery when this is not the case.
The only common recognised ground in such times is the conscious, and that is far too narrow.
People are then alone in the unconscious and are regarded as morbid if it shows on the surface.
Almost all neuroses arise from this difficulty.
Where there are no forms and ceremonies, rites in which they can express their souls, people become moody and caught in conflicts.
There is one tribe in Central Australia which spends two thirds of its time in religious ritual - and how much do we?
We look down on them as primitives, but their way is far more meaningful than ours.
We work for ourselves but they for the whole world.
An American Indian once told me that the white Americans had no idea of the risk they were running in interfering with the Pueblo ceremonies.
They would find out when it was too late, he said, for the Indians undertake their ceremonies in order that the sun may be able to rise.
The sun is their father and they call on him to walk over the heavens for the good of the whole world; and they firmly believe that if they were prevented the sun would no longer rise. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 27Jan1939, Pages 64-69.

Carl Jung on the Shri-Chakra-Sambhara (2015-03-26 11:20)

Lecture XIII 10th February, 1939
Today we begin the third phase of the Shri-Chakra-Sambhara, the Synthesis, which falls into two separate parts.
”The two-fold merit is acquired thus: Imagine arising from Shunyata the Mantra Yam.”
Shunyata is the Void, a positive emptiness.
It is Buddha as non-being, as nothingness.
This is a paradox which cannot be grasped by thought.
When his pupils questioned Buddha about Shunyata, he was silent or replied in a round about way.
There were things he did not want to speak of, he would not say what was best left unsaid.
We see in our text that through the Yogin’s effort a thought being rises from the cosmic void, the Mantra Yam.
A spoken mantra is a magic word.
The meaning of Yam is dark, there is no comment to the text, but it is a radical word meaning to support, to contain.
Yam seems to fit here, as a structure which arises from the Void and embraces the whole metaphysical Universe, a foundation for the world which is to be built.
”from which issues the Mandala of Air;” . . .
The Mandala of Air issues from Yam.
We meet the Mandalas of the four elements here, built one on the top of the other.
the Mantra Ram, evolving the mandala of Fire red in colour ”; . . .
Fire arises from Ram, which means enjoyment and union in the erotic sense.
So this Mantra seems to fit again remarkably well, the red fire, feeling with passion.
”the Mantra Vam, from which issues the Mandala of Water round of form and white in colour with a pot;”
Water is represented in a pot of round form with the idea of rounding it out.
The word Yam has the meaning of spitting out which is also suitable to water.
the Mantra Lam, from which evolves the Mandala of Earth square in shape and yellow in colour”,
The Mantra Lam evolves the earth as the fifth, with the idea of the quintessence.
Lam has the same meaning as Ram enjoyment, probably in the sexual, erotic sense.
The four square of the earth as opposed to the round of the water is typical of the East.
We find the four square of the earth in the centre of the Chinese cosmogonic scheme of the Yi King, yellow in colour.
It is interesting that in our text the Yogin reaches the earth last.
We usually find this order reversed, it begins with the earth and goes through water and fire to the air.
Heraclitus says that the hottest, driest souls are the noblest and that: ”It is death to the soul to become water.”
But here it is the earth which comes last out of Shunyata as the quinta essentia, apparently the goal of imagination is not spiritualisation but that the tangible earth should become real.
This is a marvellous contrast to the western point of view.
We find the square earth as the foundation for the Temple Buildings and also for another form of Tantrik Yoga, the Kundalini Yoga.
There it is the Muladhara Chakra, the root support. (See tracing p. 89 .
The earth is represented as a square with the elephant that carries the world.

Kundalini is a Hindu Tantrik Yoga belonging to Indian scholasticism.
We do not know its date, the text translated in A. Avalon's book on Kundalini Yoga: "Serpent Power " dates from the 16th century.
The Shri- Chakra-S ambhara Tantra is also Tantrik, but Tibetan and specifically Buddhist, though it contains as we have seen considerable remnants of the old Bon religion.
"Then from the Mantra Sum imagine Mount Meru the King of Mountains; the four fences of which are of crystal on the East, gold in the North, ruby in the West, and emerald on the South. It is quadrangular in shape with three tiers of squares thereon and eight turrets."
We find Mt. Meru, the king of mountains, the world mountain, standing on the foundation of the earth.
This mountain appears in Hindu mythology as a cosmic mountain which is in itself a Mandala.
It has four fences on its four sides made of four different minerals, the colours are indicated by this.
We found these colours already in the elements.
We also find four colours in the Bardo Thodol as the lights of the four wisdoms, they form four "light-paths" to Buddhahood or redemption.
These are clearly the four functions expressed as four paths of orientation.
The point of colour is important, for it is a fact that these functions have colours , they are often thought of, or rather felt, as colours, colours are feeling values.
Thinking in the West is opposed to feeling, it disturbs a thought if a feeling enters into it, but the East thinks more substantially, with the whole man.
We met this in our text as the radiant light of "Hum" out of the heart.
Easterners do not think abstractly with the head as we do but from the heart, they think and feel together.
It is absolutely necessary to grasp every psychic process with all the four functions, otherwise we only grasp a quarter of it.
The intellect just gives one orientation to it, its meaning, but we need the other functions to orient the whole man to it, to reach its totality.
We can speculate abstractly with the intellect, but we cannot reach the value without feeling.
We should prize the intellect but it is really of very little use in practical life without feeling.
Thinking may despise something but if it is valued by feeling it cannot be ignored.
Mark Twain wrote a book a out Christian Science, he showed it up as the most abject nonsense, as an outflowing of human stupidity.
But, he adds, it is nevertheless very important, because it is stupidity which rules mankind.
Very few people understand intelligent things whereas everybody understands stupid things; stupidity, therefore, is a far greater power than intelligence.
The four colours attributed to the functions are based on certain feeling values.
Feeling is red, this is connected with blood and fire, with passion and love which is supposed to be warm and glowing.
Sensation is green, this is connected with the earth and perceiving reality.
Thinking is white, or blue, cold like snow and Intuition is gold or yellow because it is felt to shine and radiate.
You can see this in an intuitive person's eyes, in the picture of Goethe by Stieler, for instance.
Such eyes do not look at things, they gleam towards them; they see no detail but rather a sort of magic atmosphere round things, an inner perception rather than an outer.
But if you are going to look down a microscope it is useless to gleam in its direction, you need sensation eyes for that, pincette eyes, which will pick out every detail.
We see from the description of the tiers of squares and turrets, that Mount Meru is conceived of as fortified town.
"Imagine all these to be placed, the one above the other in their order, and on the top of all a multicolored, four-headed Vajra."
This is an image which looks like a cross.
There is one printed on the covers of Evans-Wentz's books: "The Tibetan Book of the Dead" and "Secret Doctrine".
It consists of two dorjes (thunderbolts). (See tracing below).
The text continues:
"blue on the East, green on the North, red on the West, yellow on the South and in the Centre dark blue."

The white has turned to blue, a light blue, quite a different tone from the dark blue of the centre.
”On this dark blue ground again place the Mantra Pam.”
I could not trace the origin of the word ”Pam” or of ”Sum”.
”from which emanates an eight-petalled lotus. In the centre of the lotus again imagine a ring formed by the sixteen Sanskrit vowels, twice repeated, going from the right to the left.”
This ring turns left, apradakshina.
We have here the left hand movement to the dark side, when man turns to his feminine unconscious.
The text goes on to tell us that through meditation on this ring formed by the vowels, a lunar disc arises upon which the consonants must be imagined.
These go from left to right.
Here we have the pradakshina movement, this lunar disc turns towards the light, towards the favourable conscious side.
When you are speaking to someone of importance in India you must not stand in front of him but beside him.
And if you have to walk round him you must be careful to walk with your right shoulder towards him in order to show that you realise his importance.
Buddha himself drew attention to this.
It is not only impolite to walk round him in an anticlockwise direction but it is a bad omen.
The text goes on to say that the contemplation of this lunar disc produces the solar disc.
The sun as the symbol of highest consciousness.
The text continues:
. . . ” On the surface of which [the solar disc) again imagine the Mantras Om, A, Hum the essence of the ordinary physical body, speech and mind.”
Here again apparently it is the physical body which is the goal and is given the preference.
Speech and mind are usually thought of as being higher and more valuable but they are given here as mere appendages of the body.
”Above all these, meditate up on a Lotus Disc, the pure emblem of the female organ of the Female Deity, and above that on the Lunar Disc, emblem of the male seed of the Male Deity.”
We have here the Yoni and the Lingam.
We find in a footnote to the text:
”The Deities created by the mind, the Male according to the Tantrik Buddhists b eing the Symbol of Power and the Female of the mind which guides and uses it.”
The symbol for the mind here is not masculine as with us but feminine.
The Logos, God the Father, Hermes in Greece, to quote but a few instances, are all male.
You can see here, therefore, the kind of mind which is characteristic for the East.
It is a feminine mind, a creation of the unconscious and not of the conscious, a kind of unknown god.
The thing which approaches us from the unconscious is the mind in the East.
We think of mind as the highest development of the conscious, but that is in no way the eastern idea.
The text says:
. . . ” All these considered as one, . . . and forming one Mandala is the Consciousness which is eternal and Immutable [Dharma Dhatu-Jnana).”
The changeless Jnana, the principle of truth.
We find here the full union of the masculine conscious and the feminine unconscious mind.
In the Christian Gnosis, in the Acts of Thomas, the Holy Ghost is hailed as the mother, and it is also early alluded to as the Sophia.
There is a famous story of a love affair between Sophia and the first parent.
The granddaughter was head over heels in love with the ancient grandfather.
You find this story in Hans Leisegang’s book on the Gnosis.

”Concentrate on the above until it is vividly present to the mind’s eye”
As we have seen before, this is no spontaneous vision but the Lama works with the utmost concentration to build it up through magic, living and plastic, till it is completed.
”Then proceed as follows : - Within the magical protective fences, created as above by Mantras, imagine a grand temple [Vihara),” I showed you such a construction in the Lamaistic Mandala, (Sketch p . 38).
”quadrangular, with four entrances, built of various precious metals, on the summit of Mount Meru on each of the four sides. Imagine the walls to be five-fold and of five different colours in th e following order, black, white, yellow, red and green. These walls are surmounted by a yellow metal cornice ornamented with moons, to which are suspended bells with half and full loops of jangling metal bells waving in the wind.”
Such bells are a very common motif on Indian Temples.
You find a great many on the Temple of the Juggernaut at Puri in Orissa for instance.
The image of this Hindu god is dragged in his chariot by 4,000 men during his yearly festival.
People still throw themselves under the feet of these men.
There are bells on this Temple exactly like those described in our text, a bell hangs under the moon.
This theme is repeated all over the walls and eaves of the Temples.
Sometimes it is a moon, sometimes the moon has a face on it and sometimes the moon is replaced by a face.
This came from a growing consciousness that the bell represented the voice of God and a tendency to personify this.
We find the same idea in Schiller’s:
”Das Lied von der Glocke” (The Song of the Bell.)”
“Vivos voco. Mortuos plango. Fulgura frango.” (The bell speaks and calls the living to prayer, it mourns. the dead, and breaks the lightning.)
So it is quite logical that it should be represented by the face of a divine being.
. . . ” Each of the four entrances have pillared porticos, the pillars being surmounted by four-tiered cornices . These again are topped by the wheel of Dharma,” Dharma means the law.
You often find wheels represented on Buddhist buildings, for Buddha is said to have set the wheel of the law in motion by his first sermon near Benares.
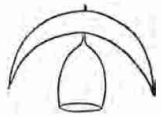
”figures of antelopes, umbrellas, banners, as also yak-tail fans with jewelled handles. The corbels supporting the cornice on the inner side are coloured blue on the east, green on the north, red on the west, and yellow on the south . The fourfold central wheel is surmounted by a dome in the form of a Stupa (Chorten) with four tiers at the base.”
We have already spoken of stupas (see Lecture V, p. 35).
Their form is rather like the Jesuit Baroque.
The form was originally derived from the Lingam.
You see this in the Chaityas, the rock temples in Ajanta, where they are Shiva Sanctuaries.
”Then imagine outside the Vihara there are the eight Great Cremation Grounds of the dead. (Burning Ghats.)”
You still find such Burning Ghats in India.
A Ghat is an open place used for some purpose.
In Benares there are Bathing Ghats, for instance.
I met Ghats already in Bombay, these were used for corpses but the corpses are not always burnt.
They are sometimes exposed for vultures, animals or demons to devour.
In our text eight Burning Ghats are to be found in the mandala outside the fire fence.
The cremation grounds are regarded as the place where all terrors and horrors originate.
They symbolise the suffering of the world.
” . . . Next imagine within the latter (Vihara) a circle within which again picture an eight-petalled lotus. Let the worshipper think of himself in the centre of the Lotus as being the Chief Devati Khorlo Demchog (Chakra Mahasukha) with four faces symbolizing the four Purified Elements, the four Boundless Wishes, the four Emancipations, and the four Acts. The face in front is blue, that on the left green, that at the back red and that on the right yellow. To symbolise that he does not change from the Dharma-dhatu-j nana, the body is of a blue colour.”



A blue body is a prerogative of Krishna as an Avatar of Vishnu.
Osiris n Egypt has the same prerogative.
It symbolises a divine body, a god.
”To show that all the three Lokas”
Kamaloka = sensual world, Rualoka = world of forms, Arupaloka = formless spiritual world.
”are under His vision and that He knows the Three Times each Face has three eyes.”
The Indian gods are often represented with three eyes .
We are told here that this is in order to see the Three Times, that is the past, present and future.
Each face has three eyes, and there are four faces of four different colours.
The fences were of four colours and also the four-headed Vajra, these were connected with the four elements and the points of the compass, the directions of space; and as we saw these four symbolised .the four functions.
In this case the coloured faces symbolise divine attributes.
The believer, when in the condition of Samadhi, is exalted to the world being, from whom the four qualities emanate.
We see these colours again and again, sometimes they are walls or protections.
I acquired an example of this in India, a picture veiled by five curtains from the eyes of the profane . Yellow, green, red, blue and a very dark blue, which is Almost black, as the Quinta essentia.
We find the same motif in the Stupas, the Believer has to walk round four walls before he reaches the magic image.
The figure in the centre of this picture is blue which shows that he is a god. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture XII,10th February, 1939, Pages 76-81

Carl Jung on Women and Mandalas (2015-03-28 13:18)

I should like to draw your attention again to the Invocation:
”Om, all-knowing one, . . . be round and round.”
This round motif should be kept clearly in your mind, for it is an exceedingly important symbol in the West as well as in the East.
It is especially women who produce such symbols in the West.
This is not the case in the East, the mandalas are made by men, the feminine has remained unconscious.
We find an exception to this rule in the matriarchal South of India.
There it is the special prerogative of women to draw the new mandalas.
I found a woman in a Temple at Madura, actually engaged in this work, and I then dis covered that it belongs to women’s mysteries.

They know the meaning of the whole and of the various pieces.
It was impossible for me to enquire, for the women were dumbfounded that a man should interfere in this realm.
There are a few matriarchal traces to be found all over India, but the Mahomedan influence, which entered with the invasion of the Moghuls, almost wiped them out.
I am not at all sure if the meaning of the southern mandalas is the same as that which we find in Kundalini Yoga which still has many adherents near Calcutta in Bengal.
As I said before the former are made by women and the latter by men. Kundalini Yoga is nearly related to Tibetan Yoga and is based on the ”round and round” of our text. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 70.

Carl Jung on Eastern Mandalas and Invocation (2015-03-28 16:51)

Lecture XI 3rd February, 1939
I should like to draw your attention again to the Invocation:
”Om, all-knowing one, . . . be round and round.”
This round motif should be kept clearly in your mind, for it is an exceedingly important symbol in the West as well as in the East.
It is especially women who produce such symbols in the West.
This is not the case in the East, the mandalas are made by men, the feminine has remained unconscious.
We find an exception to this rule in the matriarchal South of India.
There it is the special prerogative of women to draw the new mandalas.

They know the meaning of the whole and of the various pieces.
It was impossible for me to enquire, for the women were dumbfounded that a man should interfere in this realm.
There are a few matriarchal traces to be found all over India, but the Mahomedan influence, which entered with the invasion of the Moghuls, almost wiped them out.
I am not at all sure if the meaning of the southern mandalas is the same as that which we find in Kundalini Yoga which still has many adherents near Calcutta in Bengal.
As I said before the former are made by women and the latter by men. Kundalini Yoga is nearly related to Tibetan Yoga and is based on the ”round and round” of our text.
This is the ”rotundum” , or round element, as the medieval philosophers called it.
These philosophers rediscovered its value but it is of much more ancient origin, older than Plato, though his Timaeus is the ancient authority which is most often quoted by the alchemists.
The medieval texts are based on the Platonic idea of the round world ‘soul.
The microcosm is a small edition of the macrocosm, the anima mundi.
They both have the same round form.
Plato’s idea is identical with the eastern idea of the Atman or Purusha.

The person (purusha] not larger than a thumb who dwells in the heart of man and who compasses the earth on every side, extending beyond it by ten fingers breadth.
We see in our text that this ”person ”is not present from the beginning.
He has to be created by the Yogin, induced through the practise of Yoga.
So he is invoked to become ”round and round”.
This is a magic procedure, undertaken in order to produce the spiritual personality, it is implored to become round and whole.
Round as the cosmos, and the Yogin hopes through this analogy to become one with the anima mundi, with the universal Atman.
This is a basic idea which reappeared curiously enough in the Middle Ages, but it had little chance to develop.
The Church was very powerful and the alchemistic philosophers had to be constantly on their guard to avoid persecution.
But the idea really disappeared through the attitude of the philosophers themselves.
They turned more and more to matter, alchemy ceased to be philosophy and became chemistry per se, which opened the path to the scientific point of view.
You can see this division very clearly in Paracelsus (1493-1541).
The old and the new world lie side by side in his works.
Philosophy itself became entirely intellectual, no doctrine of redemption existed apart from the intellect.
Modern philosophers philosophise with the head alone about man, but the old philosophy came from the whole man.
In our text it is the whole human being whom the Yogin seeks to unite and transform through a magic process.
We are very much afraid of the word magic, it has a bad name, for its meaning has degenerated and it has a purely superstitious sound in our ears.
But magical was originally simply psychical, the ancients did not know of the existence of the psyche, so not being able to call anything psychic they used the word magic.
The mandala works as magic in the East, its effect is feared; the need of care is realised there, because it has a peculiar influence, one is not sure what it will do.
These images, which are apparently just geometrical and ornamental designs , can bring evil things to light which are feared in the East.
Mandalas are sometimes made with the express purpose of evil, to do people harm.
The European who practises Yoga does not know what he is doing.
It has a bad effect upon him, sooner or later he gets afraid and sometimes it even leads him over the edge into madness.
Such Europeans live in the East with a western mentality, they have no psychological understanding to help them, no possibility to live or digest what they are doing and they are quite unadapted to the eastern point of view.
One could point to celebrated examples.
The lack of logic is very annoying to a European, he is apt to say: ”Ridiculous!” and in that moment he gets caught.
The process is analogous to ”going black” in Africa, both catch you from underneath.
If you live in a primitive country like Africa, the primitive, who already exists in your psyche, wakes up and catches you by his immense suggestive force.
We are in a bad situation in the West for we are living as decapitated heads.
The intellect is indispensable in order to understand, but you must feel yourselves that our text is not just related to the head, it arises from whole man.
We will now return to the text, where we are still in the second phase.
We reached the answer of the Devas in the last lecture and spoke of the way the dogma endeavoured to anticipate the answer.
This is not always successful for the Devatis become so real that they may answer with something exceedingly undogmatic.
The Yogin, however, having learnt their answer by heart, usually succeeds in drowning anything else which they may say.

Athanasius reports much the same phenomena in his accounts of St. Anthony of Egypt and the other hermits of the desert.
Their loneliness produces the same animation of the psychic figures, in their case it is individual experience caused by their extreme isolation, whereas the East intentionally induces such figures to appear through meditation.
They happen to quite normal Europeans (not only to hermits) when very tired or lonely, and also in dangerous situations in primitive places; their surroundings suddenly become animated, they see visions or hear voices or both together.
But these are natural phenomena, which are not induced by religious exercises or dogmatised.
Athanasius reports that the devils appear in every form, they read the Bible or even sing hymns.
He says that they are most dangerous when they speak the truth because then the hermit is bewildered, he does now know whether God's angel or a devil is speaking to him.
Athanasius meets the danger in very much the same way as in our text, he gives Church prescriptions, rules of behaviour for the voices and visions.
We must keep the fact in mind that such exercises are not undertaken by the inhabitants of big towns but by Lamas in monasteries.
Or more likely by a Lama, connected with a monastery, but living in complete solitude in some hermitage in Tibet, between a mountain and a lake, 12,000 feet perhaps above the sea.
They spend years alone in such places, seeing no one but an occasional shepherd or peasant woman who come to bring them food.
Or they even shut themselves into their hermitages and allow their food to be put down outside.
When one remembers the conditions, the prescriptions become very comprehensible.
The text Continues:
"The worshipper should repeat the invocation Mantra Vajra-muh and say in his mind 'Pray come'."
This is again an invocation such as the previous one to the all-knowing One.
Muh means to deceive or blind; moha, delusion, blinding, comes from the same word.
A moha mantra is an imprinted form to induce and create delusion.
So this mantra "Vajra-muh" is a magic word used with the purpose of blinding the demons and protecting the Yogin from their interference.
"These constitute the thirteen means of acquiring merits. Then from the Bija Mantra Hum which lies in the heart"
A humming tone in the heart.
"emanate ten female Devatas (Dakini) who are the keepers of the doors. There are eight in the eight points of the compass and Khanda and Roho are above (zenith) and below (nadir)."
The text speaks here of the ten female Devatis that the Yogin has brought out of himself and placed round him, he unburdens himself of his psychic contents with these Devatas .
Those which he has brought forth earlier in the text have all been male.
As the Yogin is a man his conscious is masculine, so the male Devatas represent his conscious thoughts , religious, philosophical and personal.
He has already been freed from his masculine conscious, but to be really freed he must also externalize his feminine unconscious.
This necessity is dealt with here as the ten female Devatas who shine forth in the ten known directions of space, protecting the Yogin from ba ghosts and watching the doors while he meditates.
Khanda means multitude, and Roho means growth, uprising. Presumably the roots in nadir develop into the multitude in zenith.
"They are on the east, south, west, north, and then south-east, southwest, north-east and north-west. Then repeat a syllable (Pada) of the Mantra of the four-faced Devata and as each Pada is repeated make a snapping noise with the finger and thumb of the left hand. By these means let him think that he has expelled all mischievous Spirits. Then on a flood of light issuing from the 'Hum' in the heart proceed by stages to make the Vajra-bhumi (ground);"
The eternal basic foundation is made of the light which issues from the heart.

”next the wall, ceiling, ceiling curtain with fringes and net-work of arrows and outside all a fence of divine flames.”
We come here to the creation of the square room and the circle.
The fourfold mandala which is described is surrounded by flames.
You will remember that in the Lamaistic mandala which I showed you (see diagram, p. 38) this was the fire of desire, the concupiscentia.
Desire is transformed, reincarnated in the mandala.
When the Lama is in the mandala he has left desire behind; but should he go out by one of the gates of the functions he would again be at the mercy of the concupiscentia.
Inside the circle he wills, outside it he is willed.
Presumably the fire fence has also an apotropaic value, it is possible that it guards the Lama from disturbance and makes him inaccessible.
At any rate we find such a fire fence in most of these e astern mandalas.
”He should commence this work from within and proceed outward in their order.”
The work should proceed from within outwards and not vice versa, so that the Yogin is always in the centre of his mandala.
”Then form the fingers of the left hand into the threatening Mudra and point it at the ten directions.”
We have here the threat towards the ten directions.
”She who causes fall”, the concupiscentia, has attacked the Yogin through his senses.
In order to comb at this he himself has created ten female Devatas.
He draws attention to them here.
”making the snapping noise above mentioned, repeating solemnly the following Mantras thrice: (Foundation] Om medini-vajra bhava vajra-bandhana hum hum phat” . . . etc.
The editor translates this in a note:” Om earth-Vajra worldly Vajra-bondage, hum hum Phat (destroy]. ”
Hum is the eternal secret.
This mantra is connected with the snapping of the fingers above mentioned to expel all mischievous spirits.
It is said in order to prevent anything from injuring the heart, first to the ground, the foundation, and om is then repeated towards the wall, the ceiling, the cloth, the net-work and towards the fire fence.
This creates a protective circle and we come next to the creation of the diamond weapons.
”Having concentrated the mind on the above protective circles, create from the ’Hum’ in the heart Vaj ra-daggers with Vajra-hilts and Vajra clubs.
Placing these in the left and right hands of the innumerable attendants”
These innumerable attendants are all the figures which he has created and which stand round him.
”resembling himself let him centre his mind on the innumerable attendants filling the skies who summon the Spirits, including those powerful ones who guard the four directions of the world system. Those who are white take refuge and enter the path of righteousness. Think of those who are black as being transfixed with a dagger through the crown of their head.”
We have here the destruction of the micked and of avidya.
This is real Tibetan magic and is very important there.
They imagine a magic projectile for the purpose of sending it out.
They are magic realities, magic daggers , and they can be sent out to harm or even to kill, certain people.
In the spirit of our text such daggers would only be used against bad spirits, avidya ghosts, who must be destroyed.
The white spirits are already in the path of righteousness.
“Then orally recite: om: may the dispersal of the dense mass of darkness of delusion of Avidya be brought about; may all misery be destroyed, etc.
. . . At the same time imagine that they are pounded into dust by strokes from the Vajra-Hammer.”
The diamond hammer pounds all the agents of not-knowing [avidya] and unconsciousness to dust.
The East values consciousness very highly, it is the helpful light in the darkness, and the Easterner looks upon the darkness of unconsciousness as evil arising from avidya.

This teaching is already to be found in the sermons of Buddha.
While we are in avidya, we act like automatons, we have no idea what we are doing.
Buddha regarded this as absolutely unethical.
Avidya acts in the sense of the concupiscentia and involves us in suffering, illness and death.
While we remain in avidya we are forever rolling with the wheel of life, one with a creation which is nothing but suffering and by this we only increase the suffering that is in the world.
But through knowledge, through overcoming avidya, we reach a state where we no longer desire to roll with the wheel of events, with the wheel of the Sangsara, we want to stop the Sangsara, and by that to bring the whole of creation of an end.
. . . ”Concentrate the mind on the absolution of the sins of the mischievous Spirits and imagine that their Vijnana-principles have been transferred to the Realm of Buddha Akshobhya.”
The Yogin asks here to be delivered from the sins of the mischievous spirits.
Buddha Akshobhya is the Buddha of the East where the light of consciousness rises.
The principle of cognition must be got back from the demons through enlightenment.
”Then the attendants take up their position at the outer fence of Vajras.”
The attendants are his figures and are to make the diamond circle around him.
”Imagine that they guard the devotee so long as he does not attain Buddhahood. This is the method by means of which one guards against the possibility of being interrupted whilst seeking to acquire wisdom through meditation on the magical protective fences. This is acquiring of causal merits.”
A note to the text says that there are two kinds of merits.
Causal merits are ” those which accrue from virtuous acts”. J nan a is the other kind of merit, and is ”wisdom acquired with energy and through meditation.
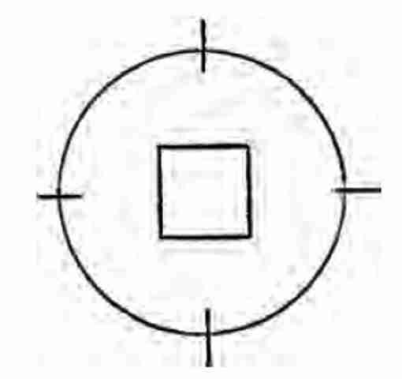
”We come next to the recognition that the Yogin is of the true nature of all things:
”Then regarding all outward and inward objects to be illusory like dreams say: Om, I am the pure which is the true nature of all things.”
Here is a piece of the superior wisdom of the East.
The Yogin realises that· all the Buddhas, Bodhisattvas and Devatas with which he has filled the heavens are Maya illusion just as the world itself is Maya. All this plurality is illusion.
The Yogin must first take endless trouble to build up this multiplicity of figures, and then it is demanded of him to admit that they are only his illusion, even the highest divine being is an illusion.
Only one thing is true: himself as the pure, as the Void.
This is the teaching of Shunyata, the pure origin and true nature of everything which exists.
The light of consciousness which issues from his own heart is the source of all things.
It is not that the things do not exist but that our perception of them is nothing but illusion.
”Again, meditating on Maya (sGyuma, that is the world) as being Shunyata (the Void) inconceivable by thought, say - Om: I am of the nature of the Void and Vajra knowledge. This is the acquiring of spiritual merits.”
The Lama states that he is of the nature of the Void, and he realises here that all his knowledge of the world has reached him through the filter of the psyche.
It has been ”psychised” so to speak, before it reaches him.
We cannot know anything which is beyond the reach of our own psyche: We speak of the Galactic systems, but what can we really say ab out them?
They are millions of years away from us.
We give them names and translate them by our psychic systems, they are interpreted by the psyche.
We make hypotheses about the stars or spirits.
We do not know what a spirit is any more than we understand matter.
We are really enclosed in a psychic world of images.
We label everything as physical or spiritual but the only reality is purely psychic.
If this were not so there would be no world because no one would know that it existed.

This realisation is the basic foundation of the eastern point of view, it is through this that the Easterner strives to free himself from the wheel of suffering. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture XI, Pages 70-75.

Carl Jung on Buddhist Mt. Meru and Western Alchemy (2015-03-29 06:14)



Lecture XIV 24th February, 1939
We reached the end of our long text in the last lecture and I expect you breathed a sigh of relief, but I must still inflict some explanations on you.
I will briefly recapitulate the course of the process.
It falls as you will remember into three parts, Thesis, Anti-thesis and Synthesis.
The Thesis establishes the Lama' s identity with Buddha.
He imagines his body as the Vajra or diamond body, Mahasukha, the Lord of the Mandala of Great Bliss including his female counterpart, his Shakti.
The analysis of the Lama's knowledge follows, he possesses every kind of knowledge and puts himself through an examination so to speak.
He has to be certain that his knowledge is complete on every side for it is only with full understanding that he can become the Buddha.
He assimilates the Buddha essence into himself.
He analyses the four functions for this purpose, personified by four Buddhas on the circle of the horizon at the four points of the compass.
These enable him to be wholly conscious, he can see and understand all his surroundings through these four guardians of the gates, these four functions.
We find these four in all religions in some form or other, in Islam they are the four angels of East, West, North and South.
Here they are the four indispensable constituents of the Buddha.
The Anti-thesis deals with everything which could attack the Thesis, the Lama defends himself against this attack.
His humanity asserts its reality; the concupiscentia and maya, which the illusion of the senses has produced, rise against him.
To defend himself against this attack, he invokes the "all-knowing one" to become round and round; that is, he appeals to the fundamental basic perfection or totality.

The prayer for the absolution of his sins follows and the very important projection of the ten female Devatas.
This is the first time that the Yogin deals with his feminine unconscious.
The projection takes place from the centre of the four square in the circle of the horizon, and the ten female Devatas go to the eight points of the compass, zenith and nadir.
This four square is the Vihara, the cloister, where the Lama is magically enclosed.
The creation of the vajra weapons follows for the annihilation of the wicked and the anti-thesis ends with the statement that the Lama is the Void [Shunyata); that is, Buddha who is being and non-being.
Shunyata is identical with Nirvana.
The Synthesis is a positive process, in which the long sequence which I spoke of takes place.
The basis of this sequence is Shunyata from which the four elements emerge through active imagination.
Mt. Meru is built on the elements, with its towered town and the four headed Vajra on top.
A series of technical representations follows, the lotus, moon and sun, the lotus with the yoni and the moon with the lingam.
The Lama sits in the Vihara, the magic circle, as Buddha.
The sequence of symbols is exceedingly complicated and I have not yet explained it.
It is a canon of the symbolic.
The mediaeval western counterpart of the process described in our text is to be found in alchemy.
The alchemical concept of chaos is the same as that of the Void [Shunyata). Both are the beginning, the first stage, the original condition where nothing is distinct.
Alchemy has nothing to do with the making of gold, though that is how the layman regards it.
This is a very comprehensible prejudice because of the language used by the alchemists themselves, they speak as if the making of gold were their aim.
When one reads their works attentively, however, one becomes more and more doubtful, for they search for gold in a metaphysical way and use extremely peculiar terms.
Moreover, we find passages where they directly tell us that their gold is not the ordinary gold.
When one studies the symbols which appear in alchemy closely, one finds a great deal of exceedingly interesting psychology which has never come to the daylight because only chemists have been interested in alchemy.
Their knowledge does not lie in the psychological field so the real meaning of alchemy has remained dark.
Alchemy began at latest in the first century A.D. and is really a curious process of initiation, a sort of practical Yoga.
Outwardly there is no resemblance between Yoga and alchemy, the procedure is entirely different.
Alchemy works as a sort of chemistry on actual matter and yet it is essentially Yoga and the symbols which arise in both are very similar.
Alchemy was a ” royal art”; ”our philosophy” the alchemists called it.
They took infinite pains with their work, they live d their philosophy and really experienced their visions.
Berthelot’s ”Collection des anciens Alchimistes grecs” contains some very early Greek texts, the ”Papyrus de Leide” [Leyden], for example.
Pseudo Democritus and Komarius are the earliest alchemists we know of.
All these texts also consist of practical advice to gold makers and forgers.
There is a great deal of gold forging in the near East, many Europeans who have visited the bazaars in Cairo know that to their cost!
Old alchemy consists in prescriptions for gold smelting and so-called chemistry, and you find philosophy sandwiched in between.
We should call such philosophy mysticism, for that is the modern way of explaining everything which we do not understand.

There are also some interesting texts of a religious nature to be found in the books of Dieterich and others.
One of the earlier and most interesting of the alchemists was Zosimos who lived in the third century A. D.
He wrote in the same style as Komarius and Pseudo Democritus, chemical prescriptions with Gnostic philosophy sandwiched in between.
His principal work consists of letters to Theosebie, his soror mystica (spiritual sister).
Women played a considerable part in alchemy, and worked at it themselves.
This is not the case in Indian Yoga, with the exception of Tantrism.
Alchemy begins with the concept of chaos, the condition of the beginning of the world.
Everything is mixed together and we find the most unlikely things, such as flames with drops of water existing between them.
There are fragments of minerals and planets and the signs of the Zodiac, the opposites related to or in conflict with each other, everything is in the wildest confusion.
There is an excellent representation of this in an old book called ”Le Temple des Muses”.
It is called ”Le Cahosou l’origine du monde”. (See sketch p. 93.)
This chaos is thought of as dark, as we find it described in Genesis:
”And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was up on the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved up on the face of the waters”
The alchemists frequently quote this last sentence.
The darkness of the beginning of the world must be impregnated by the Spirit of God.
The four rhizomata, that is the four elements, emerge from the chaos.
These are the four parts which the old Greek philosophers expressed in the tetramerein ten philosophian.
This has a double meaning for the prima materia is philosophical matter and philosophy also has to be divided into four parts.
This way of thinking is incomprehensible to us but we must think in the spirit of the Middle Ages in order to reach its meaning.
We must remember that the chemical elements of matter were still unknown, matter was a mystery and a marvel to medieval man, so everything which he did not understand was projected into it, everything that was unconscious.
The thing which we do not understand is the unconscious ruling of the psyche and our philosophy is concerned with that.
But the alchemists projected their philosophy into matter.
Real philosophy is an experience and their experience was projected into matter.
Matter was an unknown world to these old explorers, a wonderland in which the whole unconscious was projected.
So they divided matter into the four elements and philosophy into four parts.
This quartering was described as a series of four colours, first the nigredo, (darkness), then the albedo (light], then the citrinitas (yellow] and then a curious colour usually given by the Greek word ios or iosis, to become.
It is questionable what colour this is.
Berthelot sometimes translates it as violet.
The colours indicate the four directions and are the qualities of the four functions, of consciousness.
It is really a case of dividing up the unconscious into four recognisable functions, a differentiating of the chaos into a world where you can sense, think, feel and have intuitions; and from this totality Mt. Meru, the world mountain, emerges.
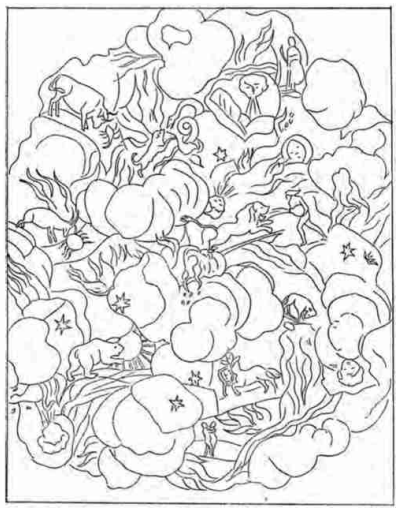
The old idea of chaos was that it held everything in potentia including man.
This potential man was not the biological man but the philosophical man, a peculiar being, which is also sometimes called anima.
This man was not included in any of the four elements, he was in the materia but was described as ethereal matter.
A subtle body, breath or smoke resembling, which can also be correctly described as anima.



Anima is the feminine of animus, which is identical with the Greek word anemos which means wind or breath.
You find this concept running through alchemy and it is everywhere on earth in some form or other, even in the idea of haunted houses and ghosts.
It is something which is not immaterial but made of exceedingly refined subtle material, and it is from this that the homo philosophicus comes.
This primal or potential being is also often called the philosophical egg, and the alchemists divide this egg into four natures or elements.
In the chaos the four are all together as a unity: in the Tetrameria this unity is separated into four; and afterwards it becomes one again; but the second unity is the completed and perfected form of the potential unity in the chaos.
The separation of the elements is also identified with the four seasons of the year.
This establishes a connection between the homo philosophicus and time.
We find the same idea in India, Prajapati is connected with the year.
The Church's year follows the course of Christ's life, which 'symbolises the course of time.
We meet this same idea with the Neo-Platonists in Chronos or Aion, creative time.
Proclus said: "Always where there is creation there is also time."
Bergson's "dunce creatrice" springs from this idea.
Bergson's philosophy, which is called intuitive philosophy, is entirely intellectual except for this one intuition, and that belongs to Proclus.
The separation into four is finally brought to an end by the Conjunctio.
Mt. Meru, the world mountain, in our text is the beginning of the perfected unity.
It was a unity in the Void, we saw the course of its division into four and how everything was united again in Mt. Meru.
An old alchemist said that this perfected unity was accomplished through moral philosophy.
That is medieval language, in modern language it is accomplished by a psychological procedure, the four are separated, understood and united again.
In this connection I must mention an old author of the 16th century, a philosophical doctor, Dorneus, he was a sort of colleague of mine!

He said: ”Do you know that the heaven and the earth first of all were one, and that then through the art of the Creator they were divided into four so that you and all else could be created.”
This is an interesting intuition of the quartering which is an age-old idea, perhaps even megalithic.
An Englishman, Mr. Layard, whom I know personally, lived for some time on Malekula, in the New Hebrides.
The people there are still living in megalithic times, they have a stone cult and dolmens.
Mr. Layard found out some very interesting things.
The people of Malekula have a symbolic quartering in their initiation ceremonies.
We find exactly the same idea in alchemy, in the mortification, the quartering, of the unity in the chaos.
There are some interesting pictures in an old alchemical book, Salomon Trissmosin: Aurem Vellus.
One of them, in the Splendor Solis, shows the homo philosophicus with his four limbs cut off. [See tracing, p. 95).
We find the same theme in many alchemical texts, for instance: ”Matrem mortifica, manus ejus et pedes abs cindens,” (Mortify your mother and cut off her hands and feet].

This is exactly what is done in Malekula today, symbolically of course, not actually.
The idea behind all this is the sacrifice of the purely natural man, the sacrifice of primordial nature.
The Kavirondos say that people only become human beings through initiation, before that they are animals.
This is the sacrifice of avidya, of not knowing, of being a purely instinctive creature.
This instinctive unity is divided into four and is reunited.
This second unity is Mt. Meru.
The theme of the mountain plays an important role in alchemy.
In the allegory of the Mons Mambracus a wonderful plant grows on its summit.
It is called lunaria or lunatica, and lollium.
The latter is a real plant but the former cannot be traced, it is a phantasy plant.
The idea is that the drink made from this plant, which must be sought for on the highest peak, causes intoxication.
But it is also the panacea which is often mentioned as indispensable to alchemy in order to transform the originally imperfect prima materia and bring it over into the perfect condition.
The indispensable herb, the universal remedy, is sometimes expressed differently, Komarius speaks of it as a miraculous stone to be found on the highest peak.
In later alchemy we sometimes find the panacea represented by a King who stands on a silver mountain from which golden streams pour down.
This is a direct analogy to Mt. Meru, from which golden streams also flow down and which is surrounded by the Jambrinada River that is full of gold.

We find birds mentioned in alchemy in connection with the mountain, they fly to or live on the summits of the mountain.
The mountain corresponds to the highest point in the retort where the sublimated steam rises from the boiling materia.
There is a chapter in a book of Michael Maier's, for instance, where the emblem at the top of the page is a vulture, sitting on the top of a mountain and saying: "I am black, white, yellow and red."
He is four coloured, an exact parallel to our four-headed Vajra.
The symbolism used in these alchemical texts is very bewildering and when one studies it closely one realises that the thinking of these medieval explorers of nature was still very much under the influence of the language of the Fathers of the Church.
One must, therefore, carefully examine the meaning attributed to the symbols by the Church.
The early Fathers of the Church speak of the mountain as a symbol for Christ.
St. Ambrose speaks of Christ as the "mons exiguus et magnus," (a very small mountain and at the same time a big one.) and St. Augustine as " mons magnus ex lapide parva " (the large mountain which came out of a small stone).
This curious idea refers to a passage in the book of Daniel where a stone was cut out of the mountain without hands and smote the feet of the great image, which were of iron and clay, and broke them to pieces.
The stone then became a great mountain which filled the whole earth.
This stone was connected with Christ and he is also called the corner stone.
St. Paul speaks of:
"Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth into an holy temple in the Lord."
So Christ is the small stone out of which the whole mountain grows and, of course, Mary is also the mountain because the small stone comes out of her. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 24Feb1939, Pages 90-96.

Carl Jung and Medieval parallels to Mount Meru. (2015-03-29 15:07)

Lecture XV 3rd March, 1939
We were speaking last time of the medieval parallel to the Mount Meru sequence of symbols.

I will give you a chart to make it clearer:
SYMBOL SEQUENCE
Shri-Chakra-Sambhara Tantra Alchemy
I. Shunyata, Void. (Avidya) I. Chaos
II. Four Elements II. Tetrameria
III. Mount Meru III. Mons
IV. City IV. Civitas castrum
V. Four-headed Vajra, Four colors V. Quaternitas
VI. Lotus VI. Flos auri
VII. Moon VII. Luna
VIII. Sun VIII. Sol
IX. Lotus with Yoni IX. Al-baida (Beya)
X. Moon with Lingam X. Conjunctio
XI. Vihara XI. Vas Hermetis
XII. Mahasukha XII. Lapis, Hermaphroditus, Homunculus
I. Shunyata, the Void, corresponds to chaos, the original condition.
It has the form of a moist sphere in which the primordial elements are contained in a mixed condition.
II. The four elements are brought forth from Shunyata, and correspondingly from the primal water of the chaos.
We still find this done symbolically in the Roman Catholic Church, the priest divides the water on Easter Eve with the sign of the cross.
This is to divide it into the four elements so that the water should possess the ability to give rebirth.
Medieval philosophy expresses the same idea by saying that the prima materia must be divided into four so as to give it the strength to b ear the new world.
III. In the Shri-Chakra- Sambhara Tantra this is Mount Meru and in alchemy it is the mons, (mountain) on which the panacea, the herb, or the philosopher's stone is to be found.
The names given to this herb, lunatica, lunaria, etc., show that it is connected with the head.
It is a poison and a remedy.
This is the psychological mystery of alchemy.
The mountain as we saw is identified by the Fathers of the Church with Christ and also with his mother Mary.
We spoke also of the stone described in the book of Daniel, the stone which was cut out without hands and became a great mountain which filled the whole earth.
The mediaeval philosophers speak of the lapis angularis, and of the lapis exilis, the latter means the small insignificant stone.
And as we saw Christ is the corner stone which groweth into an holy Temple "and the small insignificant stone that became the great mountain and which came out of the mountain Mary.
It is very necessary in psychology to return to these old examples or we cannot understand.
We must know how the human psyche came into being for in the unconscious the old ways are always trodden again.
This becomes quite clear if you think of a science such as anatomy, it is impossible to understand anatomy unless we study the history of its biological development.
We find all the ancient forms of the human psyche in dreams and in such texts as the Shri-Chakra-Sambhara Tantra.
The unconscious comes into action through the attitude of the conscious in active imagination.
The official example of Yoga in the West is the exercitia spiritualia of St. Ignatius of Loyola.
We will speak of these in the next Semester.
Alchemy is not interesting to chemists for they are not interested in psychology.
The real meaning of alchemy was carefully veiled for in those days it was dangerous to be concerned with the Spirit outside the dogma of the church.

When one studies the inside of these mysteries, and comes to understand them, one finds their great secrets lying hidden from the world, just as they are hidden in the Tibetan texts.
These also were kept entirely secret.
It is only within the last few years that a few Lamas have become interested in giving their texts to the world.
This is largely due to Sir John Woodroffe and to the American Evans Wentz who succeeded in getting in touch with such people, and in interesting them in the translation and publication of some of their texts.
The mountain is not only identified with Christ and Mary but also with the Holy Ghost.
Divinitas sancti spiritus has a peculiar relation to Mary, for the Sapientia Dei or Sophia was identified by the early Church with Mary.
So the mons is identical with three divine figures.
Such things become quite comprehensible when we think of the medieval point of view.
They thought of the world as coming out of the four elements and they personified the world-being by a god.
We also personify our mountains, think of the Jungfrau for instance.
III. We now come to the city which lies on Mt. Meru.
The parallel in alchemistic philosophy is the civitas castrum, the fortified city.
A city is definitely a feminine symbol and we come to Mary again.
She is called the acies castrorum, the castellum, the civitas or the gazophylacium.
The last means the house where the treasure is kept and is also called the domus thesauraria.
These expressions all originate with the Fathers of the Church, but the alchemists use them in connection with the veritas and sapientia, truth and wisdom.
G. Dorneus speaks of the veritas as an impregnable castle, a citadel which cannot be stormed, it contains the treasure which is taken away after death.
The idea is that the treasure is something which is ordained to eternal life, and apparently after death it goes up to the skies and leads a post mortem existence.
IV. We come now to the four-headed Vajra.
Vajra as you know means diamond, the symbol for great durability.
The Sanskrit word Vajra could always be translated as eternal, Vajra weapons would be the eternal weapons and so on. ·
So the treasure in the citadel is an eternal treasure.
We find the same idea as the four-headed Vajra in an alchemistic text by G. Dorneus in the four castles of the sapientia.
Crystal, silver, diamond and the fourth is ”something which does not fall under the senses”, it cannot be apprehended by them, it cannot be understood.
This is very remarkable for this is also the case with the functions.
We can understand thinking, feeling and sensation but intuition is another thing.
We do not know how we arrive at an intuition, it is perception by way of the unconscious.
It is very interesting that the old Gnostics and alchemists already knew that the fourth could not be understood.
”Castrum in quose continet philosophicus amor”. (The castle in which the philosophicus amor lives.)
The philosophicus amor is the love of philosophy, the striving after truth, the search for the transformation of matter.
Alchemical philosophy is an instrument and a way to the inner transformation of man, a problem which is practically unknown today.
We find the same idea in the Heavenly Jerusalem of the Book of Revelation, that is a real ”castrum”, plentifully decked with the imagination of the author.

Alchemy is also occupied with the theme of decoration, the philosopher's gold and the wonderful glass of the vitrum aureum, made from the smelting of the elements, of crystal, diamond and gold, the idea of the most precious thing.
Pica della Mirandola, 1463-1494, wrote a book about phantasy and said that the soul lived in a royal castle.
So it is not astonishing that Christ, who contains all Christian souls, should be described as a protecting citadel.
Such an idea is found very early in the Christian Church and also among the heretics, mainly the Gnostics.
Hippolytus, who lived in the second century, spoke of the wall and fortress in which the inner man lived.
Gnosticism was savagely persecuted by the Church, so its texts are fragmentary and rare.
There is the Codex Brucianus, a Coptic text at the Bodleian Library in Oxford and fortunately several other Gnostic and Manichean texts have been found in Egypt recently.
The Fathers of the Church could never quote the Gnostics, but here and there they could not resist mentioning their ideas but in a peculiar form and very indirectly.
We find the idea of the Monogenes in the Codex Brucianus: "who dwelleth in the Monad as in a metropolis".
The Monogenes is self-generated, none can s ay where he came from. St. John calls the Monogenes the Logos, the word, the Son of God.
He is the primal being, the Purusha.
As we have seen, the town containing a treasure is a very general idea.
The Monogenes is based on four.
We find the same idea in the four-headed Vajra of our text.
The latter has four colours and this theme also plays an important role in alchemy.
The alchemists speak of the cauda pavonis, the peacock's tail, they regard it in the light of a vision, a treasure, and say that when such colours appear in the retort the goal is not far off.
Heraclitus mentions black, white, red and yellow as the elements and the Greek painters used these four colours as a foundation, from which they mixed their other colours.
These colours appear again and again till late in the Middle Ages.
The four colours represent the fact that the four-headed Vajra consists of four parts.
The original unity was divided in four, and was hatched into a unity again but it is a unity in which the four are still visible.
We find this idea again and again in alchemy.
There is a letter attributed traditionally to Aristotle (a Pseudo Aristotle naturally) addressed to Alexander the Great in which he says:
"Divide lapidem tuum in quattuor elementa et conjunge in unum." (Divide thy stone into four and unite it into one.)
The idea of the quaternity itself was holy to the alchemists, and the medieval texts are full of this idea.
As I have already mentioned, we find it in the Codex Brucianus where the Monogenes is thought of as standing upon a platform, supported by four pillars.
This is the Gnostic conception of Christ on the Tetramorphus, the four evangelists.
We find the quaternity everywhere, the four rivers of paradise, the Rex Gloriae with the four evangelists , etc. etc. V ery beautiful western mandalas exist which are divided into four, eight, sixteen or thirty-two parts.
Pythagoras in the 6th century B.C. made the tetraktys, the quaternity, the basis of his teaching.
It is the number of the living one, the foundation of all life.
In Barbelo Gnosticism the first creature was Metra or the body of the mother in the chaos.
This was impregnated by the Pneuma and bore the four Aeons or eternal creatures, that is, the four elements.
In another Gnosis the Tetras descended to man and revealed that both God and man are a quaternity.
The Tetras came in a female form and indicated all the parts of the body.

This idea appears in the Middle Ages as the secret square of the philosophers.
It is also referred to as ”our pelican” and a certain kind of alchemical retort, in which a circulating distillation takes place, is called a pelican.
The pelican of course is a symbol for Christ.
It is always represented with its beak smiting its breast in order to feed its young.
It has a red spot on the beak which is the origin of the idea that it uses its own blood for this purpose.
Pelicanus noster means that our redeemer gives his blood to save us.
The medieval concept of squaring the circle is well known.
I. Chaos is the circle and II.
the division into four elements is the squaring of the circle.
This is done by a mathematical mystery, it is a mystic representation of the four elements and their union; the point in the middle is the mediator, quinta essentia, or pelicanus noster.
So the mediator is said to be he who brings about the squaring of the circle, he represents the mystery and its solution.
It is impossible to mention even a fraction of the widespread literature and art relating to the squaring of the circle.
The Rose Window, which is to be found in so many Churches and Cathedrals, is known to you all.
There is often a Rex Gloriae in the centre of such a window and it usually has 8,16 or more divisions.
We reach VI, the Lotus, with the rose symbolism.
The rose played a large role in the Middle Ages, it is the typical abstract symbol for the love of Dante in the Divine Comedy.
We find Mary as the rosa mystica in the Litany of Loretta.
The motif of the jewel in the lotus is very frequent in the East.
You will remember the mantra: ”Om mani padme hum”, the jewel i n the Lotus.
The jewel in the rose has exactly the same meaning.
Christ is spoken of as being born or hidden in a rose, or as a sea bird resting in a flower of the sea.
This is a direct analogy to Buddha appearing in the Lotus in the Amitabha Land with geese and swans about him.
The idea of the flower plays an important role in medieval alchemy.
It is synonymous with the materia and the aqua permanens from which the philosopher’s stone is made.
It is also called the world flower, the flower of the sun or the golden flower, and is als o compared with Christ as the philosopher’s stone.
You find the same idea in the blossoming of Aaron’s rod.’:
In the language of the Fathers of the Church the mystical rose is the flesh of Christ, the bud which holds the divine spirit as in a vase.
We come here to the idea of the containing vessel.
The steam which rises in the retort is thought of as the flowering of matter, steam is the transformation of the corporeal into the incorporeal, it represents the spirit.
The retort itself encloses the spirit, and it must be hermetically sealed so that the spirit does not vanish.
So the flower rising in the. retort represents the strength of the miraculous water, the psyche or spirit.
Komarius teaches Cleopatra that the dead who stay in Hades [that is in chaos) are transformed into Spring flowers by the miraculous dew.
This is the idea of the living elements in chaos or Shunyata waking and uniting through being contained in the lotus.
The mystical rose, like the lotus in India, grows for the salvation of man.
Dante saw the mystical rose as the last vision in the Paradiso, where it embraced the whole Heavens.
But we find the chief parallel to the lotus in the hymnology of Mary, where she is called the flower of Heaven, the noble rose of Heaven, the rose without thorn; she is also greeted as the sweet rose, etc.
This is exactly the same idea as that of the lotus in India.
Mary is the bud which contains the becoming being that is undergoing transformation. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 3Mar1939, Pages 97-101.

Carl Jung on Phantasying in relation to Yoga Methods: East and West. (2015-03-29 17:37)

Lecture IV 24th May, 1935
Last time I spoke of phantasying in relation to the different methods of Yoga in the East and in the West.
We will continue this theme today, especially in its psychological aspect of active phantasying.
It is usually older and riper people who have these phantasies, younger people also have phantasies, but of a different kind, we must realise that there are phantasies and phantasies.
The method of actual phantasying is seldom advisable for young people as it tends to hinder them in their task of getting into reality, and the young need actual experience.
There are exceptions, but only in neurotic and pathological cases should you employ this method with young people.
It is very inadvisable to make light use of these things, I warn everyone against it.
The method is indicated for older people but it is usually harder for them to apply.

I will give you a practical example of a normal woman, neither pathological nor neurotic.
She was an American, 55 years of age, highly educated in the n tural sciences, and the head of a large college in America.
She came to me after the war saying that she had come not because I was a doctor but because I was a psychologist.
She was not ill but disorientated.
Naturally her profession brought her into contact with the young generation and she could not understand the post war phenomena, the vogue of sexual freedom.
The sudden release from the sexual taboo was bewildering to her; older people had not foreseen this and it disorientated many of them completely, particularly the well brought up and puritanical element in America.
She had been educated in such a respectable college that the women students never even saw a male corpse, all their studies being pursued on female corpses!
With this innocent outlook she was suddenly confronted with a state of things the description of which I will spare you, read Lindsay's book if you want to know about it.
Things went, of course, much too far.
These cases of the sudden collapse of a taboo have parallels among the primitives; an eclipse of the sun or moon causes a panic which dissolves the taboo and results in wild promiscuity.
The same thing happened in the Panic caused by the Messina earthquake.
At the eleventh hour the life instinct asserts itself in order to procreate so that human life shall not be exterminated.
Post war psychology was a consequence of the panic of the war with results similar to those of the Messina earthquake.
This lady in her profession had many of these cases to handle and she became so confused that she eventually dropped the whole thing and took a ship to Europe in order to ask me what it was all about.
She had noticed, that is, not consciously but somewhere she had a dim idea, that these things are infectious and that she herself had not wholly escaped.
But with a lady of her age and upbringing it is unthinkable that she should do anything practical about it and her fear made her react negatively to the whole thing and to the young people who brought her these problems.
The result was a growing condition of inferiority and a feeling that she was not up to her work.
Everybody in her position and with her up-bringing would have reacted in much the same way.
What she saw was the coming up of the inferior man; the outburst of crime, detective stories, gangsters, the popularity of the criminal film, are all part of the same thing.
She did not realise that her situation could also be found among the primitives because she thought the white man stood miles above and beyond them.
The case would have been simpler had the patient been younger because then she would not have been so adapted in her life.
In dealing with older people it is more difficult to make them see that what they hate so much is happening also in them, for this is just what they are terrified of.
At their age these things make nonsense, they cannot live them, so they get into a wild panic.
It is in no way a situation to be taken lightly, if you ever get into a similar one you will realise how tragic it is.
The age of the body is something we often swindle ourselves about, but this swindle does not help the psyche.
You cannot go back to the psychology of forty years ago.
At an age which starts at about 45 the feeling makes itself felt which is expressed in the French bon mot: "Combien je regrette rna jambe bien faite, et le temps perdu".
This lady had not married for many excellent reasons.

Her very first dreams showed that she had many phantasies but she could not reach them because the fear of regression stood between.
The task was not to push her back into instinctive psychology, that is the task of young people, but for people who have lived most of their life and have found an adaption, it makes no sense at all to go back into these adventures with bodies quite unsuited to them.
The task in these cases is to look for the meaning, for there is a meaning in both love and sex, and in every instinctive urge.
The use of most of the instincts is obvious, sex, hunger, etc. but the purpose is not the meaning, that is something quite different.
The Yucca moth comes to maturity just as the Yucca bud opens.
Its father and mother are dead long before it comes out of the egg, yet it knows exactly what to do.
It collects pollen, rolls it into a ball, puts it on its thorax, and pushes it down so that the fruit of the Yucca plant is fertilized.
Then it lays fifty eggs.
If there were more, the plant would be destroyed, and then their means of subsistence would be gone.
Now who told the moth how many eggs to lay?
The moth is born with pictures, prepared in its system; the sun goes down and it knows that now it is the time to do this or that.
The instinct holds two aspects, the first is dynamic, pushing into action, but if there were only just action then eggs could be laid in any plant, but it must be just the Yucca, so the moth has an image of that in itself in order to know what it should do.
These images are equal in importance to the action itself.
This system of images is also born in human beings, it is the archetypes, the potential force in man, but it only comes to the surface when the moment for it is ripe, then the archetype functions as an urge, like an instinct.
In the collective unconscious the archetypes and the instincts are one and the same thing.
The English biologist Rivers refers to this as the ”all or none reaction”, it goes right through or it does not start.
The archetypal or image side seldom comes to the surface in young people, they take instinct for granted, and never stop to think what the meaning of it is, it just functions naturally.
But when the instinct becomes questionable, as always happens when you get older, you begin to wonder what it all means; the split has already appeared and the images are liberated.
The active side of the instinct has become less demanding so the side of the images is dominating, it is as if the moth stopped and wondered ” Why do I do this”, as if it would like to free itself from blindly following its instinct and look at the pictures instead.
This leads to philosophic questions which seem absurd to people who are actively living their instincts.
Hesitation only comes when the instinct begins to weaken.
The same instinct that moved you at the age of fifteen may be moving you again when much older and yet there is something showing that the whole process which is happening in the unconscious is different, the images are becoming liberated from the active instinct.
When this process has a great deal of intensity, but remains in the unconscious, then these ideas get a strong hold in the unconscious which dynamically influences the conscious, and a conflict ensues with neurotic complications.
Sexual perversions, for instance, often arise from this source, and this explains sudden abnormalities which appear in quite normal people.
They are not as a rule put into action but result in a perversion of phantasy.

How often do we hear of a respectable, elderly man who suddenly develops a penchant for the kitchen staff.
In such cases it is necessary to find the split in the instinct and to make it conscious, as it were to make the Yucca moth conscious of what it has done, and we must keep in mind that the possible explanation is that the moth did not act from biological, but from mythological reasons.
Experience with the primitives teaches us this.
The Great Spirit came to an Indian chief of forty in a dream and said to him:
”Now you will be a woman, you will eat with the women, sit with the women, and dress like a woman”.
He did so next day and of course he became taboo, mana, regarded as a wizard, and so on.
An image had detached itself from his natural instinct which turned him right round, but it does not usually work so plastically or so quickly.
The natives who get the big dreams have lost their lust for fighting, their interest is now in the images instead of being in life itself.
I will give you an example.
It concerns a man of fifty who found himself in the unpleasant situation of having to be a Don Juan.
He had to run after women, who in turn ran after him, and he had to envy every young couple he saw in the street, thinking that they had what he was seeking.
I asked him why on earth he had to do this and he replied ”They have a secret and I must discover it.”
It turned out that he had a negative mother complex.
She was a remarkable woman, too strong for his father, and so of course she had phantasies of other men, which she repressed, and because of this repression the interest naturally went over on to the only son. She constantly told him how he should feel, and treated him as if his feelings were hers.
Men whose mothers have done this to them get sentimental ideas, they never think that a man is just moved by the sexual instinct, but that he is moved by a noble motive, the girl might be hungry, or have some secret sorrow.
He made several girls very unhappy, and then they really were sad for his sadism had made them so, but he went on believing in his good intentions .
He was continually seeking for something and became like Bernhard Shaw’s figure in ”Man and Superman”.
His mother had poisoned his feelings with her criticism and constant guidance. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture IV 24 May 1935, Pages 212-214.

Carl Jung on Phantasy and the Solar Plexus (2015-03-30 09:10)

Lecture XI 12th July, 1935
I left off last time with the theme of the solar plexus.
This time I have brought a Lamaistic Mandala to show you, as an analogy to our vision: it is complicated and contains many qualities.
The East understands active phantasying and its inner meaning far better than we do.
It has had many centuries of experience, so this picture is highly differentiated.
In the centre there is a square, the cloister, which has four doors.
You will remember that there was a spring of water in the middle of the cloister in our patient's phantasy.
Here we find a cross in which there is a remarkable drawing of the thunderbolt diamond, which depicts magic power.
This mandala is one of the few that contains no human figures; Shiva and his Shakti, his eternal feminine, are generally represented, or some other figure such a s a Buddha; the centre usually holds many such figures.

These mandalas are plastically conceived and are built up on a flat surface or table, especially in Thibet.
Then they are covered by a ”stupa” which is the Indian word for pagoda.
The chief development of the stupas took place in Buddhism.
The mandalas were square, 6-fold, 8-fold, or sometimes round, and they were covered with stupas, like umbrellas.
Sometimes there are as many as fourteen stories and the temple bells are hung round the eaves of the stupas.
The holy relic is buried in the innermost mandala.
The same idea is found in the Maya culture, in the temple of the warriors.
When this temple was excavated it was discovered to be on the site of one that was still older.
A limestone vase was found containing the most beautiful mandala that can be imagined, made of a great number of turquoises.
In m any other mandalas you find the same idea.
These western phantasies hint at things which are regarded as of the utmost importance in the East.
The golden flower is the centre of Chinese mandalas as the lotus or ”Padma” in India and Thibet.
I will read you some quotations from the book of ”The Secret of the Golden Flower”:
”The Golden Flower is the Light. What colour has the light?
One uses the Golden Flower a s an image.
It is the true power of the transcendent Great ’One’.
The phrase, ’The lead of the water-region has but one taste’, refers to it.”
Here the writer speaks of the substance of which the Golden Flower is made, which is found in the water region, the bladder, in Svadhisthana.
This is the localization in the psyche which is made entirely of animal substance, the spirit of weight which imprisons us and is described as the most inferior thing.
This is the heaviness which Nietzsche tried to dance away.
He says in ”Zarathustra” that the stone is thrown high indeed, but it must fall, and on the thrower.
This is the lead of the water region, it has one meaning, that the Golden Flower grows out of it.
This is the primeval substance out of which the Lapis, the Golden Flower, or the philosophers’ gold is made.
These come from the very commonest things.
The old alchemist said ”If the huckster in the market knew that the things which he sells so cheap are the materials from which the philosopher’s gold is made he would raise their price”, but he does not go on to tell us how to extract the gold.
We are told that it is to be found in old privies and manure heaps, but that ”Many have worked on manure heaps and have found – nothing”.
”In the Book of Changes it is said: Heaven created water through the One. That is the true power of the Great One. If a man attains this One he becomes alive; if he misses it he dies. But even if a man lives in the power [air, prana) he does not see the power [air), just as Fishes live in water but do not see the water.”
This is the Tao in Chinese philosophy, it is always timeless, and is the beginning and the end. Out of Tao comes water - that is the water region.
”A man dies when he has no life-air, just as the fishes are destroyed when deprived of water.
Therefore the adepts have taught the people to hold fast to the primal and to guard the One; it is the circular course of the Light and the protection of the centre.”
Light is symbolic for consciousness; in doing the ”circumambulatio” you must follow the direction of light, if you go the other way it is black magic.
” If one guards this true power, one can prolong the span of life, and can then apply the methods of creating an immortal body by 'melting and mixing'."

If you are attentive the diamond or immortal body is formed.
"The work on the circulation of the light depends entirely on the backward flowing movement, so that the thoughts are gathered together
[the place of Heavenly Consciousness, the Heavenly Heart). The heavenly heart lies between Sun and Moon (i.e. the two eyes),"
The right eye is the sun eye and the left the moon eye. This heavenly heart, this centre, lies between the two eyes.
"The Book of the Yellow Castle says: In the field of the square inch, of the house of the square foot, life can be regulated. The house of the square foot is the face. The field of the square inch is the face: what could that be other than the Heavenly He art? In the middle of the square inch dwells the splendour."
The Heavenly Heart is placed up in the forehead.
The Chinese believe that they think all kinds of thoughts in the heart, but these thoughts have a spiritual future so they rise.
But we believe that we think in our heads, for us, therefore, the treasure is in Manipura, in the fulness of jewels; so we have to descend in order to find it. We do not do this voluntarily, it happens to us.
"In the purple hall of the city of jade dwells the god of utmost emptiness and life. The Confucians call it the centre of emptiness; the Buddhists, the terrace of life ; the Taoists, the ancestral land . . . or the dark pass, or the space of former Heaven.
The Heavenly Heart is like the dwelling place, the Light is the master."
The terrace of life is to be found in the Stupa buildings.
The Taoists call this the Land of the Ancestors.
The ancestral part is given to us by our body, we take over the life of our ancestors in that way.
It is the terrace of life because it is here that life renews itself.
The dark pass has to go backwards against consciousness.
"Therefore when the Light circulates, the powers of the whole body arrange themselves before its throne, just as when a holy king has taken possession of the capital and has laid down the fundamental rules of order, all the states approach with tribute or, just as when the master is quiet and calm, men-servants and maids obey his orders of their own accord, and each does his work. Therefore you only have to make the Light circulate: that is the deepest and most wonderful secret. The Light is easy to move, but difficult to fix. If it is allowed to go long enough in a circle, then it crystallizes itself: that is the natural spirit body. This crystallized spirit is formed beyond the nine Heavens. It is the condition of which it is said in the Book of the Seal of the Heart: 'Silently in the morning thou flyest upward'."
"In carrying out this fundamental truth you need to seek for no other methods, but must only concentrate your thoughts on it. The book Leng Yen says: 'By collecting the thoughts one can fly and will be born in Heaven'. Heaven is not the wide blue sky, but the place where the body is made in the house of the creative. If one keeps this up for a long time, there develops quite naturally, in addition to the body, yet another spirit body."
"The Golden Flower is the Elixir of Life.
All changes of spiritual consciousness depend up on the Heart.
Here is a secret charm, which, although it works very accurately, is yet so fluent that it needs extreme intelligence and clarity, and complete absorption and calm.

People without this highest degree of intelligence and understanding do not find the way to apply the charm; people without this utmost capacity for concentration and calm cannot keep fast hold of it."
(These ideas are also typical of alchemy, in this western sister we often meet with the statement that the path to the alchemic gold is no path for the stupid.)
The heart, the "golden castle", is called the "germinal vesicle", where the seat of 1he inner way lies:
" . . . . the 'germinal vesicle' is also known as the 'borderline of the snow mountains', the 'primordial pass', the 'empire of the greatest joy', the
'land without boundaries', and the ' altar upon which consciousness and life are made'. 'If a dying man does not know this seed place', says the Hui Ming Ching, 'he will not find the unity of consciousness and life in a thousand births and ten thousand aeons'."
This is hard to define in western phraseology.
Christ's saying to the man working on the Sabbath: "If you know what you do you are blessed, but if you know not you are cursed" holds something of the same idea.
Jakob Boehme speaks of the eye that looks inward.
Boehme's phantasies developed in this direction, though he had no connection with eastern ideas.
We will now leave this theme and return to our phantasy.
I am glad we do not have to follow it much further as it becomes very unpleasant; but this had to be, for it was altogether too beautiful and people are tempted to stay forever in phantasies of that kind.
The patient continues very logically:
"I went on and came to some steps which led down to the water and I sat down on the bottom step. After I had waited some time two Indians appeared in a canoe,"
The bottom step is symbolical, and means that it is necessary for her to go down to the very lowest.
The appearance of the Indians shows why she had to go down so far.
The patient i s an American so she has a secret relation to the Indians.
I once wrote an article for an American paper and called it "Your Indian and Negroid Behaviour" and I explained in it where the Americans reminded me of these primitives.
When I became acquainted with negroes and Indians I saw Americans quite differently.
The negro has the quality of infecting you, you have to do the things which he does.
Jazz, for instance, is the rhythm of Umgoma, and also the sound of a heavy car. I once saw a lorry whose engine was making this noise and out came the women and children and began to dance to the rhythm, and soon the whole village was dancing round this lorry.
This is the negro, they are just children.
America is a half white land, this constitutes a fearful problem for if you live side by side with black people you become coloured.
I went to Africa in order to investigate this but it takes years for the black really to penetrate.
In Khartoum I met an English gentleman who bore one of the best English names but suffered from such a terrible inferiority that he could only live in the colonies.
He had been to Eton and to Oxford, but, and this was the snag, he was born in Australia, so he had a touch of the colonial.
We think of this as English snobbism, but it really is a fact.
The child born in a country takes something of that land, it is the secret influence of the place.
It is even said that in the second generation the measurements of the skull have already altered.

In this phantasy we have Indians and not negroes.
The Indian influence is typical for the American.
If you dress American politicians and Indians in the same clothes and take pictures of them you cannot tell one from the other.
This is the secret influence of the soil which shows in other ways as well.
The genuine and cruel initiation ordeals in the American universities, for instance, are just the same as those of the Indians.
The ancestor ghosts stay on in a conquered land and you get the wrong children and the wrong souls creep into their bodies.
It is very dangerous to conquer the lands of strange peoples.
We know how bewildered this patient had become in modern life and here a piece of the original Indian who owned the American soil is manifesting itself and coming to the surface.
These foreign bodies in a western consciousness frequently cause neuroses. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 12July1935, Pages 238-241.

Carl Jung answers questions on the Nature of Dreams (2015-03-30 11:38)

Lecture VII 8th March, 1935
There are several questions today.
The first question is highly philosophical.
Speaking from the standpoint of many thousands of dreams I cannot say that they show guidance.

It is as if the dream were quite uninterested in the fate of the ego, it is pure Nature, it expresses the given thing, it mirrors the state of our consciousness with complete detachment; it never says ”to do it in such and such a way would be well”, but states that it is so.
If anyone knows how to read the meaning of the dream it is very well for him, if not, it is an opportunity missed, but every day is full of missed opportunities.
There are certain dreams which seem really to concern themselves with the fate of the ego, but these belong to the category of big dreams.
Dreams as a whole are without purpose, like nature herself, it is wiser to regard them as such.
The second question speaks of the memory images which occur in dreams; things , countries, situations, which the dreamer has never seen or experienced, though they have associations to real experiences of a quite different nature.
This is a question of paramnesia, it is what the French call le sentiment du ”deja vu”, a parallel memory.
These associations have nothing to do with the archetypes, they are probably built up over the archetypes, but the archetype itself does not appear in them.
But in certain cases of affinities to people or things, a personal sense of ”deja vu”, such as Go \ethe describes when he expresses the feeling: ”Were you in times gone by my sister or my bride”, the archetype is touched.
Next term I intend to deal with this more fully.
The third question asks if we can dream of experiences undergone by our ancestors.
I cannot be sure of this.
There are so many curious sources from which we dream, that we cannot say for certain where anything comes from.
Here we come to cryptomnesia (hidden memories).
Flournoy’s Helene Smith in ”Somnambulisme avec Glossolalie” is a classic example, also the example I gave you last year from Nietzsche’s Zarathustra.
Benoit was accused of plagiarism of Rider Haggard’s ”She” in his ”L’ Atlantide”.
He denied this, however, and I quite believe him, for both these figures are coupled with the archetype of the anima.
It is almost impossible to prove what is actual ancestral experience, in the first place we should have to be sure that the dreamer had never heard of the experience, then that it actually had happened, and so on, all conditions hard to be sure of.
The fourth question asks if there are not certain types of people who are more likely to have archetypal dreams than others.
In my experience these dreams can come to all types of people.
It is a question of the archetypal situation in the man ’ s life.
There are certain people with a low threshold of consciousness, one might almost say a schizophrenic tendency.
These people have a specially thin skin with weak places in it, and they experience archetypal situations far more readily than other thick-skinned people who ride roughshod over the world.
Such experiences as military service and getting engaged to be married, for instance, are just sugar to thick-skinned people but there are other people who find these experiences filled with the whole of life’s tragedy and they are quite unable to stand the strain. These experiences may b e a donkey ride or a terrible shock, both aspects are equally real.
To return to our dream, I still owe you a clear interpretation.
I have broken my head in trying to find one for you and have often wished that I had never given you this dream at all!
We must imagine ourselves in the situation of the dreamer, an aesthetic and sensitive person, with a thin skin like a fragile glass, confronted with a vast cathedral which will certainly impress him very deeply.

A cathedral shows a whole world, the House of God, the greatness of the mediaeval ”Weltanschauung” (outlook on life).
We hardly realise how much our modern spirit is founded on such a building, the last expression of an age.
The great church stands clear above the ground, and underneath it lies a secret which at this stage we will not attempt to define, an incomprehensible secret.
The dreamer has not got this secret, it has him.
The essential thing is not what the dreamer believes but what he is; it is not my creed that matters, but what I am, every gesture betrays me.
We do not know what this secret is, but the symbols which he found point to history, indications that not only the Christian ”Weltanschauung” is meant, but quite other ” Weltanschauungs ” of which the Church wishes to remain in ignorance.
A darkness lies under the conscious, the unconscious, the dark place under the church.
We do not know what this is, but we find a thread of it here.
The secret was known to the church, and it was kept in the Sacramentum, hidden from the profane.
Christ was referred to as the fish.
In a papyrus which has recently been discovered and is in the British Museum he is referred to by the secret sign XP. T he sign is formed from it.
These signs appear in Gnosticism, St. Paul’s sayings are undoubtedly connected with Gnosticism.
On Gnostic gems we find the symbol of the vase, the vase of sin.
The Gnosis is a disturber of the peace of the Church, but it is full of psychological truths, many yet undiscovered.
The vase was the crater, and is very often thought of in connection with Aesculapius, the doctor.
The Egyptian form of this is expressed by the well bucket in which the fruitful water of the Nile is drawn up.
The same symbol appears next in the Grail legend and seems to come to an end there.
In Wolfram von Eschenbach’s history of Parsifal, written in the beginning of the thirteenth century, we find this sentence ”It is called the ”Lap sit exillis”; this was interpreted ”lapis ex coelis”, the precious stone out of which the Grail was made coming from the sky, but the word was really ”exilis” which means small, insignificant; this appeared so strange that the meaning of the word was changed.
About the same time, in Provence, the philosopher Villanova speaks of the philosopher’s stone as the lapis exilis”, describing it as one stone, one medicine, one vase, the symbol of healing.
This leads us over to the secret gnosis of the Middle Ages, when it takes the form of alchemy.
This hidden teaching is continue d to the present day in the form of secret societies, the most important of those surviving being the Free Masons.
They do not treasure ”da ” consciousness, but the things which belong to ”night” consciousness.
The vast number of members of these societies shows how living these things still are.
I have given you this one sequence, it must serve as an example to show that what is being done now has been done before and will recur again.
This dreamer is not a member of any of these secret societies, he is an unprejudiced young man so his dream comes straight from the unconscious.
There is a secret dark life among the primitives also and unless we know of it we understand nothing of their psychology.

If we seek our connection with the snake we come to the spinal cord and that points to the animal soul of man which leads him down into the darkness of the body, into the instinct which one meets in animal form in the outer world.
When we come on instinct in the inner world it appears containing the most strange things as is the case in this dream.
The task which is given the dreamer is to find a connection with this dark instinctive soul.
This is a difficult task for he will get no help from the time he lives in, for this instinctive soul is denied on every side.
This attitude does not help us any more than it would to say that bacteria and mosquitoes are nonsense; they exist and so does the instinctive soul.
If the secret teaching of the primitive tribe is lost the whole tribe goes to pieces for it has lost its connection with the mother soul.
That means that it has lost the ground under its feet, but civilised man lives like a balloon, he is nowhere in touch with the round, with reality.
Primitives are really human animals living on the lap of the earth and from its sap.
We are merely enlightened!
We see the cathedral but we do not know what is under it, we do not know what a cathedral is, what religion is.
We do not know why th e Christian ”Weltanschauung” exists, and why it is so insisted upon.
The real reason is that these things lie under it, these essential roots of man; they belong to the secret teaching and had to be hidden, the Church was built over them and because of this people have become cut off from their roots.
The one thing we cannot fight is the madness of man and his sick ideas; if these deep roots are cut off it is only good luck if there is no general explosion of all the gas balloons which are floating over the earth.
This young man should be able to reach back to these roots and take them without guile, though with full consciousness of what he is doing, but he prefers to betray the snake and give the task over to the shadow.
He is unconscious of his problem. It is the task of all of us to understand the ways of the left hand, to pierce it with the clear insight of the intellect.
This is exceedingly painful, but if we can do it we learn to see in the dark and we discover the secret, which is the foundation and meaning lying below all the philosophies and religions on the earth. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 8March1935,

Carl Jung on “Complexes” and “Ideas.” (2015-03-30 16:06)

Lecture I 3rd May, 1935
I will give you a short resume of the themes which were treated in the lectures which I have given during the last year.
We spoke principally of methods, and first amongst these of association tests, intended to find the feeling toned complexes in the unconscious.
Complexes are autonomous; their autonomy is shown by the way they influence and change conscious intentions.
They cause:
1) Forgetfulness: We forget a word, usually a name. It is kept back by its relation in the unconscious to the complex. I am not speaking of common forgetfulness which is quite a different thing, but of abnormal forgetfulness.
2) Lapsus linguae: using the wrong word in the wrong place. The complex often plays the role of the little devil in this respect.
3) Misunderstanding: if we are speaking of anything in the neighbourhood of a complex we must take great care that we are not misunderstood, for the complex will use its language instead of ours if it possibly can.
4) Involuntary facial expressions : most people cannot control their facial expressions, only a skilled actor can do this. If a complex is touched our faces, or perhaps our hands, betray us.
5) Emotion: when a feeling toned complex is touched, people become upset emotionally. When we do not understand our emotion we feel quite innocent about it, but its cause can usually be traced to the complex. Such reactions can take place without our conscious knowledge, or, perhaps we recognise the emotion at the beginning, but then another long wave of affect takes place unnoticed which is expressed in bodily reactions, such as perspiration.
These experiments make it possible for us to get some idea of unconscious affects and complexes.

Patients come to analysis knowing nothing whatever about these; it is impossible to make a direct approach but if I ask them, for instance, what they think I think they usually become very eloquent! Complexes can also be called fragmentary souls.

Secondly we spoke of dreams and, as we did so, it became apparent that dreams have something of the quality of autonomous complexes.

The complex often appears quite nakedly in a dream as it never does in the conscious, but it is always expressed in curious and indirect language.

We saw that we must find the associations in order to widen the field of the dream and to see where it connects with consciousness.

It is also necessary to pay attention to the psychic atmosphere of the dream images.

By these means we can arrive at its meaning.

All dreams originate in the unconscious though occasionally a dream can be induced by suggestion or hypnosis.

Dreams can spring from physical or psychic causes, a dream can be caused by hunger, fever, cold, et cetera, but even then the dreams themselves are made of psychic material.

Many dreams come from split off psychic contents, if I try to dissociate myself from something I am very likely to dream of it.

People with a narrow consciousness often have meaningful dreams, especially those who have great trouble in seeing who they are and where they belong; many people spend their entire lives without being able to discover this.

It sometimes happens that such people identify with a content in a dream that belongs to a fate which it is far beyond their capacity to live, and this may cause a bad split, or even a psychosis.

Some dreams spring from contact with basic archetypal contents of the unconscious, contents which have never been anywhere near consciousness.

I will give you some diagrams to make this clearer.

Diagram I

Diagram I.

a) is the circle of consciousness;

b) is an unpleasant content which has been made taboo, what the English call a ”skeleton in the cupboard”.

It is driven out, and made autonomous.

Diagram II.

Here the reverse process has taken place;

b) the complex, has remained fixed and a) the conscious, has moved away from it.

This is a question of two different types.

The type represented in the first diagram is more hysterical, and the second appears to be more normal for he keeps the abnormal thing out of his everyday life, but unintentionally he is always affected by it.

Diagram III.

Everyone has complexes, there is nothing to be ashamed of in that; it would in fact be highly suspicious if we found someone who had no complexes, for these are the fires of the psyche.

This diagram is of a normal man who knows the positive and negative aspects of his conscious, a), but who does not reckon with the fact that his conscious is contained in a far larger unconscious which has its own complexes, b). People who deny their complexes become separated from their energy because there is no energy without complexes.

If all the conflict is in the archetypes, then the energy is all in the unconscious; this state of things continues until life produces a situation which constellates the archetype in us.

When this happens the complex takes on a tremendous growth.

It is, of course, essential to become conscious of what is happening and by this we can gain a heightened consciousness; if we do not gain this consciousness the energy is lost, it disappears into the unconscious again.

Miracles are symbols for a heightened understanding of life; learning to fly without wings, telepathy, Yoga practices, etc., all belong psychologically to this heightened consciousness.

I did not say very much about the mechanism of dreams, I will give you some main points on that subject now.

1. Contamination.
This is the central point which relates innumerable things to each other.
It consists of unlimited contact with all possible images that are drawn from thousands of things which we would never have thought of putting together.
I will give you an example in the form of a task.
Choose some simple thing, a table, for example.
The wood that it is made of, its size and such facts come to our mind at once; but the whole world stands in some relation or other to it.
A cloth, for instance, has a direct relation to it, but it seems a far cry from a table to Julius Caesar, the sequence, however, leads us there quickly if we know it.
The famous German word ”Zug”, of which Mark Twain complains, connects an amazingly long and various list of things.
The understanding is inactive while we dream; if we take hold of one piece of the fabric of contamination, any of the innumerable things with which it is connected may come up with it.
In the conscious we concentrate on the meaning of the word, and we prevent ourselves from giving it too wide a meaning.
But this is reversed in the unconscious, so that not only the one word is brought up, but all words in its proximity.
You can see this very clearly in psychotic states.
I will give you some examples.
I had a patient in an asylum who always called herself “die Lorelei”.
I asked her why, and she replied that she had been in the asylum for a long time and that each time she told the doctor she should be let out, because she was the Czar, the Grand Mogul, or some such person, he always replied ”Ich weiss nicht was solidas bedeuten” so of course she must be the Lorelei!
She also called herself the silver island and had a dream of an island consisting of a silver mountain.
She explained this by saying ”Silence is golden and speech is silver” and that she talked a lot so she was silver.
You can really say anything when you begin to think in this way.
Another patient said that he was Socrates’ representative, because like him he h a d suffered for many years in prison - the asylum.
We sometimes get dreams in which we cannot form the content, and what happens to us while asleep, happens to the insane while they are awake.
2. Condensation.
This is a stronger form of contamination, it does not only connect but condenses innumerable things.
The crab-lizard monster, which we spoke of last year, is such an image.
3. Doubling, or multiplication, is the opposite of condensation.
Certain people, or experiences, appear doubled, or multiplied.
4. Concretizing.
It is as if the unconscious could not think logically so that it expresses itself in little stories; it often, for instance, represents complexes by people, who can be either real or imaginary. In our conscious life we often pick out a friend or enemy to be our bete noire, he has the qualities we do not wish to see in ourselves and we stick very closely to him.
5. Dramatizing.
This is a mechanism which dramatizes everything that happens.
6. Archaic Mechanism.
This is translating things into archaic forms, into animals which app ear in fairy tales and the such like. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 1May1935, Pages 201-204.

Carl Jung on Complementary and Compensatory Dreams. (2015-03-30 18:09)

Lecture II 10th May, 1935
Last time we made a brief survey of the unconscious composition of dreams.
Today we will speak of the Function of the Dream.
There are two classifications: (1) complementary, (2) compensatory.
(1). Th e complementary classification.
The elements which have not been present in daily consciousness are automatically brought forward.
A certain situation, for example, occurred during the day, we only noticed one aspect of it and did not see all round it.
The other aspects and contents, therefore, were left out either intentionally or unintentionally and they automatically come up in dreams.
(2). The compensatory classification.
Here, on the other hand, we see that psychic material entering into dreams which belongs to the idea of the totality of the personality.
It is as if there were a direct intention to give all the material that is needed to complete the conscious situation.

In the second case we must speak of tendency, of intention, to give these things to consciousness.
But in using the terms tendency and intention we carry a conscious point of view into the unconscious, and we do not know if this is permissible.
The totality of the psyche consists of both the conscious and the unconscious, possibly this gives us the right, but we must admit that only a few dreams substantiate this.
Dreams certainly do hit the vital point with great precision.
Antique culture always regarded them as messengers, and we cannot afford to ignore the opinions of antiquity, because the ancients had a psychology which was much broader than ours for they saw a much simpler world than we do.
We cannot hear our own voices for the newspapers, but they had time to listen to their inner experiences.
So the conceptions of antiquity point more to a compensatory point of view than to a complementary one.
It is as if a transcendental subject existed beyond the ordinary empirical subject, and as if this transcendental subject threw light on the conscious standpoint.
Then the question arises why, if a transcendental subject exists, does it not speak in reasonable language?
One can only say that such a purpose must use the material available to it and this material consists of the contents of the unconscious all of which are influenced by the contamination of which we spoke last time, and that material necessitates a very different language from that of our own conscious world.
The conscious, in order to speak reasonably, is forced to exclude many aspects and contents of a situation, but to exclude is not the function or the purpose of the transcendental subject which, by its very nature, is forced to use a wider and more comprehensive form of speech.
It is not dealing with conscious material, so there only remains a contaminated material which resembles the speech of the primitive who does not see things as differentiated.
He is in participation, which we are now calling contamination.
It is impossible for us to see how a primitive identifies himself with a crocodile, but this is the result of his contaminated mental condition.
In a sense, he is a crocodile because he can be as dangerous as a crocodile, and an eagle when he is as fearless as an eagle, he is a clan brother of both.
The primitive can even go into the water with the conviction that the crocodile will not eat him, for contamination is so natural to him that he will even trust his life to it.
We dream of a combined figure with the face of the real father, the figure of an uncle, and the gestures of an Esteemed teacher.
This figure is formed from all the people who from professional or family connections have been associated with us in a fatherly aspect, they are all contaminated and made into one figure by the unconscious.
It is as if the transcendent function had to express itself through turbid, obscure material.
This is very clearly visible in the material of the insane.
If you ask me for my interpretation of the function of the dream I must reply that I gave both these aspects, because though I have known many dreams which could be satisfactorily explained by the complementary classification, I have also known many which could not.
This latter kind of material forces me to think that tendency and intention do exist, and that the human personality consists of two important parts, one of which often possesses a greater and riper knowledge than the conscious subject. Dreams sometimes refer to things ten years before the conscious has any idea of their existence, this leads us to believe in the anticipatory quality of dreams.
Use of dreams.
I can touch on this point very briefly.
Their main use is to throw light on a dark situation, and to enlighten that which he cannot see through.
In practical analysis they often reveal things which we could never reach through asking questions of the patient; so we turn to dreams to show us what tendencies and possibilities exist which can be brought into daily life.
The conscious can plan great things which it is quite unable to reach and dreams often show us a door leading to a possibility that we could never conceive of consciously.

It is contamination itself which shows us these unguessed connections; in the clear rooms of our consciousness we lock the door on just those contents, seemingly irrelevant, that could help us.
Often easy ways lie close at hand though they are invisible to our consciousness.
The special purpose of this process is that these contents should not be regarded as merely interesting, but should be put into daily life.
Only when they are integrated have they really fulfilled their functions.
We have spoken of methods by which to see the dark processes of the unconscious and we have learnt that long sequences roll on continuously and that our dreams are pieces of this process.
The fact that these contents force themselves into all situations, and hinder us by making us forget words, say the wrong thing, and so on, proves that these processes never cease and never sleep.
So the unconscious is a moving psychic layer which we see only when disturbances occur.
It would be best if one could just remove the conscious and watch, but this is not possible for nothing would be left with which to observe.
So the task is to find a way to remove the obstruction of consciousness and yet to leave an eye with which to see what appears on the dark background of the psyche.
Here we closely approach eastern methods.
There is such a way but it is dark to western consciousness, which has no idea of these things, and feels bewildered by them.
I will try to put it so that you do not feel too bewildered.
Directly we try to see something of the unconscious we have already sinned against western ideals; when we make ourselves empty so as to invite these contents to manifest themselves, we have already laid ourselves open to suspicion.
Yet the East says this is the very beginning of wisdom, they already teach little children that much; so when we empty ourselves we open up a new territory - Yoga.
The Latin ”ugum” - yoke - shows its purpose, which is to yoke the horses of the unconscious.
We have these wild horses, the complexes, in our unconscious; they do not only plague the nervous, but the normal also.
We all know of things that hinder us and which we want to suppress with the whole force of the will which is a poor, blunt instrument with, at best, temporary effect, to use against such things.
The East has known all these facts for thousands of years, it is only in the West that they are unknown; the West where we look everywhere but into ourselves.
Just to empty your consciousness sounds easy, but it is a very difficult task indeed.
Most people use eastern ways to do this, which is mere apelike mimicry.
I have only mentioned the East as an analogy and I should like to take the opportunity to give a public warning against imitations of the East.
It is our task to find a way to come to terms with these things in our own manner.
Eastern ways are quite unsuitable to the western form of consciousness.
The principal thing is to know how this can be done and I will give you an example to make this clear.
A young man of 32, an artist, a painter, had a particular difficulty in finding a way to this emptying of consciousness.
Yet it was most important for him as he had symptoms of a peculiarly pregnant and threatening unconscious: he had far too many dreams and their menacing quality kept him from sleeping.
In such cases it is necessary to use drastic measures.
There is, as it were, a big abscess.
You cannot reach the contents with outward methods, but must operate up on it.
This method of phantasying while awake is not only useful in illness but has a universal application.
I suggested therefore to this young man that he should try to phantasy but he was quite unable to do so and could only repeat to himself over and over again: ”I must have an empty conscious”.
At last after trying for three or four weeks he was sitting one day at Stadelhofen Station, waiting for his train to come out to see me, when he was attracted by a poster of Murren, a landscape of a hill with cows upon it.

He thought: ”Why I could walk up that hill to those cows”.
He did so, and looked down over the other side to a view over the Alps; there was a gate in the foreground with a path beyond it leading downwards.
He went through the gate and walked down the path and came to a corner round which was a chapel.
He entered the chapel and found it contained a religious picture; something with pointed ears suddenly disappeared behind this picture.
At this point he thought ”This is all nonsense, why I made it up myself”.
But in the train he thought: ”Well, after all, I should try again and if it all happens in the same way I shall not have invented it.
”So he walked up the hill for the second time and everything was just the same, even to the creature with the pointed ears.
Then he came to my office jubilant, saying ”Now I have it!”
It was his cramped attitude which had hitherto stopped the phantasy from appearing.
The attitude of the East towards these matters is quite different, they give things a chance to express themselves quite naturally in the same spirit as a child makes a doll of a piece of wood, which comes, as it were, to life in its hands. Carl Jung,

Carl Jung on the Method of Active Imagination. (2015-03-31 05:44)

Lecture III 17th May, 1935

We spoke last time of the method of active phantasying, we will carry that subject further today.
I gave you the example of a young artist.
Perhaps it surprises you that just an artist should have this difficulty, because it seems as if this should be a simple matter for one of his profession, but this is not the case.
It is particularly hard to make a game of your profession.
A chemist would find it difficult to bring himself to play with the methods used in the Orient and in the Middle Ages when they were in search of gold.
A doctor would have the same resistance to playing with the thought of healing. If one knows a subject well, one has particularly pronounced ideas as to what it is, and it is especially hard to allow a free rein to things which one feels do not belong; this picture method, therefore, is quite particularly difficult for an artist.
By this example we see that it is a question of allowing phantasy to play freely, but this is only a beginning.
This method of active phantasying has many possibilities, it can be used to dis cover complexes and contents of the unconscious and it is especially useful to establish a connection with the tendencies and possibilities which exist and will appear.
We always have prejudices and think we know what these tendencies are but in reality we do not know anything about them; it is the things which are the most surprising to consciousness that always appear.
Where there are complexes there are always phantasies, for complexes are continually trying to find a solution.
These phantasies are involuntary and spontaneous; we dislike them and have the same prejudices against them as we have against dreams.
This is not surprising for they are a froth-like substance yet, in order to see the hidden part of the psyche, we must turn to phantasies.
From the medical point of view this is necessary.
We are not concerned now, it is true, with the medical side, but with actually allowing these things to come to the daylight, as a method of knowing ourselves and enlarging the horizon of the conscious.
Phantasies and dreams do not of themselves enlarge consciousness, they have to be understood and here the great difficulty begins.
The application of the method which I have been describing is related to Yoga; in principle they are alike, but with great differences.
In so far as Yoga is a method to extend the personality, we may mention it in the same connection.
The picture method is only one of many in Yoga.
In India free phantasying is not permitted, phantasying there is based on dogmatic pictures which are called Yantras, contemplation pictures, mandalas, which have the object of attracting the attention and forming a guide to phantasy.
Our method aims at allowing the complex to express itself and reveal its structure, but Yoga aims at fettering it in dogma.
This is almost universally the case in Indian Yoga.
The objects of contemplation are usually pictures that represent the real nature of the depths of the collective unconscious.
As we know little of these regions they appear strange to our western consciousness and to explain them we have to refer to texts little known in Europe.
Fortunately Sir John Woodroffe had himself initiated in these practices and has published a great many texts referring to them.
I did not bring any pictures to show you, as at this stage they would only further bewilder you.
In China we find similar things, chiefly in Taoism which, as you know, is founded on the teaching of Lao Tse.
Taoism degenerated terribly but has lately undergone a renaissance while Confucianism is at present degenerating.
Taoism has also a kind of Yoga but it is less well known than the Indian.
The Chinese Yoga is very much less founded on dogma, the Yogin is left to find his own way through his difficult experiences.
I will quote a few texts to you out of ”The Golden Flower”.

”Emptiness comes as the first of the three contemplations. All things are looked up on as empty. Then follows delusion.”
Delusion refers to these phantasy pictures.
Every fragmentary thought takes form and colour because you give it the right of way, whereas before it slept in the twilight.
This phenomenon is characterised in the following alchemistic saying of the lapis: ”Give me willingly my right and I will help you.”
This last is the symbol of the lapis, the philosopher’s stone.
These karmic traces appear under the influence of the creative energy.
The Book of Successful Contemplation (Ying Kuan Ching) says:
”The sun sinks in the Great Water and magic pictures of trees in rows arise .The setting of the sun means that in chaos (in the world before phenomena, that is, the intelligible world), a foundation is laid: that is the condition free of opposites (wu chi).”
”Now there are three confirmatory experiences which can be tested. The first is that, when one has entered the state of meditation, the gods (20) are in the valley . Men are heard talking as though at a distance of several hundred paces, each one quite clear. But the sounds are all like an echo in a valley. One can always hear them, but never oneself. This is called the presence of the gods in the valley”.
Karmaistic thoughts are here represented in the gods, in the neighbourhood of men’s consciousness.
This is almost like schizophrenia where each bit has its own voice.
The Yogin in Yoga-nidra, or Yoga sleep, is in a hypnotic condition empty of consciousness.
He is sitting stiffly, or lying rigid on the ground.
He may appear asleep, but he is not, for if you go to sleep the whole good of the exercise is lost.
”At times the following can be experienced: as soon as one is quiet, the Light of the eyes begins to blaze up, so that everything before one becomes quite bright as if one were in a cloud. If one opens one’s eyes and seeks the body it is not to be found any more. This is called: In the empty chamber it grows light. Inside and outside, everything is equally light . That is a very favourable sign. Or, when one sits in meditation, the fleshly body becomes quite shining like silk, or jade. It seems difficult to remain sitting ; one feels as if drawn upwards. This is called: The spirit returns and pushes against Heaven. In time, one can experience it in such a way that one really floats upward”.
We are not used to thinking that light comes from within as well as from without, it is as if the eye had an inward light of its own, if we receive a blow on the head for instance, we see stars.
This double light is normal in the Yogin consciousness, attention is directed on the inner possibilities.
Light phenomena play a great role where consciousness is empty.
In such deep meditation one feels drawn completely out of the body.
The levitation of St. Francis is a typical example.
You can see yourself from a foot above, from the ceiling or from the ground.
The Yogin himself levitates because he is so identified with his contemplation that he loses the weight of his body.
The old master continues, speaking of emptiness and delusion:
”Although it is known that they are empty, things are not destroyed, but a man attends to his affairs in the midst of the emptiness. But though one does not destroy things, neither does one pay attention to them; this is contemplation of the centre. While practising contemplation of the empty, one also knows that one cannot destroy the ten thousand things, and still one does not notice them. In this way the three contemplations fall together. But, after all, strength is in visioning the empty. Therefore, when one practises contemplation of emptiness, emptiness is certainly empty, but delusion is empty also, and the centre is empty. It needs a great strength to practise contemplation of delusion; then delusion is really delusion, but emptiness is also delusion, and the centre is also delusion. Being on the way of the centre, one also creates images of the emptiness, but they are not called empty, but are called central. One practises also contemplation of delusion, but one does not call it delusion, one calls it central. As to what has to do with the centre, more need not be said."

"What has to do with the centre, more need not be said".
This is truly Chinese.
The Yogin concentrates on the centre and not on the thing itself.
The Chinese do not say there is no content, but "we will not speak of it ", and they are so wise that they really do not do so, but we are so childish that we write thick books about it!
Nirvana, for instance is a positive non-being, this is something which you cannot say anything about.
It is just the same in modern psychology; in the background of the unconscious we meet things which it is impossible to talk about.
The twenty gods have no special importance in the East, Eastern man has no liking for being born a god, for the gods have to become men and this they think would only make the process last longer.
We have a western analogy in Ignatius of Loyola.
His practices consisted of several weeks' meditation each of which lasted one hour.
The meditations were purely Christian, there is the same limiting of phantasy as in the Indian Yoga, it is kept strictly to the Christian pattern.
This is the opposite of our method.
We encourage active phantasying about just the things that these people throw out; this is trusting to nature, but if we follow nature we do not err.
Perhaps this is truly medical for all doctors know that if nature will not help they are powerless.
Such phantasies are pure nature, but if we a r e in a difficult situation only creative phantasy can show us the hole through which we can creep.
In such cases phantasies, and as many as possible, should be encouraged. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture III, 17May 1935, Pages 208-211.

Carl Jung on Dream Associations (2015-03-31 11:49)

[Carl Jung on Dream Associations]
Lecture XII 1st February, 1935
We will continue with the associations to our last dream.
The wasps' nest reminds the dreamer of having been attacked by wasps on a walk – and he associated his fear of this with an explosion.
This connects it with the last dream, he is afraid that emotions may sting.
Cactuses were a hobby of his childhood, he had a large collection to which he gave a great deal of care.
When we begin to interpret this dream we find that it does not only touch the personal level, but also the impersonal, which enters with the fairy story motif.
A part of it, therefore, belongs to the category of big dreams, the theme of the locked room, for instance, is found in myths all over the world.
It portrays a general human experience which cannot be reduced to the personal level and if we take it literally we could say it means that it is forbidden to go back to the mother's womb.
We find this same theme in the incident of Nicodemus.
In this dream the pool is a symbol for the mother, but had the dream meant to refer only to the mother it would have said so.
The mother here is represented as a pool in the palace, showing that the archetypal world is meant.
This dream refers to the part of the psyche which is born with the child.
The human brain is the result of a long process of evolution, as is also the collective unconscious.
The individual experience is woven in to this tissue, so it is of vital importance, where we come from, who our parents are, and what our early surroundings were.

We say that a person has such and such a character, but one is born with a form which can only be changed with the greatest difficulty.
The child does not only want to stay with the mother, but also in the palace, which represents the world of mythology.
Unfortunately very few people can remember these primeval pictures, many people become ill because they have lost them and only get well when they find them again.
All great art and religious experiences are an effort to get back to these primeval pictures.
Plato's philosophy is concerned with these pictures of a time before creation, creation is a reflection of these pictures.
We see then that the great difficulty this dreamer experiences, in leaving his youth behind, is to leave these primeval pictures with their powerful fascination, but he has to decide to go out into the world of wasps' nests, with his elder brother, his riper personality.
He is always on the lookout for being stung, people with this attitude are always wasps themselves.
When we are able to face these stings we come to the flowering cactuses.
The dream here plays on an earlier activity, the caring for the cactuses; the idea being that you can have the flowers if you can stand the pricks.
The fear of life is very great in such patients, but this is a hopeful dream, showing that industry can overcome the difficulties.
Dream VIII - I am again out walking, but this time with a friend instead of my brother.
We come to a fruit tree and my friend gives me a capsule full of bees' eggs.
Context. The dreamer says of the friend that he was his greatest friend at school.
He is moody and sensitive, likes light music whereas the dreamer's taste is for serious music.
He is vain and fond of jewellery.
The dreamer fought him often and hit him over the head as he did his sister.
He associates the fruit tree to an apple tree planted by his mother, bringing in the theme of Adam and Eve.
In speaking of the bees' eggs the dreamer says that both ants and bees are extraordinarily industrious.
The motif of industry, which we found already in the last dream, is stressed here.
We will now interpret this dream.
The friend is the inferior side of himself, such friendship s are very common, for it is nice to have someone always at hand to whom we can feel superior, but such things fall back on ourselves, for when we go out into the real world we cannot blame someone else but must each take the responsibility for our own inferior side.
There are people indeed who always project the blame, but I hold this to be incorrect!
The fruit comes to him from the mother, through the friend, the shadow; this means that if he goes out into the world with his shadow, fruit will come to him.
A capsule full of eggs means many possibilities for further development.
This dream shows that he is far enough on not to stay with his mother, but to go out and be fruitful.
This does not just mean to generate a child, but by industry to show that he is fit to do something in the world.
This is far more important than having a child.
Our parents in the Garden of Eden also found the apple a prelude to something unpleasant, that is to doing some work.
This dream is constructive, as dreams often are, so we can hope that he is on a good road.
In the next dream we come to the last fear, the fear of the female.
Dream IX - I am walking in a beautiful p ark and a lovely woman comes rapidly to meet me, her hair is loose and hanging over her shoulders.
Context. The dreamer associates the park to an actual park where he used to walk with his mother and a pretty dance student.
The loose hair reminds him of a famous dancer Arita Sacchetta, who used to wear her hair loose and also of Russian students.
Such h air is now very fashionable, they call it "storm tossed" hair.
When we come to the interpretation of this dream we find it is mainly positive and it was one of the last that he dreamt with me, as shortly afterwards he was able to leave me and make his way out into the world.

He married, but that was not the end of the story, for it went over, as marriages do, into a new chapter - a fresh set of difficulties.
In this short transition you can see how feeling develops and goes over from the mother into manhood.
The great reproach which is brought against psychology is its personal and introspective nature, but psychology consists of all that the human spirit has ever experienced and that can certainly not be called personal.
The same myths crop up all over the world where there is no possible communication.
This shows the very general character of human psychology.
When the problem of a patient takes place in a personal sphere, the dreams are formed of personal material - family, personal friends, et cetera.
This dreamer was such a case, there have been only very occasional references to impersonal material.
The problem is not always that of getting out into the world, many people are already courageously in it, the problems are then different, it is a matter of adaptation to this or that person, or to this or that situation.
Then there are other problems, threatening things which it seems dangerous to speak of, they are unhealthy or taboo, so we slip away from them.
Real life is always tragic, and those who do not know this have never lived.
I will now give you a very difficult dream of another dreamer, which will call Jar a great deal of patience on both sides.
The dreamer was a young man of twenty-four, well-educated and whom I did not know personally.
The dream was sent to me by a colleague with a few personal notes.
He had remained stuck on his way out into life, not from fear but because he went into it too deeply.
There are cases like that, they understand the world in too deep a sense.
Buddha was such a case.
He was a prince with everything that he wanted in the world, but he knew nothing of the truth of life.
One day he went out of his palace and s aw a strange-looking man.
He inquired what was wrong with him and the man replied ”I am old”.
”Why” asked Buddha, ”what is that ? ”
Another day he met a man who was ill.
”Ill? What i s that? ”
Then he saw a man on a bier and learnt of death.
The shock was so great that he left his palace and went into the desert, but being a hero he returned to life.
There are many people who see life like that and have no more courage to go on. This dreamer’s case is a tragic one.
He reacted with a psychosis; he was put in an asylum and though he was brought out and was quiet at times, the problem was never solved and it ended in suicide.
This dream is a glimpse into a tragic life.
Dream. I am under the Cathedral of Toledo.
There is a cistern filled with water which has a subterranean connection with the River Tagus.
This cistern is in a small dark chamber and there is a snake in the water with eyes that shine like jewels.
There is a bowl of gold close by which contains a small dagger.
This dagger is the key of Toledo and whoever possesses it, owns and rules the town.
The snake was the friend and protector of my friend, whom we will call B.C.
My friend had had the courage to put his naked foot into the snake’s mouth, for he was a child without guile.
The snake had licked his foot and both were very happy in this friendship, but only B.C. knew no fear and when he disappeared the snake was forgotten, nobody cared for him.
I go into the dark chamber and speak to the serpent, I speak with respect but do not feel afraid.
The snake tells me that Spain belongs to me because I am a friend of B.C.
It begs me to grant it a favour, to give it back the boy.
I refuse but think of going down into the cistern myself but eventually decide to send my friend S. who is a descendant of the Spanish Moors.
To risk the descent he must recover the original courage of his race, so I advise him to get the antique sword with the red handle which is to be found in the factory of weapons on the other side of the Tagus.

My friend gets the sword and goes into the cistern and I tell him to pierce his left palm with the sword.
He does this but he is not able to keep his countenance in the powerful presence of the serpent.
He is overcome by fear and pain and staggers up the stairs without the dagger.
I am therefore not able to hold Toledo and I have to leave him there as a mere wall decoration.
This is a dream of fate which gives the dreamer information as to the course his life will take and in this case the actual end was suicide.

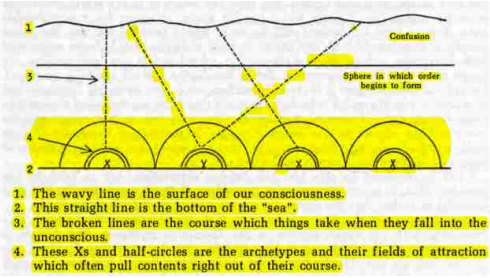
Carl Jung on "Myth," "Archetype," and "Complex." (2015-03-31 14:58)



Lecture XV 22nd February, 1935
I gave you so much material in the last lecture and from so many different countries and epochs, that I am sure you felt that a mythological salad had been produced.
It is very difficult to find the right material just when you need it, and you Lose the thread in the labyrinth.
I am not in the least repentant about this and am only sorry not to have bewildered you still more, with yet more material because then you could get an idea of how things look in the unconscious.
Everything seems to come with bewildering in consequence from all its various layers.
But it would be a mistake to think that it is all confusion, for if this were the case the ordinary functioning of the psyche would be impossible.
If it were really so chaotic, we should receive no support from it, whereas in reality it is possible to keep the thread.
It is no easy task, for instance, to name a string of heterogeneous things; Take the word lamp as an experiment and try to say quickly a string of words which are not connected with lamps.
Very few people can achieve this, and when we find this rare faculty it is usually combined with a certain dry humour, people who are very sick sometimes have this ability as a compensation.
Schopenhauer goes so far as to say that humour is the only divine quality of man.
A man who was to be hanged that day remarked to his jailer: "This week is beginning well".
That i s this faculty in a nutshell.
The foundation of the unconscious is not chaotic, but has a distinct organisation.
The outer world does not support us in continuity, the street is full of heterogeneous things, but we are help ed in continuity by the unconscious, and so protected from many of the accidents of life.
In the East the Yoga practices show a wonderful inner continuity.
This inner order is the foundation of our psyche.
The primeval pictures or archetypes are magnetic points in this foundation and attract the miscellaneous things which fall into the unconscious.
I will give you a diagram to make this clearer: (See diagram page 191.)
When we are able to see through the dark confusion of our memories we come to the archetypes.
We go into the crypt of a cathedral, for instance, and are greatly impressed: after a time we forget the impression in consciousness but it falls into the unconscious and makes another line round the archetype, through this we become aware of the archetype for the first time.

We easily make the mistake of thinking that it was seeing the crypt which started the archetype in our unconscious, but this is not the case, it was there all the time, only we were not aware of it.
Another example is the flood motif which occurs all over the world, the swamping of consciousness by the unconscious; this is caused by the primitive's panic that he might lose his weak consciousness, that it might disappear into the great darkness.
The field of the archetype tends to get larger, as more and more impressions collect round it, it rises higher and higher, and when it touches the surface it appears as a complex.
This is how complexes form.
1 . The wavy line is the surface of our consciousness.
2 . This straight line is the bottom of the "sea".
3 . The broken lines are the course which things take when they fall into the unconscious.
4 . These x's and half-circles are the archetypes and their fields of attraction which often pull contents right out of their course.
To give a practical example.
One is in a house and the light fails to go on in a certain room; someone gets into a panic, the archetype of the cave has come up.
You can attribute it to every kind of outer cause, if you are with a charming girl, for instance, you can think that you did it on purpose, but this possibility disappears if your companion is a dull old man.
Or you can say that there might be a burglar, or that you might fall over the furniture, and every kind of nonsense, but the real reason for the panic is mythological.
We recognise that it is the archetype which has been forming for two thousand years, but this recognition demands a special training.
There is often a dark chamber in the personal life by which the archetype can be constellated.
Many families have a skeleton in the cupboard; Papa has epileptic fits, or grandfather was once in prison.
Children nose out these things and are promptly s quashed, the thick-skinned child, the enfant terrible, persists in his questions but the sensitive child gets a shock from his elder's reactions and this makes a painful hole in his unconscious which he protects throughout his life.
He is always under the impression that other people have a similar skeleton which must on no account be touched.
This disturbs the feeling relationship terribly, for you cannot be human if you have to be constantly on the lookout for fear of touching upon a skeleton.
When things fall into the unconscious, it is only the power of reproduction which is lost; to event is lost, nothing has ever not happened, it is all stored up, and even after ten thousand years can come up in its pristine freshness.
Two years ago I dreamt of a man's face very vividly.
At first, though he was very familiar, I could not place him.
Then I remembered he was a neighbour of mine forty-five years ago, at that time I saw him daily but he is long since dead.
It was very clear, like meeting him in the street, and he brought back all my surroundings at that time very vividly, I saw him with his background.
After ab out a fortnight, the face disappeared and I could not, with the best will in the world, Remember what he looked like.
I could remember his name, however, for a considerable time.
A year later I thought I still knew it, then I found I did not, but when exactly it disappeared I do not know.
In early childhood we become acquainted with fairy tales and we learn mythology in school and in our later reading, we forget most of it in consciousness, but in the depths it is all carefully treasured.
One of our great dangers is that on the surface we do not recognise the important moments of our life and it is in such moments that these mythological themes rise from the depths and present themselves.
The unconscious has recognised the crisis and has warned us in a dream.
If we get the meaning of the dream all goes well, but if we do not, things may go wrong, even to the point of suicide, as happened in the case of our present dreamer.

I felt it necessary to give you this general orientation.
Try to keep an impression of it, it is not necessary to remember all these exact details, but it is essential to realise that the dream we are discussing rises from these depths.
Our discussion of the dream ended with B.C., the dreamer's ideal friend.
This friendship with the snake appears in the Eleusinian mysteries.
The initiate is represented with the snake, as making friends with the most feared animal, the typical chthonic god.
The kissing of the snake or the dragon is a frequent motif in German myths; when someone achieves this (and this is also often the case intellectual life) the dragon turns into a beautiful woman or a fairy prince.
An excellent example of this motif is to be found in the fairy tale of the Frog Prince.
B.C.. was on such good terms with the snake because he was a child without guile, that is he was a child who trusted in life and things.
A mother who lived in East Africa told me the following story about her child of two.
That country breeds a peculiarly deadly and lazy snake called the puff adder.
The East African sun is very dangerous and all children must stay in the shade until four o'clock; mothers take every pre caution to keep their children in the house till that hour.
My acquaintance heard her child playing on the verandah and using very tender language as if to a puppy or a kitten.
She went out to investigate and found the child stroking a puff adder which was looking like a great salami sausage and was lazily accepting the caresses.
She had the presence of mind to draw the child gently away so as not to annoy the reptile.
The guilelessness and credulousness of the child is its protection, children sometimes fall from a fourth story window and are unharmed, so we say they have guardian angels.
This is the attitude that it is necessary to have towards this monster in order to get the key of Toledo.
After B.C.. dis appeared the text goes on to tell us that the snake was forgotten.
When the dreamer descends the snake asks to have the child B.C. again.
If we take this literally it is asking for an impossibility but the snake really asks the dreamer himself to come as this child, to come with his guileless attitude, but the dreamer decides to delegate the disagreeable mission to his friend.
He considered this friend especially suitable for this mission because he was younger, more stupid and less important than himself.
She was very dark and there was even a tradition that he was descended from the Moors.
The dreamer deceives the snake into thinking he will come himself, but really he means to send this friend who is the dark, misty, typical inferior figure which occurs in dreams.
The dreamer distrusts his courage and tells him he must find the earlier bravery of his race.
For this he sends him to fetch his sword from the weapon factory on the other side of the Tagus.
Toledo is famous for its weapon factories.
Again we encounter the symbol of the sword, the man-made sharp weapon, the will that we can direct.
This special sword was said to be very old and to have come originally from Greece.
That means that it is a primeval inheritance of humanity, which is largely in the hands of the white man.
It is with this sword that he has founded his colonies where the natives were without it.
It is what man has had for centuries; intention, insight, understanding and will.
Weak-willed people faced with the Gordian knot, and also people in unsuitable relationships, which should be severed, often dream of such weapons.
He should take the sword and turn it against himself and bore through his left hand. This is a very strange idea.
The left always stands for the unconscious and the right for the conscious : so it means boring through his unconscious.
Left is the side of the great emotions, the Greeks held their shields on the left, it is the inside of the heart is always supposed to be in t h e unconscious.
The dreamer has to pierce his unconscious, when the analyst wants to make an impression on the patient he gives him a piercing look but this dreamer must give the pain to himself.

He must understand his own left side, his darkness, if he could achieve this h e would be able to relate to the snake and to obtain the key of Toledo. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 22Feb1935, Pages 190-193.

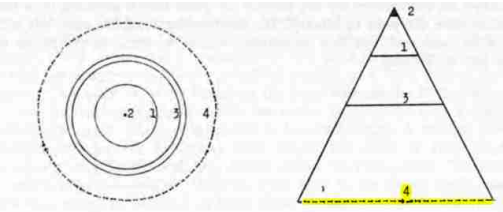
Carl Jung on the Structural Layer of the Psyche from the Individual to our Animal Ancestors. (2015-04-01 06:09)



Lecture XVI 1st March, 1935
In answer to a question I must say that by ”Bild” (image or picture) I intend to convey a more comprehensive idea than just an optical picture, it could also include that which is heard, thought or felt.
Archetypal pictures play a large role in all art and music, as Schopenhauer has pointed out.
A large number of people are still wondering why it was necessary for me to bring forward so many mythological associations in order to understand this dream.
I have already explained this, but I will try to do so more clearly.
We will do this by means of a diagram.
(1) is the smallest circle - the conscious;
(2) is the point in the centre - the ego complex;
(3) is the personal unconscious - a dark zone on which consciousness rests like an island in the sea.
The contents of the personal unconscious are mainly attainable, we can with great effort remember the things which it contains, but there is a trench set round this, beyond which is:
(4) the collective unconscious. I will only represent this by dots, because it is impossible to set boundaries to it.
It belongs to humanity in general and also to the animal world.
I will also draw the diagram in section in order to show that each circle lies deeper than the last.
I have brought with me the chart which we had last year showing the different structural layers extending from the individual to our animal ancestors.
(See Summer Semester, Lecture VII, June 9th, 1934.)
Below the individual comes the family, below that the clan, then the nation, then the European man who possesses a special psychology which makes him fundamentally different from the inhabitants of other continents.
We have phantasies as to what we are, but if we could listen to what a Chinese or a primitive has to say about us it would be highly enlightening.
This unpleasant side of the European we do not, as a rule, see.
Then we come to primeval man and t h e m a n y animal layers which lie in his dim past, if man is stripped you come to the ”bete humaine”.
The deeper we go the more generally valid everything becomes and the less individual.
In the ego we are so many heads, so many opinions, individuals.
In the family, we are still separate from other families.
In the clan we already have very much more resemblance to each other; if we come from the same Canton we speak the same language, are familiar with the same customs, a great deal can be taken for granted with no effort.

You notice it particularly if you have been living for a long time abroad and suddenly meet someone from your home district.
A dream out of the personal unconscious is comparatively easy to understand, but when it comes from the collective unconscious we have to go down to much deeper layers where archeology, mythology, et cetera, represent the common speech.
The details in such dreams represent things which do not occur in ordinary life, e.g. the cavern in which the snake lives.
These details come from a kind of soil which is almost unknown to us.
We cannot examine the unconscious with a psychological microscope and lay bare its structure, if we could, we should see that it begins its work from within, like the crystal.
There is nothing to be seen until the dream or fantasy picture is produced; the archetype could be said to be without content and invisible, a priori it belongs to what the French scientist calls ”les categories de “imagination”.
I am sorry to have had to go into the realms of philosophical obscurity but these things are very difficult.
I will do my best to make them as clear as possible.
To return to our dream, we stopped at the curious theme of the wounding of the left hand.
This is an archetypal idea and a very common motif in men’s initiation ceremonies.
On primitive levels the initiant is even tortured in order to test his endurance, his masculinity.
I have already spoken of similar customs among students.
They are still severe among American students, but here they have become as harmless as Christian baptism.
The question in this dream is, can the young man endure the test of facing the snake?
If he could he would get the dagger, the key of Toledo; but we are told he comes to the surface nearly fainting from pain and fear.
So he cannot hold Toledo and the dreamer ends with the statement: ”I had to leave him there as a wall decoration”.
This picture brings to my mind a lunatic asylum where many patients stand round the wall as passively as if they were statues, pictures or decorations.
This young man did lose his reason, so the comparison is not unsuitable.
Up to the present we have been concerned with the context, now we come to the interpretation.
It would lead us too far if we attempted to speak of the entire meaning of this dream.
We will begin with the end for that often shows us the goal of a dream.
The dreamer had this dream at the beginning of his psychosis so we may expect it to inform us about the structure of that psychosis.
There is a disturbance in the conscious and in the contents of the unconscious, which this dream mirrors forth, we can perhaps find the reasons for this disturbance.
We know there that something is out of order, for such dreams only come when something essential is happening to us.
It is unfortunate that such important periods usually find us too dense to realise their significance and we only know at the time that we suffer from a headache or from fear.
We have naturally no grasp of the situation if we do not know that something essential is happening to us, so the dream comes to inform us.
Sometimes the content brought by such a dream is almost dangerous; some people have such small brains that when they understand, the box bursts, which is a calamity, I have often told the story of the young clerk who , after an unfortunate love affair, s aw the lights reflected in the Limmat and had a cosmic vision of luminous dancing couples.

He was filled with such a sense of personal happiness that he felt sure there was a gold treasure waiting specially for him and at daybreak he was arrested for trying to break into the Urania observatory and soon landed in Burgholzli.
This harmless youth had no idea that he was a poet.
Goethe or Schiller would have made a poem and been freed, but he with his sparrow's brain concretised the vision and it burst his brain.
If he could only have done something with the content, made a picture or a poem, he would at the same time have seen his love story in the eternal stars, and his picture or poem would have been a monument to remind him that no personal sorrow is too great to be dissolved in an eternal picture.
This is a similar case, for our dreamer also fails.
He could do nothing with the content which was brought to him, so the tragic end was inevitable.
It was the dreamer himself who remained as an ornament on the wall.
The dreamer is represented as three people in this dream.
First of all as B.C., t h e boy of seven years old, who is still a hero and a friend of nature, the nature in us.
We can all go in groups and walk on the Zurichberg, but the question is, are we able to take a walk by ourselves?
The second person is the Ego, spoken of as "I" in the dream.
The third person is the shadow - the friend S. - the inefficient one, and it is to him that the dreamer entrusts the mission.
He gave him, it is true, some good advice - to wound his left hand but the shadow could not stand the pain, and yet it is to this figure that all the action is left.
This is a very frequent motif in dreams and in real life how often do we say: "Oh, it will do itself" and we slip the thing into the unconscious and hope that someone will do it for us.
In a way this optimism is justified, it very often is done but it is usually done against us instead of in our favour.
This shows a tendency in the dreamer's conscious to leave things undone, because he does not see the great importance of them.
If we could only realise it when we reach an important turning point in our lives we should say to ourselves Now we must grapple with the situation" but with the dreamer this important moment slips by.
In the dream the moment is represented by his having to face the snake without fear.
The snake equals the inferior psyche , the instinctive man.
This is an image of our original structure, the thing we really are and should be but generally are not.
This tears us in two and we become neurotic.
The dream puts it well.
"Later the snake was forgotten and no one went down to look after him".
This is expressed in very general language, as if it were a universal problem, and that is exactly what it is.
We have all forgotten the instinctive man, we are cut away from him by our rationalism.
It is very important to have a nice house with central heating, and possibly also a car, but we all have an inner need to express the whole personality of man, for what could we do with a horse that is not a horse, or a tiger that tries to be a good tiger and to eat apples.
God made the horse and the tiger to be what they are, but to us it has become more important to be Mr. So and So than to fulfil the primitive task of being a human being. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture XVI 1Mar1935, Pages 194-197.

Carl Jung analyzes a young man's dream. (2015-04-01 15:17)

Lecture IX 11th January, 1935
I will return to the young man's second dream which we were dis cussing when we broke up for the Christmas holidays.
We have seen that the dreamer identifies with his sister who personifies h i s effeminacy, so the wound in his throat is s elf-inflicted.

This is the case of a castration complex, where a young man realises that he is not masculine, but feminine.
This is a very serious condition all the world over; the greatest misfortune that can befall a primitive man is to be transformed into a woman.
When the dreamer deals his sister a blow on the head, he is hitting himself, making himself aware of something, for when a truth suddenly becomes clear to us we feel as if we had received a blow.
The parents are naturally shocked by this violence, for their son has cast off his effeminacy, with which all his affects were bound up, and has become a violent man.
Had they been sensible parents they would not have been delighted to keep a homo-sexual son at home.
We see that this dream is a positive one, it shows where the possibility of a cure lies, it stages the conflict in fact, showing the dreamer his effeminacy, in order that he may free himself.
It marks the transition from an absolutely childish condition to normal manhood. In reality this is a slow development; the dreamer cannot suddenly throw off his homo-sexuality and hurry into matrimony, this would result in only a partial cure, for he would then marry unsuitably.
His b est feeling has been identified with his mother and he would probably seek out a woman who would play the mother role, a harmless situation no doubt, but only as long as the wife can stand it.
On the other hand he might marry the very opposite of his mother, an inferior woman, a cocotte.
The result might be a catastrophe, for she might hand down venereal disease to their children.
It is unfortunate that this diseases is not openly declared like any other, but people only speak of what they call respectable diseases..
Young people who have an infantile relationship to their parents, such as the dreamer has, suffer from a poor constitution, their development is arrested and they reach maturity very late, in this respect at forty they are sometimes really only eighteen.
I am reminded of certain people in high positions, [I will not mention names) people of a high intellectual standing, whose feeling side has remained immature.
In cases of this facultative homo-sexuality the whole psychical side is affected; these men try to give themselves a manly appearance by growing beards, but they usually remain bachelors.
Dream III.
I undergo an operation for appendicitis.
Then I am sitting on an altar in a Gothic church washing myself with Eau de Cologne. (Here occurs a kind of hiatus and the dream continues illogically).
I want to seek out Prof. S.D. who seems also to be Dr. S.
In my first attempt I fail.
The second time I set out to reach him I pass through a jeweler's shop where I meet my mother and admire the jewels.
Context.
The operation for appendicitis recalls a wound in his arm given t o him, when a child, by his sister, who is older than he .
Appendicitis is a dangerous illness, the appendix has to be cut off which suggests the amputation of the penis.
(I would like to mention here that I am not responsible for the language which the dream uses, it is symbolical and does not hesitate to express reality.)
The dreamer is reminded of a friend who used to wet his bed as a child and whose nurse threatened to cut off his penis.
The dreamer once stood in a Gothic church and gazed at a figure of the Mother with the Holy Child in her arms.
It is common for very infantile people to have a mystical, religious feeling, they enjoy this atmosphere in which they can admire their beautiful feelings, but they are simply indulging their auto-eroticism.
To them a thing with Eau de Cologne the dreamer says that he likes the scent because his mother used it as a remedy for her headaches; Eau de Cologne is also inflammable, an alcohol, a spirit.
Prof. S.D. is a well-known figure, he once operated up on the dreamer and saved his life.
Dr. S. is a nerve doctor, he does not preach morals to his patients, but leads them out of their state of depression by a kind of healing power.

This figure then, that combines the Professor and the Doctor, is a life-saver; he has not appeared in earlier dreams, in this one for the first time the dreamer meets him as the doctor who can hypnotize his sexuality into normality. His mother wears rings set with beautiful stones.
It used to be the dreamer's childish delight to accompany her to jewelers where he loved to admire all the beautiful stones.
He wonders if he should return to these places with her?
What do we see in this dream?
The appendicitis shows again a kind of castration.
We have seen that the dreamer was identical with his sister and here the point is stressed, his manly side is cut off.
Then we come to the altar scene where he is the child in the mother's arms, the Jesus child, the pure child of God, soft and delicate as a girl, but a contrast to th e real girl in the family, the naughty daughter who finds less favour with her mother.
While the dreamer washes himself with Eau de Cologne and remains in the pleasant situation, his mother has no headaches, she has nothing to worry about; but this is evidently wrong since to sit in his mother's lap when twenty years of age is dangerous; and to break up this situation the doctor appears.
Here the saving motif of the jewels follows.
Jewels of all kinds mean values, the beautiful things that we prize and treasure.
These jewels are worn by the mother, his values are linked with her, he has invested his whole feeling in her.
He cannot suddenly say "Now I will no longer be homo-sexual, I do not belong to the mother any more, I will not obey her, I will simply leave the house!" for then he would throw over all his capital, he would go out into the world leaving all his feeling values behind, and these cannot be replaced by intellectual gifts.
If he sets out in his way he would just come up against his inferior side.
The dreamer should, on the contrary, take his feeling side with him , but just this p art of himself he has left in the mother and it draws him back to her.
We see that no hope of a cure lies in this direction.
To enable the dreamer to lead a normal life, the mother must first be depreciated, then he can take possession of the values he had left with her and carry them over into his life.
This process entails a psychological development; nobody can speculate as to how this change may take place, it can only come to pass through the experience that life brings.
His dreams must show him other feeling values, other possibilities which will be stepping stones on the path of his transformation.
Already they speak to him of his actual condition in the strongest possible terms.
He must be awake to what destiny may put before him, the unconscious is clearly ready to take the other road, the new road which means another kind of development.
Dream IV –
I am walking with two club friends.
One of them, a medical student, says that he has given Mme L. a morphine injection in the thigh, he cut off the hair on the lower part of her body and she was very angry.
The second friend is in a row boat on the other side of the street, he says "If I throw now, it will resound" and he throws a banana at him which bursts.
Context –
The two club friends are decent fellows, they stand in opposition to his homo-sexual friends, he has taken walks with them in a wood and to the Zoo.
The student friend had told him about Mme L., an old cocotte whom he had known in a sanatorium where she led the doctor astray.
She was a morphiomaniac and was able to get the drug through him.
The dreamer considered all this part of the dream extraordinary, especially the cutting of the hair and the injection of the morphia; nevertheless he was able to find an association with the sexual relationship between the doctor and Mme. L.

The rage shown by Mme. L. reminded him of his sister's anger when he hit her over the head and of his own fear of the bull.
The man in the row boat is a nice fellow, the dreamer associates him with the doctor and also with a student hero.
The boat is an important symbol, just as the automobile was.
It appears specially in the dreams of seafaring people such as the British.
In throwing him the banana, the manly student throws him the sexual function.
The dreamer feels insulted for, as he is feminine and childish, the manly side strikes him in an unpleasant way: the bursting of the banana.
Here again he is thrown into affect as in a former dream when he discovered his feminine side. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 11Jan1935, Pages 170-172.

Carl Jung interprets Dream Associations (2015-04-02 05:51)

Lecture X 18th January, 1935
You will remember the dream and associations which I gave you at the end of the last lecture; we come now to the interpretation.
The dreamer is on a walk with two friends, his associations show that he walks in a wood with them.
The wood is a symbol we meet with very often in dreams and mythology.
It is a dark place where we may lose our way and where unknown dangers lurk, it is the place where "we cannot see the wood for the trees".
Primitives fear these conditions and have invented magic ceremonies to overcome them.
We imagine they are afraid of the wild beasts in the Bush, but this is not the case, for they are acquainted with their ways and it is the unknown which they fear.
When we were first in Africa we thought we must always be armed, but we soon learnt it was safest to have only a stick for wild animals know whether you have a gun or not and what game you are after; the leopards used to come shooting with us, and take our partridges before we could reach them.

So the wood is a symbol here for a dark impenetrable situation, where something is likely to happen but we do not know what.
When speaking of the last dream we said that the next dreams might show a way by which the feeling he left with the mother could go over into normal life.
This dream says that this will happen through friendship, the club friends are efficient, positive people, in contrast to his homosexual friends.
This explains the raison d'etre of young men's clubs and friendly societies and you find the same idea in primitive initiation ceremonies where the initiant is for a time kept away from women.
There are relics of these institutions to be found in some customs which survive among students.
The anger of the old cocotte is his own anger because he is shocked at being a woman.
The masculine reaches him thrown from outside in the form of the banana.
This is a magical condition which has passed into the language.
In Swiss we speak of a sudden cold as "angeworfen", thrown at us, and the German "Hexenschuss" (lumbago] which means literally witch's shot, speaks for itself.
This is a very primitive idea, for the primitives believe that diseases are thrown at them by bad ghosts and witches.
Witch doctors have ice projectiles which can cause illness or even death, dangerous icicles that can return destructively to their homes as well.
When a witch doctor has sent out such a projectile it may kill his victim but he has to take every precaution, for when the icicle returns, it has smelt blood and will try to kill the witch doctor himself as well.
To avoid this he sets up a kind of scarecrow, he hangs his clothes on a stick and hides himself in the woods.
The angry icicle is deceived and rushes into the clothes.
Then the witch doctor catches the icicle and kneads it with his hands until it is tired and all the bad mana has gone out of it, when he can slip it back into his bag.
This is a most unusually psychological conception.
Our projections on other people behave like the icicle, they return to us, we do not remain unpunished when we make projections.
This dream has the form of a magic effect, our dreamer refuses the feminine role so the masculine begins to take the offensive, and unpleasantly.
It returns to him as the bursting banana. It had been badly crushed and smothered while he sat on his mother's knee and many indignant affects were smothered with it, so it was bound to be an explosive return.
The intermezzo of Mme L's affair with the doctor comes next and we get a hint of an intrigue of the dreamer's own with the doctor he was under at the time.
These young people are very charming and flexible in their attitude towards th doctors and unless the latter is very experienced he is easily caught in their meshes.
All patients like to speak of the causes of their neurosis and especially to find a scapegoat to lay the blame on; "If only so and so had not treated me like that how different I should be".
Many patients develop a morbid passion for causal research and unless the doctor is very wary he falls into the trap as well.
The patient's instinct was warned by this dream, he had led the doctor into his own labyrinth, so he decided to leave him and find someone more efficient.
The patient brought these four dreams with him, he did not dream them with me.
I will briefly repeat what each dream means.
The first shows the masculine principle as hostile to the dreamer; the second that he is feminine and wounded in his femininity and the third shows this wound as a castration, for he is still in the mother.
In the fourth dream his femininity appears in a most unfavorable light, the unconscious criticizes him and shows him as a kind of prostitute on the streets and in the Zoo, and the masculine comes in from the outside.

These dreams disturbed the dreamer badly, in the conscious he was still ”mother’s good boy” but the unconscious does not mind showing him as he really is.
The magic appearance of the masculine in the last dream, though unpleasant in form, is a positive event.
Things which are unconscious must come to us from outside, we see them first in other people, they are thrown at us or we have to go out and fetch them in.
Originally the whole of life was outside the human being, it was in the forest and in all kinds of inanimate objects.
The primitive speaks of his canoe and other possessions as alive and of yours as dead, for a piece of his own life is projected into them.
We are born now into a relatively dead world, but even so much life has to be drawn from it before we can integrate all the pieces of our psyche.
We know now that trees and animals do not speak; but the primitive knows that they do and that there are doctor-animals and that werewolves exist.
He knows these things in the same way that he knows there are medicine men; these last are usually very clever people who should be taken altogether seriously.
If you told a primitive that you didn’t like to pass a certain corner because of a bad ghost who lived there, it would be just as comprehensible to him as saying a fierce dog lived there.
A Swiss peasant will tell you he doesn’t believe in ghosts or witches but, if you watch him, you will be astonished at the way his actions belie his words.
A dream gives us unadorned information about the condition of a patient, it is as if a nature- being were stating his diagnosis or taking a child by the ear and telling him what he is doing.
The dream is a higher realisation of what we are; we shall see this still more clearly in later dreams.
We come now to the dream which he had on the night following his first consultation with me.
Dream V –
I am at a concert and the organ is playing Wagnerian music. Mr. So and So is singing on a raised platform and mock him because of the words ”My beloved” which recur again and again.
My elder brother’s cello is standing in its open case.
The cellist is delighted with the cello but notices that the strings are not stretched.
He takes it out of the case and tunes it with enthusiasm.
The cellist then changes into my elder brother, who squirts petrol into the cello with a long instrument.
Flames leap up, but it is not really dangerous, so my brother repeats the process several times in order to frighten two old ladies who are sitting behind.
They are my mother and Mrs. B. and are dressed in black.
There is an explosion, flaming fragments fly through the air and a silver ball appears from the Christmas tree.
My sister says that this year she has only put snow balls on the Christmas tree.
Context –
The dreamer recently went to a Church concert with his aunt.
He reported that he sat passively through it: which is exactly what he does at analysis.
He would like to learn the organ but thinks it is too difficult, so he wishes for a pianola instead!
He does not like Wagnerian music, he finds it too erotic and prefers Bach.
Mr. So and So is still a mother’s son, a dilettante with no profession.
His first wife was burnt to death with methylated spirit. (Mr. So and So is the dreamer, for the latter married a few years later and was divorced, so his first wife also ended in smoke).
The cellist is the brother’s music master and the dreamer associates him to myself.
His brother is in love with his cello and calls it his bride.

He says it is a soulful instrument, it plays on the soul.
The dreamer said that his brother was very like me, I feel sure everybody would know us ap art, but this is the dreamer's way of making a kind of declaration of love!
I equal the brother, and the brother equals the cellist, so I am the cellist.
As he associates the cello to the soul, the strings of the soul are too slack and want tightening up and tuning.
Petrol is energy, so the dreamer thinks that something is likely to happen when his brother pours it into the cello.
The long instrument he associates to a syringe used by a doctor the day before to spray his throat.
It burnt and this leads over into the explosion and firework display.
This idea is already prepared in the former dreams by the Eau de Cologne and the explosion of the banana.
As a child he liked to play with fire and destroyed a thermometer once by holding it in the fire.
His brother was recently present at a technical experiment where an explosion was likely.
The fear of the old ladies is the fear of the parents when his masculinity explodes. Mrs. B. is a poor soul, a friend of his mother's who has lost her fortune, a poor deserted creature, she is a mother substitute, and represents the state of the mother's soul.
The silver ball is a sun coming out of the Christmas tree.
When I asked the dreamer "What about the Christmas tree? " he replied : "Oh well, that is what one does; that is how Christmas is celebrated".
This is our primitive side, like the primitives, we do it and do not know why.
Christmas day is the celebration of the birth of an invisible sun, one of the many heathen customs taken over by the early Church and attached by it to Christ's birthday.
It is a sort of bridge to Mithras, where the birth of the sun out of the tree is the symbol of the birth of Mithras.
The same idea existed much earlier in Egypt where Ra, the sun god, rose like a falcon out of its nest. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 18Jan1935, Pages 173-175.

Carl Jung interprets a Dream (2015-04-02 06:54)

Lecture XI 25th January, 1935
We will interpret the dream about the concert which we read, with its associations, last time.
The concert represents an intensive feeling situation, the dreamer is very musical, he likes to lose himself in sound.
The Wagner music, however, is not agreeable to him because it plays upon his erotic feeling and he finds this unpleasant, as we saw in former dreams, Because of his homosexuality.
But as he likes organ music it is, in spite of appearances, a positive symbol for him.
Herr So and So is the dreamer in the negative form who makes him an object of derision.
He is identical with his anima, but here the masculine comes to him in a more positive form, as he ridicules the mother's son, the homo-sexual youth.
He disliked recognising these facts and, though this case occurred twenty-two years ago, I still remember how he left my consulting room with a red, hot face.
The cellist is a new figure and, from his associations, is connected with me.
I always take dreams literally: I have brought up this figure in the dreamer.
If I let him think of this positive figure as me, I become God Almighty.
This is tempting but dangerous, for you find yourself held responsible for everything that goes wrong.
So it is exceedingly important to be careful to leave positive action to the dreamer.
If the dream actually said that I took the cello out, I should have to accept that situation, but as it is, it is my role to look on benevolently.

Then the cellist becomes his elder brother, his riper personality.
The cello is the instrument of the soul, his means of expressing his feelings.
It is thus that his feeling comes into the world as a masculinity, before it was entirely in the mother.
The tightening of the strings had to be done by myself as well as the patient, it took a lot of energy to pull him out of his half-fainting condition.
This energy is expressed by the petrol being poured into the cello - I was pouring courage into him.
The magical mana of the primitives is often symbolised by liquids: in some ceremonies urine is used in the place of anointing oil.
Dreams speak in the language of these primeval customs.
The mana with which I express myself oils and anoints him, until he comes into himself, and gets the courage and art to live his own life.
I have infected him with my attitude, in the same way that people who are nervous and small-minded can rob others of their courage for life.
The glowing embers are not dangerous in spite of their appearance, but the old ladies are frightened.
This refers to the fear of the parents when he be at his sister over the head in his second dream.
It is in his psyche that the glowing embers are moving about, especially the glowing silver ball.
This ball he connects with the sun.
Christmas is celebrated three days after the shortest day, therefore it is the festival of the rebirth of the sun.
It is when we come to a summit in life that the archetypal symbols appear.
These primeval pictures of human life form the collective unconscious .
Faust is such an archetypal figure in the German soul, he is the medicine man ”par excellence”.
The moment where the archetype appears is always characterised by remarkable emotion; it, as it were, fascinates the dreamer and exalts him, as if the Muse had kissed him not only on the forehead but on the shoulder.
In this moment he is filled with eternity and hope from which he cannot escape, he lives part of the history of mankind, eternal feeling breaks through into his personal life.
One must have had this experience to know what it is.
The archetype can also express itself in a negative or sinister aspect, the ford is such an archetype.
Natives have magic charms and figures of the gods to protect their fords.
Often when people behave in an exceedingly unexpected manner the appearance of an archetype is the explanation; archetypes go back not only through human history, but to our ancestors the animals, that is why we are able to understand animals so well and make friends with them.
We must not forget that these events have taken place in a dream, in real life he just had a red face when I informed him what the dream was saying to him.
An unfavorable element appears now - the sister.
The sister says she hung only snowballs on the tree this year.
He was a mild and gentle youth who had snowballs thrown at him, but could not throw them back, girls cannot throw.
The sister has very cold feeling and the dreamer says he has too, and speaks of it as a family failing.
When this occurs there is always a reason, the feeling is red hot somewhere, it is more than the people can stand so they choose to appear cold.
When people appear cold you can always search for the place where things are too hot for them.
A renewal of life and light comes into this dream, it is a feast of ”joy” or of ”Spring”.
This is especially symbolised by the petrol which is poured into the cello.
The feeling which was in the mother begins to break through and to swamp him. In life, unfortunately, we are very seldom up to such a climax, we do not see these summits until later.
This was the case with our dreamer, fate is not devilish but elfish and chose this moment to bring a new influence into his life.
This new friend was a man of thirty, a youth in everything but years: he came from a narrow background and was a gentle undecided man with a mediocre brain.

He lured our dreamer into saccharine discussions about what homosexuality really was, what he had hoped for from his mother, etc. and our young man fell back for a time into the failures of his youth and lost all the values of his experience.
Dream VI –
I am on an engine, it stops suddenly and the engine driver gets out to look at the signals.
Something is wrong but the engine goes on.
I look anxiously out of the window, as I am afraid another train may come, and it does actually come.
I fear a collision and wake up screaming.
Context –
The engine reminds him of an earlier dream where it was also a church.
The church is the mother, so he is again carried by a large animal - a reminiscence of the happy time when one can be quite passive and be carried about and need make no effort oneself.
The engine driver is a riper personality, he notices that something is wrong and gets out to look for the reason but nevertheless they go on.
The signal he associates with safety regulations, with warnings against collision.
Two things in him are going in different directions so there is imminent danger of a collision.
His fear in the dream reminds him of his own nervous nature.
He is always on the lookout for an accident.
He associates the collision with the fear of the conflict between his new friend and myself as we have such different ideas.
I lead him towards heterosexuality and the friend back to childishness.
The associations make the meaning of this dream quite clear.
The next dream is positive, Nature has great powers of recuperation.
When the dreamer saw that I was not upset, he was encouraged to go on.
Dream VII –
I am with my elder brother in a mysterious castle.
There is a secret room with a locked door in which there is a pool.
We go out into the air.
My elder brother can find nothing better to do than to stir up a wasps' nest.
I am afraid that he will be stung but when I recover from my fears we go on and come to some beautiful flowering cactuses.
Context.
The dreamer can only say of the mysterious castle that such things do exist.
The pool reminds him of his mother and he says of the locked door that he feels one must not go back to the mother.
The locked door is a very frequent motif in fairy stories, i.e. Golden Finger and Bluebeard.
The former is the story of a happy child who was in Heaven.
There was just one door which she was forbidden to open; she felt, however, compelled to do so and there she saw the Trinity, a resplendent vision.
She touched the robe with her finger and could never wash off the gold.
Bluebeard is a French fairy story, it has, however, a parallel in Grimm.
If you wish to understand fairy stories of this kind you must take an eight-day holiday to think about them. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 25Jan1935. Pages 176-178.

Carl Jung analyzes dreams of the Terrible Dreadful Mother. (2015-04-02 10:22)

Lecture III 9th November, 1934
At the end of the last lecture we spoke of the interpretation of the crab-lizard monster from Freud's point of view.

To him it would be an image of childish recollections, when the child seemed very small and the parent fabulously large.
The symbol of the Mother is rich in aspects.
Mother love can be a most positive quality.
We all know what it can be at its best, so there is no need to enlarge up on it, but here we are considering its dark background which is the aspect that seems most important to Freud.
One example out of many will make this clearer:
It is the case of a young neurotic woman suffering from a mother complex.
She loved and admired her mother beyond all reasonable bounds and yet, as quite a young child, she began to have very singular dreams in which the mother figured as a ghost, a witch or a wild beast.
These dreams gave her an exceedingly guilty feeling and made her feel inferior. When she was 14 she forced herself to confide in her 16 year old sister, only to find that the sister had exactly similar dreams.
Their mother was a very instinctive woman; her aims for her children were ideal and she was willing to sacrifice herself very genuinely for them and yet the result of this devotion was such dreams.
This happened because the home was too warm and comfortable; in such ideal conditions the children naturally wish to stay in the nest where they feel so secure, it would be foolish to leave such a pleasant situation for a cold outside world.
A young man also finds it far too nice in such a home, the young girls whom he meets seem stupid and, moreover, they all have one aim ”to get married”.
His mother, with her greater experience of life, is far more interesting to him, moreover she understands her son better and is willing to excuse his moods as no young girl would or could.
So why marry?
Yet if a man is to achieve any independence, or to have children of his own, he must get out into the world; he cannot marry his mother, but the parting often amounts to a tragedy.
Nietzsche speaks of the ”sacrilegious backward grasp”.
A mother can swallow the entire instinctive life of her daughters, the daughters then feel hopelessly inferior beside her and their feelings become hyposensitized in a way that men are never able to understand.
Whether it is hate or love which they feel for the mother, is immaterial.
It is the being bound which matters.
Such girls either have the greatest difficulty in marrying, or even if this is accomplished, in forming any relationship to their children, for their own mother is the Mother.
A man in a similar condition finds himself unable to adapt socially, he often becomes homo-sexual, for all his hetero-sexuality is in the mother, or the available sexuality is of such a brutal character, that it can only be related to a certain type of woman.
These are the causes for the negative Mother motif in dreams and in folklore.
We find magnificent pictures of this problem in myths.
In Red Riding Hood, for example, the wolf (the mother) eats the grandmother and Red Riding Hood herself.
These negative experiences have a very sinister character and belong to the most archaic experiences of mankind, archetypal in character, constantly repeating themselves.
Ernst Barlach gives an excellent picture of such a theme in his book Der tote Tag.
The son, inspired by his father’s glowing descriptions of the world, resolves to ride forth into it, but his mother does all she can to dissuade him.
He disregards her warnings and saddles and prepares his magic horse, but in the night she creeps out and murders the horse; when the son wakes up and finds his steed dead in the stable, he goes mad.
This is a classical picture of the problem, the mother seen in this aspect from the unconscious is a dreadful demon.
If our dreamer were a woman her monster image of the Father would be on parallel lines, but with differences which we have not time to enter up on now.

In mythological motifs the dreadful Mother plays a significant role.
(Here a fragment of a Babylonian epic was read).
This fragment relates the mythological story of the slaying of Tiamat, the dreadful Mother-Goddess.
She is portrayed in many forms in the temples of Babylon: as a lion with dragon's wings , a two-headed serpent, etc.
Marduk, the god of spring, the victorious sun, is chosen to fight her.
His weapons are the seven winds, the cyclone and the net, in which last he entangles her.
She cannot close her mouth into which the winds rush and rend her body; then Marduk cuts her body into two parts, out of one he makes the earth and out of the other, the heavens.
The motif of the net is the attribute of wisdom, it represents the logos and is the net of understanding in which the Mother can be caught.
I will not explain this, but leave you to think it over.
We come now in our dream to the left-right motif; the monster moves first to the left and then to the right, forming an angle in which the dreamer stands.
Here we have Freud's symbolism again, the angle is made by the two thighs of the mother, and the disguised wish is to be there, either to be born, or to commit an incest.
The next image, the rod, is also a sexual symbol; the dreamer beats the monster with it.
Beating with rods is a frequent symbol of impregnation.
It is used as a spring rite; the boys beat the girls with switches or, in other places, sprinkle them with water, this is to make the land and the women fruitful.
Many children are considered a blessing in primitive conditions, but they are a curse in civilised countries!
Mussolini believes, it is true, that we should return to primitive beliefs on this point, but the birth rate continues to fall all over Europe and this is exceedingly fortunate .
These rites were often still more indecent, phallic symbols even being carried through the streets.
Goethe mentions such processions in his "Italienische Reise", where they carried exceedingly indecent instruments.
These customs have since been abolished, but we can still see old phallic field gods being used as boundary stones in the cornfields of Egypt.
All these things are survivals of primitive days when people were more naive.
In old German, the word which now means "to beat" had the universal meaning of "to make fruitful"; beating therefore has a ceremonial significance.
Striking a knight (dubbing him knight) is a similar rite which has for the most part disappeared, though the King of England still uses this procedure.
The idea behind is to convey mana.
The next motif in the dream is the contemplation, this aims at allowing mana to stream from the eyes until it fills the monster with life again, so that the incest wish can be fulfilled. According to Freud's conception, the incompatible wish has found its fulfilment in this dream, though the censor has fortunately entirely prevented the dreamer from being disturbed by any understanding of what is taking place.
For Freud, then, the principal content of this dream is that the man is bound to his mother by his secret incest wish.
This was already shown in the second dream when cramp prevented him from running to the station, although he had big plans and really wanted to get there.
He is caught in the morass of his longing for the mother and his fate resembles that of Lot's wife.
In our dreamer's case the mother is dead, but that is of no importance, it is the Mother Image which is meant.
Freud's chief concern would be to acquaint the man with these facts and help him to free himself from them, so that he could proceed up on his course.
To illustrate this idea I will quote the case of a patient of my own, a doctor, a man of 36 who was unmarried and living with his mother.

For some time I struggled to make him see how childish his situation was, but I made no impression on him whatever.
I then discovered that he made copious notes of his analysis and sent them, after every hour he had with me, to his mother.
By doing this he sterilized the analysis.
At last one day I took him most specially by the ear and said ”Listen, you are just sitting in your mother’s lap” - ”What!” he said ”but you don’t mean that you think I should leave home!” - ”Yes”, I replied, ”I do mean just that”.
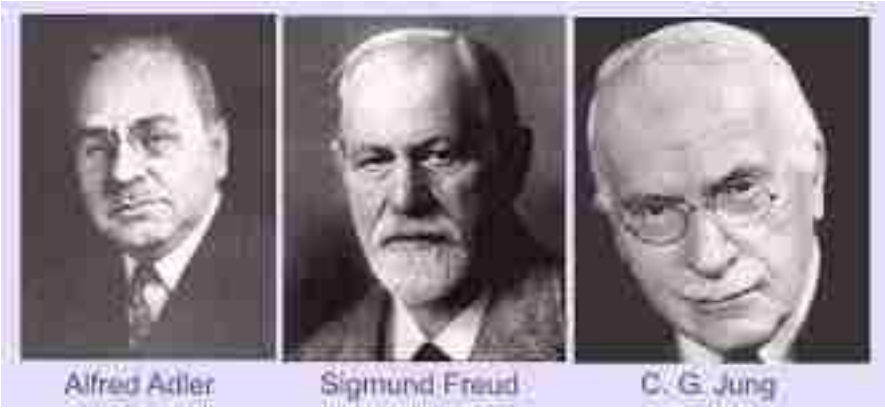
He had a dream that night:
He was standing under a steep hill and wanted to reach the top, but the grass was wet and slippery so it was very difficult, but at last he succeeded.
The mother stood at the bottom of the hill and was trying to climb after him.
He shouted to her not to do so, but she obstinately persisted, slipped, rolled to the bottom and broke her thigh.
This dream made a great impression on him.
He said ”That is my greatest fear, that if I leave her, my mother will be injured.”
The next day he received a telegram saying that his mother had broken her leg!
I will not try to explain such f1 thing, I will leave it to the realm of higher physics!
This dream really says clearly ”It is difficult, but desirable and possible for the man by understanding to reach his goal”, and Freud would interpret our crab-monster dream in the same way and would maintain that our dreamer could also get further if he could understand and renounce the longing for the Mother.
We come now to the next chapter in our theme, namely Adler.
Freud believes in the ”Lust Prinzip” (principle of pleasure).
It is pleasant to stay in the warm nest.
But Adler says that is only apparently so, but that the real urge of man is to make himself felt.
Adler does not indulge in any incest wishes, he wants to tyrannize over the mother, and put himself in authority over her, to become so important that she quotes him all the time ”Der goldene Sohn hates gesagt” (My marvellous son has spoken).
He wishes to sit in the centre of the house and to be lord of all he survey.
This is also a perfectly valid point of view: the will to power principle. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 9Nov1934, Pages 147-149.

Carl Jung on the views of Freud and Adler (2015-04-02 14:26)



Lecture IV 16th November, 1934
We began last time, to speak of Adler, but before we continue to do so we will turn back to Freud, and I will give you a chart so that you may be quite clear about it.

Freud
Fixation through incest.
Infantile wishes.
Repression.
Unconscious.
Conversion.
Neuroses - Symptoms - Allegories.
Freud's starting point is childhood.
His whole psychology is built up on the results of this condition.
Its wishes, shocks and traumas result, according to him, in an incest fixation caused by the infantile rush to stay with the parents.
This wish is recognised as incompatible and is therefore repressed and through this repression it goes into the unconscious.
Freud regards these incest wishes as energies which work obscurely because their roots are in the unconscious and because the moral judgment is forever and again repressing them.
It is from these roots, by a process which Freud calls "conversion of the unconscious", that neuroses and dream allegories (which Freud wrongly calls dream symbols) spring.
It would be too sweeping a statement to s ay that everyone is neurotic, but there are symptoms, or at least small disturbances, to be noticed in everybody.
Adler
Discouragement.
Shirking.
Inferiority.
Over-Compensation.
Fiction Protest.
Isolation.
Unconscious.
Adler also begins with childhood.
It is true that everything must have a beginning and that this beginning is usually early.
Adler looks forward and Freud looks back.
This is an important difference, for Adler thinks that you are discouraged before a task, rather than that you are looking back longingly at the warm past.
According to Adler you are discouraged by the situation in which you find yourself as a child, and this is an incentive to go forward.
You do not desire to return to such conditions, but you shirk before the difficulties which you find on your way forward and seek to avoid them, and this leads to an inferiority.
Inferiority is laming and so leads to a neurosis or even a psychosis.
Inferiority is compensated somewhere by a "Grossenwahn" (a dream of superiority or even megalomania).
A young man, for instance, does badly at college; then a saving idea occurs to him: probably he is a misunderstood genius, and is not among the right people or in the right place.
These thoughts are not often directly and openly thought, they are rather kept as a warm, comforting corner and we steal glances at them from time to time.
This is over- compensation.
Many people spend a great deal of their time in this warm corner and foster all kinds of comforting ideas, even that they are the Messiah or that they are of noble birth and not the children of their real parents, and that one day a coach will appear to transport them to their ancestral castle!

It is also very consoling to read biographies of great men who were also considered stupid in their youth .
We comfort ourselves for our failures by thinking of the other side and how we could shine in the right circumstances.
This attitude leads to avoiding situations where the truth must become clear, and to a general shirking of life.
These fictions give a great insecurity to life, for we constantly give ourselves the ”benefit of the doubt” and never see the outward situation as it really is.
This kind of person is very modest and retiring outwardly, but the inward feeling of superiority is increasing merrily.
We are all acquainted with the type of harmless, retiring individual who is overtaken by a fit of coughing at the softest part of an orchestral symphony; or he arrives late for a lecture (through adverse outer circumstances!) and falls over a footstool so that the entire audience looks at just that ”poor little mouse”.
The ”poor little mouse” is embarrassed, it is true, yet it was the ”poor little mouse’s” own inner phantasy of being the centre of a large stage which arranged the whole thing from start to finish!
These things, when seen through psychology, present a totally different appearance to the generally accepted view.
People with this kind of psychology always find outer circumstances and other people to blame for everything.
If y o u mildly point out to them ”Well after all you do count in the situation too, you are always there when these things happen to you”, they simply will not see it.
According to Adler’s conception this is because their unconscious is a thing which they have arranged themselves for the purpose of only seeing what they want to see.
We keep an unconscious, in fact, to see the mote in our brother’s eye and in order not to see the beam in our own.
Adler calls this the ”masculine protest” .
It is especially obvious in neurotic women.
You can see a socially organised masculine protest in Mrs. Pankhurst and the Suffragettes.
These people become intensely self-conscious, shut themselves away and believe that everyone is studying them, and land in complete isolation.
They themselves have no love for humanity, but are convinced that it is other people who fail to love and admire them.
This is a terrible projection and can go as far even as to become a persecution mania.
These people usually have a ”bete noire” on whom they project their own essential qualities.
This amounts to a complete unconsciousness of themselves and it is impossible to have any orientation in the isolation in which they are.
If you rear a child on Mt. Everest, that child will never know who he is, for we must be surrounded by other people in order to judge ourselves by them, only in this Way canwe see that we are not this, nor that, but so.
Such a man, with a complete unconsciousness of himself, is full of judgement and resentment, he is very critical and feels himself threatened from all sides.
He gets more and more sensitive and susceptible and his very sensitiveness makes him a tyrant to his surroundings; everyone round him is dancing an egg dance in order to avoid hurting his feelings.
This effect is produced by his isolation, which in its turn was produced by his inner phantasies of his immense superiority.
Adler considers the unconscious as a ”quantite negligeable, an arrangement which we make ourselves, almost a pathological product.
He does not think that people repress things into the unconscious, but that they withdraw consciousness from the things which they do not want to see.
If, for instance, you tell a man, such as I have been describing, that he wants to tyrannize over his surroundings, he is unable to see it because he has withdrawn all consciousness from that side, whereas he can produce dozens of examples in order to prove how other people try to pull him down.
Adler’s standpoint is essentially final.
He thinks that dreams may be of some assistance to us, but he does not consider that we suffer from traumatic memories, but that we make use of them and draw them out as weapons from our arsenal to prove that ”even then” people were lined up against us.

Adler does not believe in the censor; he argues that all these contents are able to appear quite freely in dreams because our consciousness is withdrawn from them so that we do not notice them or wonder about them.
He sees the anticipatory nature of dreams; Freud does not see this, but believes that everything in dreams is caused by the past.
Primitives and society, even as late as the Roman Empire, having no feeling for the State in consciousness, were guided by the anticipatory motive in dreams.
They had small dreams and great dreams and the great dreams belonged to the State.
There was an Eskimo leader who led his tribe over the snow to Baffin’s Bay entirely through following his dreams, and the Senate in Rome voted a large sum of money for the rebuilding of the Temple of Minerva, because of a dream.
The dream was dreamt by a senator’s daughter.
I mention these two out of many examples.
Adler is sure that the dream shows how people will behave, and thinks that the dream simplifies the outer situation, whereas Freud thinks rather that it complicates it.
Adler says the dream makes the situation as comfortable as possible, thereby encouraging the dreamer to meet an awkward, complicated outer situation.
Adler in fact thinks that there would be no unconscious if everyone faced up to all their problems in life and the unconscious becomes steadily less important to him.
Freud and Adler alike do not regard the unconscious as a thing existing in itself, but it plays an exceedingly important role to Freud and in his later works he has even acknowledged that things exist in the unconscious which cannot be traced to personal contents.
They both agree that things appear in dreams in a veiled and disguised form.
Adler lays very little stress on dreams, he regards them more as a ”point de vue’, but he believes that the anticipatory tendency in dreams exists as a kind of training, and that because of this dreams give us useful hints and train us for certain ends.
Before certain important decisions in life, for instance, such training dreams appear.
Such dreams do exist.
Two years before I bought a motor, for instance, I had constant dreams of driving a car, of backing uphill, parking and performing all sorts of feats with it.
Since I have had one I never dream of it.
These dreams could also be interpreted in a different way, but then Freud says the only exception to analytical theory is the analyst!
We will now look at our dreams according to Adler’s conception and we shall see how different his system is to that of Freud.
From Adler’s point of view, the dream in the village shows the dreamer in a very superior light it is therefore obvious that he is feeling inferior before some real situation which he has to face.
The dream says ”Look how important you are, a gentleman in a top hat, how impressed the village is and how sorry that you do not come more often. What you have done is just a spring board for what you are to do”
This dream is training him for a further effort, a real jump which is before him.
The train disaster dream is not quite so encouraging, something stupid has appeared and there is a disaster, but if we look further there is an encouraging factor, for the dreamer foresaw the disaster, so he can see himself as a far-seeing person.
The dreamer is a great man in a world of schoolboys; the last dream already prepared us to see that, and now we can observe how intelligent he is to see the danger beforehand. We can concentrate on this point and ignore the fact that it was very foolish ever to make such a big plan, so big that it was doomed to failure.
If we are peculiarly intelligent, we are always compensating an unusual stupidity elsewhere, but we have to get back to our common humanity in order to be able to see it.

The professor who writes a particularly thick book may be writing it to compensate an inferiority complex.
[I am not forgetting that I have written several thick books!)
We little realise the many inferiorities which we compensate all the time; and when we discover an inferiority in ourselves we should not be depressed, no disaster has taken place, but we have discovered our humanity.
We come now to our chief dream, the one in which the crab-lizard monster appears.
Things might have gone wrong in the last dream, but this one opens with a reassuring atmosphere.
It says ”You are in your home, you will tell your plan to this simple woman, who will be immensely impressed and you can do all this by yourself, on foot, it is prodigious!”
When we boast it is to compensate our inferiorities, it is a general human mechanism to take someone else down in order to give ourselves the feeling of having climbed, though one really remains in exactly the same spot.
The hay-makers appear directly after his boast and evidently they are a negative quantity, for immediately afterwards the crab-lizard monster appears Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 16Nov1934, Pages 151-153.

Carl Jung on Word Association Test in solving Crimes i.e. Murder, Theft, etc. (2015-04-03 17:09)

Lecture IX 11 June 1934
There are two questions.

The first is about the stage which the woman in the asylum, after being told that she had murdered her child, passed through before her discharge.
I cannot say any more about this, both because it belongs to professional secrecy and because it is too specialised a field for the general public.
Someone else asks if I could not say more about the types, extraversion and introversion, and also about the Anima and Animus.
It is quite true that the question of extraversion and introversion could have been handled with the functions, but both this question and that of the Anima and Animus are exceedingly complicated concepts which I prefer to handle only after that of the libido.
Psychological typology cannot be clearly defined, it is not just easy labels, but rather a critical apparatus to be used for the discovery of empirical facts.
We should not speak here of concepts hanging in the air, but of facts grown from the earth.
These definitions have grown out of my experience and in order to understand them a certain grasp of the structure of the unconscious is indispensable.
You must excuse me if I am somewhat miserly in the use of concepts.
I have had quite enough of such reproaches as ”demonology” being thrown at my head, and I do not intend to use words without bringing experience to substantiate them.
We have seen the emotional results of association experiments.
If we can find complexes by such methods we should be able to reverse the procedure and with a knowledge of the complex be able to place guilt. It should be possible, for instance, to use the association test successfully to discover a murderer.
The police sometimes avail themselves of this method of investigating a crime.
I once undertook an experiment with Professor Zurcher.
We staged a mock crime, so to speak, in order to see if I could discover the culprit.
I cut a photograph out of an illustrated weekly of an artist painting a picture with a cow and some human beings watching him.
Two students were picked out, one was shown the picture, and the other was not, and they were both sent to me in order that I should discover which was the guilty one, i. e . the one who had seen the picture.
The innocent one came first. All the test words left him unmoved.
Obviously he had not seen it.
The Professor had chosen the best actor in the college to see the picture in the hope that he could outwit me, but he reacted in spite of himself to the words: cow, painter, picture, etc., which I had mixed with a lot of irrelevant words and so was at once detected.
The cause of a real crime was a different matter, but I have used this method successfully on such cases.
There was a robbery once at the Burgholzli, in a room where three wardresses slept.
The contents of a cupboard had disappeared, money, underclothing, a fur, a silver chain, a purse, a receipt from the shoemakers Dosenbach, etc.
When the fact was reported to me I investigated first of all the number of likely culprits.
The room was not locked so at least five other wardresses could have been in it, but I decided to start with the most likely, i. e. those known to have been in the room, and try the word association test on them.
These were four: A, B, C and D.
”B” was the department wardress; ”A” was another wardress, a friend of hers; ”C” was a cleaner who had been in the room but did not sleep there, and ”D” was the Wardress who had been robbed and was consequently cleared of suspicion.
On the critical day ”A” had had a half holiday and had stayed in bed till 12.

”A” and ”C” did not know the contents of the cupboard, ”B” and ”D” did.
It is important that ”B” did.
The test words included many from the known facts, such as: cupboard, open, yesterday, money, fur, Dosenbach, etc., and a few scarecrow words were mixed in, such as: police, shame, arrest.
These last were juicy allusions to arouse emotion.
After the tests ”A” and ”C” were quite quiet with normal pulses, but ”B” was very agitated with a pulse of 120.
Innocent people also get excited, so this is only a suspicious circumstance.
Diagrams “I” and “Ia” refer to the difference in reaction time between indifferent, critical and post critical words.
It will be noticed that in spite of “B’s” fast pulse, “A” has considerably the largest difference between normal and critical.
Chart II refers to other symptoms of complexes evidenced during the experiment.
It will be seen that ” A’s” chart is again suspicious.
Chart III refers to uncertainties, mimicking, insufficient reproductions, holes in memory, etc.
These last often persevere after the shock and can even affect the time before. After a fall on the head, for instance, one may forget not only the shock and the time that one was unconscious, but the time before, even as much as thirty hours before.
This happens also in a small way with a complex; touching every complex is a shock, all traumas have an amnesic effect.
The results of these tests are all rather high, especially in the case of ”A” and ”B”.
They are: ”A” 64.7 %; B” 55.5 %; ”C” 30 %.
This was enough for me to be able to s ay to the Wardress ”A” ”You are the thief, now please tell me all about it.”
Thereupon she confessed without more ado.
A friend of mine once asked me to hypnotize his ward, whom he suspected of having taken his shooting prize, a medal.
I declined to hypnotize but tried to make the boy confess by word association which was immediately successful.
He sweated with fear and came out with the whole story.
In all these cases there was substantial evidence to work with.
This method could certainly be used in detective work, but it is a sensitive experiment and by no means fool p roof.
It is far better to let it alone than to be stupid over it, but the same could be said of photography!
So far we have only spoken of the word association method in its complex hunting role, but it can be used otherwise.
If you observe the patients closely you can, to some extent, place their type by watching their reactions.
Some people, for instance, always react with a judgment, others logically, or literally, and so on, observing the quality of their associations reveals a great deal.
This is a very useful method for exploring family psychology which is a very important field, for everyone originated in a family, every human being once lay quite unconsciously in the lap of the family.
In very early childhood we are in a completely primitive state, and inasmuch as we remain one with our family this state of unconsciousness persists.
This has very strange consequences for until we know what we are made of, what our essential quality is, we are in participation mystique with our surroundings: unless I know what I am I cannot tell the difference between myself and the table.
Distinguishing differences is the essential quality of consciousness, discrimination is the essence of consciousness.
Just amazing things can happen in what Levy Bruhl calls ”participation mystique”.
Participants in this condition do not understand anything, they personify a want of understanding.
Inasmuch as we are in common or mutual unconsciousness we are in this participation mystique.
The most striking proof of this is that we believe other people to be exactly as we are.
The truth is that we do not understand each other at all, there is always a tendency to project ourselves into other people, and that leads to using force and to quarrelling.
It is not any proof of culture to see everyone as exactly alike, on the contrary it is the sign of an exceedingly primitive state.

To think that what is good for us is also so good for other people is simply barbarous.
It is our moral task to see these differences.
We spring from the family, we are originally in participation mystique with the house, the garden, the maids , the dogs, the cats, for we came out of all these.
Just as long as we are unaware of this they all follow us.
Every object from which we originated is still in our unconscious in its original form, and can be discerned behind the individual.
We have become aware of these things there is a possibility of their changing; you can see them, know them, and ’they can develop, but things in the unconscious are merely preserved from decay, they remain exactly the same.
So it is exceedingly important to find the ”spiritus familiaris” and it is possible to dis cover it by subjecting a family to these tests.
Words describing fifteen different qualities are chosen with several referring to the emotions.
These are then applied to all the members of the family and an arithmetical average of the results is taken and you arrive at an average, family type.
It is noticeable that usually the more highly strung members approach most closely to the family type.
Diagram IV is the chart of such a test applied to a husband and wife.
[The black line is the husband and the broken line the wife.)
It will be observed how very closely the lines follow each other, this is because the two are in participation mystique with each other.
They have both been very much bound up in their families and carried over this attitude, even calling each other ”Papa” and ”Mamma”.
Probably both families had had this attitude in an unbroken line since the 14th century. Carl Jung, Lecture IX 11June1934, Pages 122-125.

Carl Jung on the Four Functions (2015-04-04 05:58)

Lecture V 18th May, 1934
It is fairly easy to imagine b eing able to think consciously, to have one’s thoughts under control, but when it comes to feeling it is much more difficult to do so, especially for a man.
To a feeling type however, feeling is really under control of the will to a very great extent.
As a matter of fact it is by no means everyone who can sit down and think out something voluntarily, and it is quite equally possible for someone to sit down and feel something out. It just depends which is your domesticated function.
It is usually women who can direct their feeling, and men who can control their thoughts.
Let us suppose that a feeling type has to go to a p arty, he [or more likely she) will groan over it in thought, or in speech, then when they arrive on the doorstep, they stop and think : “Why there is a nice feeling here after all, it will be all right”.

Then they go to the party and it goes beautifully, everyone says “What a nice evening” and the feeling type goes home and says “Yes, it was a nice evening, but I paid for it”.
This is quite true, it is wonderful what people with differentiated feeling can accomplish with it, especially when they want something!
Of all the functions intuition seems the most unpredictable and unmanageable, most people only know of intuition as the vaguest hunches coming from heaven knows where, but a great many people live by it entirely.
They draw the souls out of things and act according to what they discover by this process, just as if what they dis covered were ordinary every day facts.
All the functions can happen unconsciously just as well as consciously.
People think unconsciously, elaborate philosophical thoughts, you find them in dreams and in phantasies.
With feeling this happens still more.
You often first discover a feeling through an affect in a dream.
For instance you meet a man for the first time, you like him, it is a pleasant evening and you go home with the impression that everything was quite all right.
Then you have a very bad dream about him and discover he aroused a very bad feeling in you, there was something you did not like at all in him, you wanted to overlook it or it would have spoilt the pleasant evening, but it felt itself unconsciously and comes out in the dream.
Unconscious feeling is often to be seen in facial expression, we repress it because it is unpleasant, but we always pay for this later.
Unconscious sensations are usually based on facts which one has seen and failed to register consciously.
A hunter, for instance, got benighted in the jungle and while it was still light he climbed up the only suitable tree in order to spend the night in it.
The ground would have been very dangerous because of the wild animals.
A wind got up and a wild panic seized him, he wanted to leap down from the tree but as it would have been foolish he controlled himself, and as the wind died down so did his fears .
But the next time a gust of wind rose, so did the fears .
At the third time he simply could not b ear it any longer and climbed down.
Immediately the tree crashed to the ground and he discovered the trunk was entirely eaten away by termites.
He thought it was God warning him, but he was a very experienced hunter and would well know the danger of such trees, he must have seen the holes as he climbed up , he did not see them consciously, his unconscious registered them and warned him of his danger by the panic.
Unconscious sensations, and still more intuitions, are in a curious borderland which defies exact definition.
Intuition is never quite conscious.
H.G. Wells in his book “The Time Machine” mirrors a curious machine which does not run in space but in time.
Three wheels can be seen, but the fourth is only faintly visible.
The idea is that we see three dimensions, but the fourth is invisible.
The same is true of the functions. Intuition is never tangible and we know as much of it as we do of the fourth dimension.
Sometimes intuitions and sensations are caused by such things as the holes made by the termites.
An intuitive type, for instance, was in analysis with me.

I received her in my garden room.
She said “You had a man here before”.
I was really amazed as there had been a luncheon interval and she could not have seen him.
She could only say she had a feeling it was so and I subsequently noticed many cigarette stumps on the table and concluded, as I do not smoke cigarettes, that her unconscious had registered the fact and diagnosed a man.
It is a fact that coincidences can tend to heap up.
A professor once said to his students “This is a unique case, tomorrow we shall have another”.
During my own experience in the clinics I saw a very rare case for the first time, seven days after another, and then no more for seven years .
This chain of chance events is in keeping with eastern philosophy and the primitive’s existence is based on such experiences.
Only the other day I took down “Ulysses” by James Joyce in order to quote it to an Englishman, a thing I had very rarely done and certainly not for three or four years.
The Englishman had been in a bookshop the day before and, seeing “Ulysses” on a shelf, had thought “That is a book I should have” though he had never heard of it before.
We think of this kind of thing as chance, but the east has discovered the laws of chance long ago.
Primitives firmly believe in lucky and unlucky days.
At the second unlucky accident they get into a panic and it is almost impossible to proceed that day.
This is considered superstitious, but it is not superstition but observation.
Magic is the science of the jungle.
It is a comforting fact in one way that these intuitions exist because through them some knowledge of the future is possible, but they are dangerous, things never or very rarely happen as they are predicted.
They are not quite predictable, but are rather riddles which appear in order that you may l earn to guess them.
We can be certain that everything which we do not register consciously is registered unconsciously, but the unconscious does not work like the conscious, it is archaic, primitive, and works rather in analogies.
A complete man would have all these functions in the light.
This diagram shows the functions as they are in the case of a thinking type, there is always at least one function which one observes and adapts to reality by.
Take a man such as the diagram depicts, his thinking is excellent, he is most superior and deliberate in his judgments , intelligent and satisfactory in every situation which calls for thought, but p u him in a situation which calls for feeling, in a love situation for instance, and he simply collapses.
He is childish, ridiculous, breaking out into the wild affects that one might expect from a nigger, and, most deplorable of all, his superior thinking is then taken prisoner by the wild affects and his thoughts themselves become worse than ridiculous.
A thinking type does not observe correctly, but he thinks over the situation and arrives at reality in that way.
Any of the four functions can, of course, be in the light and the two auxiliaries can be half in the light.
This can swing on its axis and you get two functions in the light and two in the darkness, but there is always at least one function down in the primitive undifferentiated dark, the inferior function is never in the light, so every thinker is a feeler in the unconscious, but an explosive one.

Thinking Feeling
Here we have a diagram in which an attempt is made to represent the functions by colours .
All sounds have colour, which we call colour illusions or coloured hearing.
Thinking is generally, almost always, represented by blue, it is connected with the air, with the spirit, primitives use birds or feathers to represent thoughts.
Feeling is often represented by red, because of its connection with heart and blood.
Intuition is the beginning of the real uncertainty, it is sometimes represented by white or yellow, like the rays of the sun.
Sensation is often green as it is connected with the earth, and the earth's surface is green.
The idea of the functions did not originate with me but was discovered by the Chinese centuries ago.
It is true, however, that I stumbled up on it without knowledge of the east and only afterwards found the parallels to my own discoveries.
There is a zone in between the functions in which the two neighbours mix.
In the place where thinking and intuition mix, for instance, you get speculative thinking and in different degrees.
Schopenhauer was primarily a thinker and secondarily an intuitive, whereas the quantities were reversed in Nietzsche.
He was primarily intuitive, and a thinker secondarily.
On the other side of intuition is intuitive feeling.
This sphere usually belongs to woman, who feels through the heart.
People in the zone of sensation-feeling always try to put their feeling through in the objective world and usually make nuisances and bores of themselves in the process.
Empirical, or sensation thinking, is the realm par excellence of the scientist. Carl Jung, Lecture IV, 18May1934, Pages 102-105.

Carl Jung answers questions on the "Four Functions." (2015-04-04 07:41)

Lecture V 25th May, 1934
There are a great many questions about the last lecture.

The first asks if the feeling-sensation type is always a social bore?
They do not spend their whole lives in boring society, but this is the negative aspect of their type and they are incline d to have this effect in social situations, but in their positive aspects they are often artists, poets, and especially musicians.
Then there are several questions relating to intuition, which is not surprising as it is exceedingly difficult to grasp, or to render tangible.
Its very essence is its intangibility.
Logical concepts are tangible and possible to grasp, but empirical concepts often intersect each other, you never see them separately and clearly.
Intuition is still more difficult to define clearly because it is an apparatus which is invisible, a perceptive function working through the unconscious.
You cannot reduce intuition to the terms of the three other functions, though it can clothe itself in all of them, as we saw last time in the examples of the hunter in the tree and the cigarette ends, but very often you cannot tell at all how intuitions come.
It is highly necessary for us to realize that we do not know everything, that we stand indeed only at the beginning of our knowledge, at the very beginning of the things which it would be possible for us to know and intuition lives on this border of our knowledge.
Though intuition is perception via the unconscious, the contents of it often appear as finished totalities, its character is that of a given fact.
Spinoza thought it the highest type of knowledge that exists.
Intuition concerns itself with many fields.
Some people can intuit the weather, others can foresee the movements of the Stock Exchange, &c. &c.
Another question which is asked is why intuitives do not break the bank at roulette at Monte Carlo?
There was indeed a patient of mine , an intuitive, who, coming to the end of her money, travelled to Monte Carlo to recoup.
I protested that this was very dangerous but she replied that it would not be for her.
Later I saw her there and I asked her if she had done what she came for.
She replied “Not yet”, but every day she went and watched until her series turned up.
Then she staked for the first time and she always won.
I asked her why she did not go on and break the bank.
She replied because she only knew one or two series for certain and after that it was dangerous to go on, because she always lost.
Intuition is really like that, it can only be used to gain a certain modest advantage.
If an intuitive is really at his last penny, intuition appears to have an interest in just giving him enough to go on with but no more.
Intuitives are often very poor because they never wait for the harvest.
Every situation is a prison to them, they crave for new possibilities and can only use their function to a very limited extent in a situation.
It is as if it will only just nourish them, if you want more you must turn to another function.
We have four functions so as to be able to meet all situations.
Kant, who could think so marvellously, and could write ”The Critique of Pure Reason” was sadly at a loss in personal situations where he found himself forced to use his most inferior feeling.
There is what we might call a fifth function over all these four functions: the will.
This is a peculiar function set above the others with a certain quantity of disposable energy in direct relation to the ego.
It is like a mobile unit, not kept in any definite place, but at the direct disposal of the general of the army.

The ego is free to use this dynamic function, but only under certain conditions of its own.
It cannot be used under every condition.
If, for instance, you are very tired, and have already used all the energy available for it, then it is not in working order.
It is free in as far as it has available energy.
This is a product and a kind of inherited reservoir of civilized man.
Primitives have no will, it is won by culture and civilization.
It is not to be confuse d with instinct.
The primitives have only instinct.
When the will is dreamt of it is as a man-made instrument; a knife, or a sword, or something of that kind.
The primitive has plenty of instincts, but no will, things just happen to him, it is exceedingly important not to confuse will and instinct.
When I was on the Mt. Elgon I camped near a particularly primitive tribe whose speech was like the song of nature, and I told a runner to take some letters to the white man who lived by the big beast [the train).
The man did not move, he took no interest.
I tried an interpreter, but there was still no interest, so the head boy had to bes ent for.
He said: ”This is just a poor native”, [the head boy was just as black as the other,) ”You cannot talk to him like that, you must do it this way”.
Then with a whip and a great many gestures he got the man into a great state of excitement about the letters of the white chief and about the other white chief waiting for them at the big beast and he drew a picture of the runner as the arrow in between.
Suddenly the man dashed off and ran 120 kilometers without stopping.
This is absence of the will.
He understood the words but had no inclination whatever to go, so a rite d’ entree was necessary to get him started.
Among the Australian natives if a man is murdered by someone in the next tribe, it is of no use whatever to hold a council to tell them about it for they are not in the least interested; they have to be worked up into a state of rage, pulled by the beard, have coitus performed up on them, until they are really angry.
Then they dash off, and if they meet a man of the next tribe they kill him and the matter is settled.
But if they do not meet one soon their rage wears off and they go home and everything has to be started all over again.
A tribe is just a lazy mass, with no energy at its disposal, everything has to happen to it.
Will is always the sign of a high cultural level.
In this diagram we think of the conscious as an area or field, with sensation as the superior function.
It could, of course, be drawn equally well with any of th e other functions as the superior one.
The centre is the ego.
What is the ego?
This is a great secret, and a riddle which we cannot answer satisfactorily, but only very vaguely, for the sensations of the body, thoughts, feelings, surroundings, etc. all go to make it up.
Nothing is conscious that is not related to the ego.
This further diagram includes other things which go towards making up the ego.
(1) is the zone of memories.
(2) is the zone of subjective portions.
We can have no thought which registers or becomes ours without something coming up from inside us to meet it.
We make the great mistake of thinking that children are born a tabula rasa, but this is not the case.
They are born with a vast inherited memory which contains a subjective content to meet everything which they contact externally.

When someone says to us: ”What do you think? ” we give out one thought and keep back all the others, for we always have many more thoughts which we lock away in order to develop just the one.
This is often very wise for many of our thoughts are far too subjective for other people and the same is true of feelings, sensations and intuitions.
We are very strange and unbearable inside to other people.
If it were not for this we should be without individuality and should be just termites.
The subjective portion stands before the ego and forms a sealed chamber already in the neighbourhood of the unconscious where we keep everything which we do not and will not stand.
The ego is like a round ball, one side is rather plastic and passive and we are apt to project pieces of this on to other people.
We do not think ”I had a dirty phantasy”, but, ”someone roused it in me”.
(3) is the zone of affects and emotions.
Emotions are often confused with feelings but this is all wrong.
Feeling is a valuing function, whereas emotion is involuntary, in affect you are always a victim.
If I am a great artist, I can act an emotion, but this is not affect, I am not overcome by it.
If someone is terribly emotional we say: ”Sleep on it till you are quieter”.
Affect is undomesticated primitivity, annoyance can still be a feeling, but when your head begins to burn and you find your heart and pulse beat, then it has gone over into an emotion.
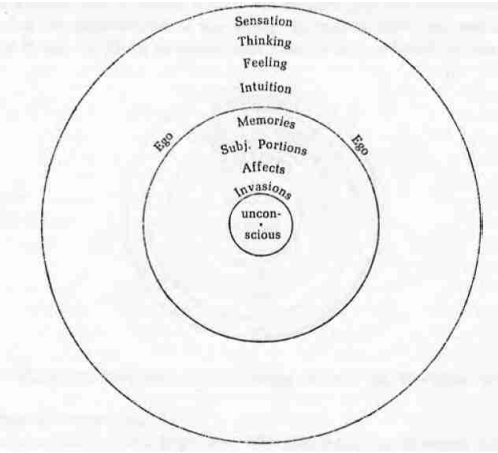
(4) is the zone of invasions where unconscious contents break in. Carl Jung, Lecture V 25May1934, Page 106-109.

Carl Jung on Affects and Customs (2015-04-04 14:50)



Lecture VI 2nd June, 1934
There is a question asking what individuality is, but to answer it would lead us too far for we are not at present concerned with the individual, but with the ego.
Our present material consists of that which touches the ego, the individual or Self reaches far beyond this, it is only in the evening of life that we can say who we really are .
In this diagram the outer circle is the superior function.
This can, of course, be any of the functions, with the condition that its opposite becomes the inferior, or inmost, function.

In this case, sensation is superior, thinking comes next, feeling follows, and intuition brings up the rear.
The intermediary circle is the ego, next to it, on the inner side, are memories, secrets which have to be guarded, subjective portions, etc.
Affects and emotions come next and lastly the invaders from the unconscious which we did not have time to speak of in the last lecture.
These invaders have the character of being completely foreign to us.
Affects have already something of this character, they possess us, but we are still able to exercise some control over them with the will and to explain them, to some extent, rationally.
The invaders, however, are completely irrational, they appear from the unconscious with no conscious mitigation and take us entirely by surprise.
If we allow them to appear outwardly they astonish our neighbours as well.
A sudden mood seizes us, or an idea possesses us, it has no connection whatever with our conscious occupation at the time.
You are listening to a lecture, for instance, and if it is boring, to have phantasies is explainable, because naturally it is nicer to play with something more amusing than the lecture, but if you really want to listen and still cannot attend, the invader shows its autonomous character more clearly.
These moods or ideas, even among healthy, so-called normal people, can go over into illusions, sometimes phantastic illusions, and even hallucinations.
Goethe's vision, and St. Paul's are of this order, as are, also, the contents of neuroses and psychoses.
Beyond this comes the inner circle, the complete dark, the utterly unknown, the unconscious, the meaning of which is "that we do not know".
This is a no man's-land out of which the invaders come.
It is not even possible to prove that these things exist when they are in the unconscious, for the essential character of the latter is that it is unknown.
We postulate that things are preserved in it for memories and such things come out after years of conscious forgetfulness in a whole and preserved state.
It looks as if they led an existence in the unconscious from which they walk out at the right opportunities.
We can make hypothetical postulations as to their character, as is done in modern physics about the contents of the atom, though opinions are sharply divided up on this subject.
We can make certain distinctions in the contents, the personal contents, for instance, differ from the collective ones.
(1) Personal contents are such things as memories; things of every kind which we forget, but which, apparently, remain stored up and break through Whenever there is a favourable opportunity. We assume there is a top layer consisting of these.
(2) Collective contents are essentially different in character, but the difference is difficult to recognise because they frequently clothe themselves in personal material. It is only after a careful study that you can discover them and see that they have merely enriched themselves with things which they have borrowed from the personal layer.
When they do this the patient usually handles them as his own, but this is quite wrong.
The personal unconscious is, to some extent, our own material, but the collective is not so at all.
This is all very abstract and should now be made clearer and nearer by examples.
The very existence of the collective unconscious is still a disputed concept, and is exceedingly foreign to the intellectual.
Only the other day I met a French scientist who said "But surely it is a very mystical idea".
I replied that I did not see how it could be called mystical for it was really a very practical idea.
How would it be possible for us to understand other people if there were no common, human unconscious?
We can, even, to some extent, understand the most primitive rock paintings from this general human background and our very languages point to common roots.

Some of the Elgonyi natives speak of their parents as Baba and Mama, only Baba is mother, and Mama father.
If you take an apple from a monkey he gets angry exactly as a human being does. Through the animal consciousness in the collective unconscious we can reach very deep layers indeed, the period of primitive man is very short compared with the animal period.
When people dream of flying they make swimming movements in the air pointing back to amphibious stages, probably the ancestors of man spent the longest time in the amphibian stage.
We are apt to think of ourselves as very modern, but do our modern investigators re ally know what they are saying?
They are always remarking in books on primitives how exceedingly primitive they are, because they do not know what their customs mean.
It is true that they do not.
The natives on Mt. Elgon spat on their hands and threw forth their breath to the rising sun, and they could not tell me why.
But what about our own customs of Easter and Christmas?
Suppose that instead of camping on Mt. Elgon we had pitched our camp on the Zurichberg and studied the habits of the inhabitants in their ”kraals”.
One morning Herr and Frau Meyer would come out into their garden and do mysterious things in the bushes.
We should ask ” what are you doing?
Have you hare idols there, and do the eggs represent some fertility or magic ritual?”
They do not know.
How very primitive these people are!
I assure you, however, that it is exceedingly difficult to know what the Christmas tree means.
It reaches back far into the past and has many ramifications.
We always assume that there was a heroic age when our forefathers knew the reason, but we deceive ourselves, they never knew, we know more than they did. It did it, and at last someone said ”What does it mean?”
We are very slowly waking up from a deep sleep in participation mystique; men did not think, they ”were thought”.
To say ”Why do we do this ” ; or, ”What does it mean? ” is the beginning of thought, before this the unconscious forces us to do these things.
When the sun rises in the tropics it is a moment that hits people in the heart, it forces the Mt. Elgon natives to do something.
In the mountains of Switzerland you hear people shouting with joy and they shriek at the bathing-places as they go into the water.
Why? Because plunging into another element, the cold water, or greeting the sun from a height, are impressive moments, and we must do ·something to celebrate them.
In bathing you have exposed yourself in a somewhat risqué costume and you want an outlet for your feelings.
We always put everything on to our parents or forefathers.
We make them responsible for everything and we think we have explained something by this, but as a matter of fact we have not.
When we hide Easter eggs, it means that we are expressing an unconscious thought, that thought is - ”Now it is the time for the beginning of new lives, ”Everywhere there are young things” and we are moved by this thought as the primitives are by the rising sun.
The primitive word ”Roho” means spirit, in many languages the word for spirit is almost identical, we do not know how to translate it in the Bible.
The Holy Ghost, the breath which goes between the Father and the Son.
The primitive breathing into his hands as the sun rises is saying: ”Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit”.
Sunrise is an unbelievably impressive moment on the equator, in four minutes the uncanny night has given way to the glory of the rising sun.
There is no twilight, day changes immediately into night, and vice versa.
We laugh at the people who rush up the Uetliberg to see the sun rise but, when we experience it, we are caught in it too and are touched to the core for we too are human.

The unconscious contains not only memories but also the germs of the new, creative seeds.
Everything springs from the collective unconscious.
Much of Christ's te aching is also to be found in the teaching of his cousin Mithras.
The collective unconscious is a source in which all the past and all the future lie, it does not belong to the individual, but to mankind.
I am nearly responsible for my personal unconscious, but not at all for the collective unconscious.
When the sun rises it is not a personal matter, but a completely impersonal one, there is no one who is not concerned by it and everyone is impressed.
When the new moon rises, or the full moon, it is a generally human matter and we are inevitably affected by the emotion it causes.
If we are in a crowd and do not understand a joke, we are still forced to laugh, for we are caught by the emotion of a crowd if we are in it.
This is illogical, but a fact.
People are not impressed by unrealities and it is useless to say "nothing but". Perhaps if I had not been a psychologist I might lie about it and pretend it all meant nothing to me, but as it is I am willing to stand for it and to admit that such things move me also.
If we are not moved by them, we are out of touch with general humanity, with the quality of being human.
This is just the quality which we are repressing so determinedly in this age.
But this is all wrong.
It is not that all these things are good, or desirable, but that if we suppress the generally human we become too intellectual and live by "isms".
It is far safer to admit that we feel just as all other human beings do about these experiences, and to accept our general bond of feeling.
The unconscious cannot be thought of as the old Swiss said of the brain: "It is like a saucer of macaroni".
The unconscious is a living being with its use, object, and goal, and is eternally looking for a way to reach that goal - a way which is not our personal one, but the human way, mankind's way.
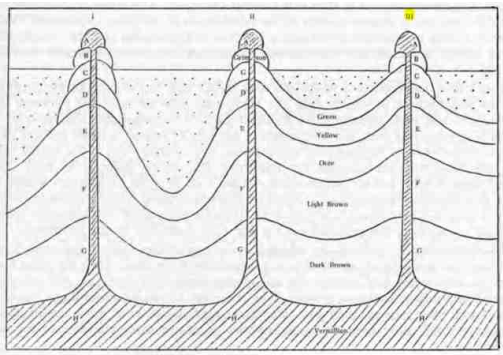
This realisation is the beginning of the effort of western man to get out of his narrow, intellectual way. Carl Jung, Lecture VI 2June1934, Pages 110-113.

Carl Jung on the Collective Unconscious and Word Association (2015-04-04 18:15)



Lecture VII 9th June, 1934
I have a question here about the collective unconscious but I cannot describe it in detail.
I can only say that it appears to be a living organism, containing as much of the future as of the past.
We can understand people better from their future than from their past because they are moving away from the latter and going towards the former.

The future consists of things that are not yet, but in the unconscious it is as if they had always been.
Future events are all there in seed, already formed, only we have no way of explaining them; the language of the future is, so to speak, not available.
When we try to explain the future, necessarily we use the language of the past and that is wrong and misleading.
The unconscious is always creatively developing the coming time, forming it out of the old and the past.
Usually it is built up on an archetype.
We have already spoken of archetypes, they are images of typical situations ingrained in the depths of man's soul; myth motifs which crop up all over the world with astonishing similarity.
There are, for instance, archetypes of fear, fear of the pass, fear of the ford, for example, where dragons, snakes, etc., lurk.
The legendary king could only kill the dragon when he was in an archetypal situation.
The death of King Albert of the Belgians could be explained in this way; it was as if something had been waiting to murder him, watching for a suitable opportunity, an archetypal situation, in which to fill him with panic and destroy him.
The fear of the ford is a very real one in tropical countries and is a panic which frequently assails people who live in lands where there are no such dangers.
"In the Shadow of the Bush" by Amery Talbot, is a book in which the panics of the bush are very well described.
He once came to a stream with his wife and a party of natives.
The natives refuse d to cross which surprised Talbot as the stream was too small for crocodiles.
At last he ascertained from the natives that the stream was haunted by the ghosts of snakes and a cobra actually did rear up between himself and his wife as they were about to cross it.
Talbot describes the panic and the archetypal fear which this incident aroused in him.
You are simply hit by these things in the bush.
They are not of any objective importance to us here, but there are other crossings in our psychology, psychological difficulties.
Or they may appear projected on to such a situation as crossing a street, and a motor suddenly becomes a crocodile, or if we are too much absorbed in our inner problems the attention is called off the outer world and we run the risk of such a panic being constellated and of being run over.
In going to a certain place one day on Mt. Elgon my way led through a wood.
The usually willing natives complained that they were tired and the corporal made every kind of excuse and complaint.
By using the simple and effective method of walking behind them with a whi , I force d them into the wood.
But they showed such signs of anguish that at last I said to the corporal:
"You are usually so efficient, what is the matter with you?"
He would not say anything, but when
I whispered in his ear the taboo word "Ghosts?" the corporal, greatly relieved, replied: "Yes, ten thousand".
I saw then how it works on these people and how real it is to them.
It is exceedingly uncanny to walk in a bamboo forest on the trail of a rhinoceros, you are never sure you will not meet it, and you have to stoop as you walk because the rhinoceros is shorter than man.
These are the only paths and they are unpleasant enough, even for a European, but the green twilight, with its impression of being under water, where all is still, damp and dead, overcomes the native completely.
He is much closer to the collective unconscious than we are; we have a comparatively thick layer of consciousness on the top which is only occasionally broken through, but the native spends nearly all his time in the unconscious.

When I first arrived in East Africa, an English farmer, who had been settled there for years, said to me:
“May I give you a piece of advice ?”
I said that I would be only too glad and he replied:
”This is not man’s country, it is God’s country.”
And the longer I was there, the more I saw the truth of his remark.
Nature is overwhelmingly impressive, and man seems to come only after the elephant, the lion, and the giant snake.
The collective unconscious is not only a universal phenomenon, it is possible to some extent to differentiate its contents.
The following diagram will help us to do this:
A. Individual (highest point) Vermillion
B. Family Crimson
C. Can Green
D. Nation Yellow
E. Large Group (e.g. Europe) Ochre
F. Primeval Ancestors Light Brown
G. Animal ancestors in general Dark Brown
H. Central Fire Vermilion
I is an isolated nation
II and III are nations belonging to such a group as Central Europe, or China and its neighbours.
The individual is never alone but always has his whole family, and even clan, behind him.
Two members of the same clan, who are not related, may look like brother and sister.
Just as physical traits, such as the Hapsburg lip, appear again and again, so do the traits of a certain psychological structure.
You think you have married an individual, but you find you have married a family.
This becomes very clear in the children. Physical and psychological resemblances to the whole clan appear.
Everyone is accompanied by a kind of spiritual familiar, invisible indeed to himself, but often exceedingly obvious to other people.
This is made, not just of the immediate family, but of the entire clan to which the individual belongs.
National types are also very distinct.
This is especially the case with somewhat isolated nations, islands, or peninsulas.
An Englishman has a totally different psychological experience to that of a Central European.
Still more pronounced are the different racial characteristics of the inhabitants of different continents.
There is such a deep psychological difference between the European and the Asiatic that some people maintain that the Chinese psychology must always remain a riddle to us.
You know that there is a technique with which one can undertake the analysis of the unconscious.
It begins with the conscious, goes on with the personal unconscious, and goes spirally towards the collective unconscious.
This process is usually a very long one, and sometimes it appears to follow a circle instead of a spiral.
The roads in the personal unconscious are broader, and those which lead to the collective unconscious are narrower and more difficult to find.
The complexes of the personal unconscious are built up over the archetypes.
When, at last, the collective unconscious is reached, there is a spiral which eventually leads to a centre, but here again it is very easy to circle , instead of following the spiral.
We get away from the personal circles and find ourselves in the historical.
There are certain methods by which we can constellate these inner actualities, but the vast majority of mankind is not concerned with them.
They do what they have to do naively and piously, do not worry about their motives, and are convinced that introspection is morbid.
It is true that it can be exceedingly morbid, but if you look into yourself in a legitimate way it can be a most useful occupation.

We will now examine some methods of ascertaining contents of the unconscious..
Word Association Method.
In this experiment a series of test words is given, the patient must then say only one word, the next word which occurs to him.
He is told to react as quickly as possible, and the pause is measured in fifths of seconds.
This measure is quite accurate enough.
To use still more exact methods would be shooting sparrows with cannons.
The experiment is repeated to test the patient's memory.
Word, is the test word.
Time, is the amount of time which elapses before the answer, measured in fifths of seconds.
Complex symptom, is a disturbance, the patient pauses, says "Oh", repeats the test word, or uses two words in reaction.
Repetition, indicates whether the patient is able to remember the word with which he reacted when the test words are repeated to him.
X means Yes, and - No.
Word Time Complex Symptom Repetition
Water 4 0 x
Round 4 0 x
Cbk 5 0 x
Swim 6 0 x
Grass 5 0 x
Blue 7 0 x
Knife 20 3 -
Help 15 3 -
Weight 10 1 -
Finish 8 0 x
Mountain 6 1 -
Fly 5 0 x
These are twelve out of the hundred experimental words which were used.
There is a period of disturbance from 7 to 11.
There were also periods of disturbance in the words which I have not given, starting from the words "pointed" And "beat".
This patient was unknown to me, I knew nothing whatever about him.
When I asked him if he had noticed that sometimes he had paused before answering, he replied "No".
I then asked: "Did any of these words stir up memories in you?"
He said "No, I just answered. "But when I told him what the words were which had appeared to disturb him, he wanted to leave the room, and evidently felt exceedingly uncomfortable.
When I said that there must be some memory connected, he refused to speak.
At last, however, I got the story out of him.
When he was quite young he had lived abroad and had been put in prison for six months for wounding a man with a knife.
It was years ago, he had left the place, no one knew of it, he himself had quite forgotten it, but there it always was - his skeleton in the cupboard, the hidden complex which was revealed by this method which unveils hidden disturbances.
If I had asked him directly if anything disturbed him he would have answered "No".
For the complex was too deeply buried, he really believed that nothing did disturb him, but there it was, always lurking, ready to spring forward at the slightest opportunity.
To anyone who observed him closely there was a faint flicker of the eyelids visible whenever the word "knife" was mentioned. Carl Jung, Lecture VII, 9June1934, Pages 114-117

Carl Jung releases a Woman who Murdered her Child from an Asylum (2015-04-05 08:12)

Lecture VIII 15th June, 1934
It is possible to unearth all kinds of complexes by the use of test words.

People vary very much in their attitude to their complexes.
Some try to live with them, others to forget and ignore them as much as possible, and others, even with the best will in the world, are unable to remember them.
It seems to be impossible for them to contact them at will, their complexes remain absolutely unknown.
I will mention a few more cases where the association test was used.
Case 1 is that of a foreigner whom I visited in his house.
He became impatient after only 15 words and asked if I could not already draw some conclusions.
It was really far too early, but I consented as he was an old man, about 70, with the wall into the next world already wearing thin.
I told him that I had drawn three conclusions:
(1) that he had trouble with his heart and was nervous about it;
(2) that he was in financial difficulties, and
(3) that he had tender memories of a woman whom he had known many years before and who talked French.
At first he pretended that he could not remember any such woman, but he denied it in a way which showed me that I had hit the nail on the head.
The words which had led to these conclusions were:
Money Little Death Dying
Heart Bad
Kissing Delightful
Paying La Semeuse
There was a very long pause after the last word, at last these French words came.
That it should b e a coin was only natural, but why ”la semeuse”?
This appears on French coins, and it turned out that the man, as a student in Paris, had had a love affair which made much more impression on him than he realised; that he h a d angina pectoris; and that he was in considerable financial difficulties.
There were disturbances in reaction to all of them, but the reaction words are fairly obvious except in the case of ”la semeuse”.
Case 2 was that of a well-known and learned psychologist.
Out of 20 test words, 3 were marked by very long reactions, and in 15 out of the whole 100 he answered with the word ”fear”.
I had asked him: ”Are you perhaps afraid?”, but he vehemently denied it and persisted in his denial even after being shown his reaction words, and being asked: ”Who then is afraid? ”
It is entirely against my principles to force people to admit anything against their own determination, but by all the rules of the art it was perfectly clear that he was terribly afraid, but that his conception of himself as a public man was more important to him than the recognition of his own fear. In a public position, it is expected of one that one should never be intimidated, so he kept his fear complex a secret, even from himself.
Case 3 was that of a woman of 30 who was slightly neurotic.
I was consulted on her behalf by her husband, who said that from the beginning of their marriage, which had now lasted 3 years, his. wife had been madly jealous, though he had given her no cause for it whatever.
His appearance made it quite easy to believe this last statement!
She was extremely prudish, and always refused to undress with her husband in the room, in fact she insisted on a separate dressing room, which is always suspicious, and the fact that her sister was expecting a child must never be mentioned in her presence.
Otherwise the marriage was a very happy one!
saw the wife afterwards, but got very little out of her.
She said it was stupid of her husband to have consulted a psychologist, as she did not wish to discuss her psychology.
She maintained that she was very happy in her marriage, she admitted to fits of jealousy, but she was quite sure they would pass.
Jealousy is always an extremely suspicious symptom.

She was a Catholic and her husband a Protestant.
She denied, however, that this was any problem, saying that they had talked it out and settled it to their mutual satisfaction.
The first word to produce a disturbance was ”yellow”.
replied with ”Jealousy”.
I pointed out that this looked as though she were jealous of her husband, and she admitted that she was afraid he might do those things which her own moral and religious scruples forbade.
To the word ”pray” she replied with ”religion”, so religion was not as irrelevant to her difficulties as she had imagined.
To the word ”separation” she replied ”marriage, and admitted a fear that her own marriage might end in separation.
Disturbances showed with the words: wedding, quarrel, family, happiness and faults.
To the last she admitted that she had at one time been extremely troubled with phantasies of having promiscuous love affairs with a number of men.
As a good Catholic she could not even admit the possibility of ever pursuing such a course herself, so she had projected it on to her husband, and was always imagining that he was carrying out with other women the phantasies which she had had of other men, and so reacted with violent jealousy.
To the word ”kissing” she admitted that she reacted with the idea of kissing other men, and the whole story was soon on the table.
She burst into a fit of weeping, and the difficulty was solved as she stood in front of the clear cause of her trouble.
Case 4 was a pathological case in a mental nursing home.
A lady of 34 whose feeling was rapidly atrophying.
I was called in in consultation and I could only confirm the diagnosis which had put her in the asylum, yet I had a peculiar impression, so I decided to try an experiment on her.
She was a married woman with two children.
The depression which ended in the pathological state began when the eldest child died at the age of 4.
You could say that this was cause enough, deep grief was to be expected after losing her favorite child, but this was not deep grief, it was a pathological condition.
These things usually only happen when there is a double floor of which the patient is unconscious.
To the word ”angel” she replied ”child” and said it recalled her dead daughter who had been an angel.
She was evidently a very favorite child.
The word ”defiant” she applied to herself, and owned that she was defiant and obstinate even before the child’s death.
She had a strong disturbance at the word ”bad” and ”blue” reminded her of the eyes of her dead daughter, but at the word ”rich” things became re ally critical.
She associated it with a certain rich man for whom she had had a youthful ”Schwarmerei”.
Her well-to-do, middle-class parents laughed at her about it, and kept telling her that she was deluding herself with the idea that she could ever mean anything to such a rich and important man.
She believed them and gave up the idea, but regretted it most bitterly.
At the word ”moral” she had a strong disturbance, and reacted with ”immoral” again referring to herself.
She admitted to having had erotic phantasies about the man, and had a strong moral non-erotic attitude.
At the word ”money” she reacted again with the memory of the rich man, and then said that though she got on very well with her husband she was never able to forget her first love.
Her first child was born with his blue eyes, and when she saw that she felt a great affection for it.
The little girl had died of typhoid fever.
They had been living in a place where the ordinary water was undrinkable, they had to use special drinking water.
The children were bathed in it, however, and it was thought that the little girl trust have accidentally swallowed some, and so caught typhoid.
I asked her if she had seen her first love again.

She replied: ”Not since my marriage”.
Then, suddenly, something struck her.
Just before the death of her child she had had a visit from a great friend of his.
He had said: ”You hit someone in the heart by your marriage” and was referring to this man.
She had a terrific reaction, fainted, and was terribly upset.
Later in the same day she was bathing her children and noticed that the water was thick and slimy on the sponge, but she took no precautions to prevent the children from playing with it, and even gave her son, who asked for a drink, some of this water instead of that of the drinking supply.
The son, however, was not ill, but the little girl contracted typhoid and died.
When I saw what had happened I was in a bad conflict as to what to do about it. She was already in an asylum, so things were in a very bad state.
She would certainly degenerate if left there, people always do, and very rapidly.
So I decided to risk telling her the truth. I said:
”I suppose you know you murdered your child in order to destroy your present marriage?”
She looked at me curiously for a few minutes, and then, naturally, broke down.
In three weeks she was able to leave the asylum, and though that is 25 years ago there has been no relapse.
There was no other way of handling this case, for unless she faced the truth she could not recover.
Another method used in piecing this unconscious material together is the psychogalvanic experiment.
Diagram I (p. 120) is a rough drawing of the apparatus.
(1) is the mirror galvanometer, above which there is a translucent celluloid scale (2) with a lamp (3) upon it.
The electrodes are usually two large copper plates (4) and (5), upon which the p alms of the patient’s hands are placed with light sandbags on the backs of the hands to weigh them down.
The nervous contraction of the skin under the test words makes the mirror oscillate and a ray of light travels along the scale above.
The apparatus is so contrived that the result can be accurately recorded on (6), a measuring plate. (7) is a Bunsen cell.
The patient of Chart II was of an excitable nature and reacted electrically at nearly every word. In making such experiments it is very valuable to watch and record the breathing at the same time; at strong emotional reactions the breathing always shows a tendency to contract.
III
The top line in Chart III is the psycho-galvanic experiment, and the bottom one is the breathing.
Neurotics often hardly breathe at all and when at last they are forced to draw a breath they sigh, and their fond relations are much concerned and ask: ”What is the matter?”
But they were just in need of breath.
This shallow breathing can have very serious results and can start tubercular trouble for people with many complexes get into the habit of not breathing to the bottom of their lungs.
This happens so often that many people contend that consumption is more a psychological than a physical disease.
When through analytical treatment the complexes become more bearable, patients often begin to breathe properly so that it is no rare occurrence for such cases to clear up during psychological treatment. Carl Jung, Lecture VIII 15June1934, Pages 118-120.

Carl Jung's Investigation of Family Psychology. (2015-04-05 16:08)

Lecture X 29th June, 1934
We will proceed with our investigation of family psychology.

The list of 15 qualities comes first, which will serve to show us how to group the reactions.
1. Co-ordination.
2 . Sub and supra-ordination.
3. Contrast.
4. Predicate expressing a personal judgment.
5. Simple predicate.
6 . Relations of the verb to the subject or complement.
7. Designation of time, etc.
8. Definition.
9 . Coexistence.
10. Identity.
11. Motor-speech combination.
12. Composition of words.
13. Completion of words.
14. Clang associations.
15. Defective reactions.
A list of 10 complex symptoms comes next.
1 . Long pause before the reaction comes.
2. More than one word used a s reaction.
3 . Rep eating the test word.
4. Misunderstanding.
5. Mistakes.
6. Slips of the tongue.
7. Peculiar words, such as foreign words .
8. Mimicking, laughing, & c .
9 . Exclamations.
10. Reproduction disturbances.
When you have the results of the word qualities and those of the complex symptoms you can make charts.
This chart is that of a family.
The mother, a woman of about 40 [broken line); the father, a drunkard [dotted line); the little girl of 9 [black line) was deeply identified with her mother.
The result of the tests though quite natural for the type to which the mother belonged was highly unnatural for the child, yet as much as thirty percent of all associations were identical words showing that this child, 9 years old, had the whole problem of the mother on her shoulders and was already a woman terribly disappointed in life.
She would inevitably grow up with this attitude towards life, for this mold always persists, and her husband will be forced to become a drunkard.
For things to go at all there is only one answer that a man can make to a woman with such an attitude, and that is to become a drunkard, or a ne'er-do-well in some form.
II
This is a chart of a husband and wife who are n early identical.
The wife comes from the family of Chart IV in the last lecture.
In this case the attitude was reversed, the husband will be forced to become a teetotaler in order to adapt to his wife.
The husband is only forced to adapt in a marriage where the wife is the container, that is, the stronger in the relationship, which is the case in about 50 per cent of marriages.
III
Chart III is that of a widower (broken line] with two daughters (dotted and black lines).
The daughters had taken the place of the dead wife and all three lines show an astonishing identity.
The daughters had adapted to the father and both had strong father complexes.
I will now give you some surprising statistics.

The figures represent the difference in reaction between people who are not related to each other and between those in various relationships.
Between unrelated people related men related women fathers and children mothers and children fathers and sons fathers and daughters mothers and sons mothers and daughters brothers and brothers sisters and sisters (including married sisters] sisters and sisters (unmarried] husbands and wives average difference 6
The difference, being more accentuated between men who are related to each other than that between similarly related women, is accounted for by the fact that men go out into the world earlier, while women remain more in the family.
The child is more like its mother than its father because it is usually with her.
The father lives more on the edge of the nest and flies away oftener.
There is more resemblance between fathers and sons than between fathers and daughters.
This accounts for the primitives' belief that sons are the fathers reborn.
In India the son must b end over the bed of his dying father and breathe in his last breath.
The soul leaves the father then and it will enter the son if he is able to inhale that last breath.
The identity between fathers and sons is so complete among the primitives that a bushman once cried out in rage against his son: "There he goes with my body and does not even obey me".
He thought of his son as himself, and there are still fathers among us who take it for granted that their sons will follow their profession.
Daughters resemble their mothers much more closely than sons do.
This is mainly because women are far more closely bound in the family, which also shows in the fact that they retain the family speech peculiarities and the village dialect longer, for they have fewer opportunities for getting out into the world.
The difference between husbands and wives is higher than one might expect.
This is the case because in many marriages no identification takes place, but all differences on the contrary are underlined and accentuated.
A wife, for instance, may be a fresh air fiend, and the husband may like sitting by the fire all the summer.
In such cases there is a very striking difference in word reactions which puts up the average.
Word association tests bring out other phenomena connected with speech.
When a complex, especially an unconscious one, is touched, it always brings up a certain kind of emotion which shows itself in some kind of persistence, the persistence of a vowel for example.
Every reaction word may have an "a" in it, or there is a tendency to rhyme, or to some form of alliteration; poetry is often composed from complexes.
IV
This chart shows the persistence of the letter "A".
In languages where there are no fixed vowels , a consonant of some distinctive sound will persist instead.
The primitive is only conscious when emotion makes him so, otherwise everything remains on one level.
He sits around, not even thinking, but when emotion is at its height it forces a certain way of speech.
Complexes can be conscious or unconscious.

The breathing becomes disturbed when they are touched by an association experiment.
The next four charts represent the first seven breaths taken after a test word.
VI
In Chart V the conscious complex has been touched, the breathing goes down a little, there is just a sigh, but in Chart VI an unconscious complex has been touched and there is a real disturbance, the breathing is inhibited.
VII VIII
Chart VII is the breathing after an indifferent word, and VIII after a word which has touched a complex.
The principal result of all these experiments is to learn about the existence and contents of complexes.
As a general rule complexes are unconscious, they have the character of conflict because they are not woven into the web of the personality, but disturb and break through it - in short - they are autonomous.
They are, as it were, foreign bodies which cannot be ruled by the will, they have their own spontaneous character and torment and disturb us.
When a complex is touched memory is almost invariably affected, a word vanishes or we remember it too well, it keeps recurring.
A complex always induces unconsciousness.
If we think of the conscious (black line) as a straight line, Diagram IX shows the effect of a complex (broken line) coming up.
The complex rises and takes command and consciousness sinks as it does so.
There is an ”abaissement du niveau mental”.
When the level of consciousness sinks there is no energy left in the will; the complex rules us, we are possessed by it.
We drop from an active state into that of a passive sufferer.
Ideas of ghosts arise from this and it appears in the very language, in such expressions as:
”He is out of himself ” or ”the devil is riding him”.
Primitives, though they have no analysts and are not conscious of their complexes, understand this state very well.
They often feel alienated from themselves and then know that they have lost one of their five or six souls.
These souls are not under their control so it is very easy for one to go astray and the primitive then performs ceremonies in order to regain it.
Witch doctors are very helpful in this respect.
Perhaps the primitive goes to the witch doctor and says
”Have you seen a soul flying by ”
The witch doctor goes to a tree covered in bird cages, some empty with open doors, and others with birds in them.
He examines the cages and may say: ”Yes, I have your soul bird here.”
Then the primitive lies down and the witch doctor lays a trail in grains of rice from the cage to the head of the bereaved one.
When the door is opened the bird, eating grain by grain; arrives at the head where he belongs and is once more integrated and the matter is in order.
In our language this is the integration of an unconscious content.
If we were only simple and objective we should see these things much as the primitives do.
These autonomous contents are often possessed of the liveliest energy; a man beats his wife or ill-treats his children, someone else gets hysterics, or a neurosis, the primitives call it all being possessed by a devil.
At the moment we call the devils complexes and it is a matter of indifference to him by what name we call him, his effect is much the same in any case, but some modern people understand much better if you use primitive language to them and ask them to find out what it is that is possessing them.
When we are in a rage we must be objective about it and ask ourselves what is making us so angry.
A complex is a most objective thing and the only thing we can do is to be objective about it.
The cleverest intelligence cannot master a complex.
A professor with an anxiety mania can classify it and perhaps banish it during the day, but directly he gets into bed out comes the complex and he cannot sleep for terror.

To say ”It is only a neurosis” has no effect on it whatever, for it is like a bad ghost following him.
If we assume that we are just egos and can make out our own bills, we have ”Made out the bill without the host” and are likely to find that it has been scratched through.
Complexes have to be taken seriously, they have dynamic force, they live in our psyche and they seem to be bad things, yet it is these very complexes which bring us our fate.
Each complex has its given quantity of energy but as it crosses the border of consciousness and takes command of us, it seizes our energy to increase its own and our consciousness sinks down powerless and helpless.
This process will persist in a family for generation after generation.
The energy possessed by each complex means a reduction of the energy which is at our disposal.
We may say that they are independent units and that we pay the costs of their maintenance, they rob our life of its continuity.
The ego is also a complex and Diagram X shows it (1) in the centre with other autonomous pieces (2) (3) etc.,
X
The question is: have these autonomous pieces a consciousness of their own, and if so, what sort of a consciousness is it?
They definitely have, but probably it is a lower consciousness than our own, an unpleasant consciousness.

Carl Jung and the psyche does not react in a simple way. (2015-04-06 06:47)

Lecture II 27th April, 1934
There is nothing easy in psychology, the psyche does not react in a simple way, so that the simplest thing is complicated.
In an association test, for example, the questions are simple enough, but the reactions of the psyche are not.
We can make an easy experiment. I could hang up a red square.
Everyone sees the same object, it is red for everyone.
Each individual is sure that it is exactly the same for everybody else, but theoretically everyone sees an individual variation of the same thing.
No one can simply perceive it, but sees it in his own peculiar way, of which fact h6wever he is unconscious.
The mad king, Ludwig of Bavaria, made an interesting experiment.
He invited a number of artists to paint the same scene in the garden of Tivoli. The results were exceedingly varied; some of the pictures seemed to outsiders to be very far from reality, for not only the object but the subject of the artist appeared.
In the same way every expression in speech has a different meaning for different people.
Each word has its meaning for us personally and, besides this, a content of the unconscious can creep in and complicate things still further.
All this increases the difficulty I mentioned in the last lecture of finding adequate words in everyday speech with which to describe even outer processes.

When it comes to inner processes the matter becomes harder still.
Our expressions are limited. If I say: “Es ist mir wahl” (I feel O.K.)
I think I have said something, but this assertion means something different to everybody.
A vast sphere of unconscious processes exists beside our consciousness and when we make a simple conscious assertion all kinds of things can flow in and obscure the meaning.
The unconscious is constantly at hand and is more alive and more permanently awake than the conscious.
We sleep a third of our life away and in the remaining two-thirds we are only more or less conscious.
Alert consciousness is a very rare condition, it is tiring and expensive, and as it requires so much energy we prefer to let ourselves live in a kind of torpor.
We like to let ourselves sink into a sort of dream in which at least we can still observe our thoughts, but some people cannot even achieve this, they cannot say what they have thought.
This is indeed the primeval condition of man.
The primitives spend most of their lives in this condition and are exceedingly angry if they are asked what they are thinking about.
If we relax our attention we fall into the dream which is forever flowing on in the unconscious, but it requires a special Training to be able to observe and record this dream.
Everything of which we are not aware is stored up in the unconscious and though this is a dark, slumbering condition, it is active all the time and sometimes it takes contents of the conscious and draws them down into it.
I can make a slip of the tongue, a word has been drawn down by the unconscious, and something else substituted.
If the unconscious stopped living nothing would happen in consciousness, for all that comes into our heads proceeds from the unconscious.
Normal consciousness is very narrow, it cannot hold more than a certain number of things at the same time, all clearness is lost if this numb er becomes too large, and this can lead over into pathological symptoms.
Many of our daily actions are unconscious; the movements of our bodies, the expressions of our faces, for instance, and such automatic gestures as taking out a watch and looking at the time and very often omitting to register the same.
We see and do things and omit to record them.
Everything which has ever happened is shouldering on the threshold of consciousness, but the bridge is lacking, so it is not immediately accessible.
Some things are so deep that the conscious will is quite powerless to reach them, they can only be touched indirectly without our conscious participation, we suddenly remember them when thinking of something else.
I will give a concrete example of this.
A man was walking along a road and suddenly became aware of vivid recollections of his childhood.
He retraced his steps and came on a farm which he had passed some minutes before.
He was struck by the smell of the goose yard which recalled the farm where he was brought up.
His nose had smelt it as he passed, but it had remained unconscious till several minutes later, when the smell came up indirectly.
Numerous things in the unconscious always remain unknown to us.
This is the reason that we really know so little of our own lives.
We do not know how to value many things which were once conscious and allow them to drop from us.
The unconscious appears to have a peculiarly fine feeling for estimating the importance of things.
Many events which happened to us in childhood, for instance, seem quite trivial to us, but the unconscious, realizing their importance, preserved them.
This fact is of considerable importance as it shows us that it matters very much what we experience, for even that which we do not experience consciously is yet experienced by our whole psyche.
If one man reads a thousand books and forgets their contents completely, and another man does not read at all, we might think they would come out equal, but this is not the case.

The unconscious registers everything, it has a fabulous memory, and all that the first man had read is stored up there. Hypnotism could reveal it.
There was a case of a woman who suffered from complete amnesia for two days, but her unconscious registered the exact time on the clock when she was brought into hospital in spite of the fact that she was in a state of deep unconsciousness at the time.
Forel records a case of a man who was reading a newspaper in a cafe in Zurich and read of a man who was missing and wanted in Australia.
Suddenly he realised that this man was himself.
He went to Forel and told him this.
Forel hypnotized him and it turned out that as a result of dengue fever in Australia he had lost his memory, gone to Sidney and bought himself a ticket to Europe.
The people on board the steamer only noticed that he was silent, aloof, and read a great deal.
In this way he came to Zurich.
This is by no means an isolated case, in loss of memory the whole previous life may be lost, but the unconscious stores away all the images of it.
I once investigated the case of a girl of 19 who was suspected of schizophrenia and who had been in an asylum for one or two years.
She had hallucinations and strange symptoms common to those who live entirely in the inner world.
Her pupils were always dilated and only contracted when her attention could be awakened to the outer world.
I had the feeling that an inner dream was being lived.
It came out very slowly about three words an hour.
It was a story lived on the moon.
I asked her why she found it so difficult to tell me about it and she replied: “I take trouble, but it is too difficult, it was never in words”.
To think then in words is an effort.
These inner dramas and dreams cannot be willed into consciousness, they can only be reached by a special training, or by hypnosis.
They are not words, or single incidents, but a river of events.
Kant calls this sphere the territory of “dim representations”, and when we see this unconscious world with our own conscious world we see that the latter swims in the former, like an island in the ocean.
Our consciousness cannot be our psyche, it is only a very small part of our psyche, but the psyche is the whole.
When a man is whole his unconscious must also have its say.
The real being is in the unconscious.
If we wish to be aware of the whole person we must wait until the unconscious has spoken.
Students should see their friends when they are drunk before assuming that they know them.
Things come up then which we cannot see at other times, sometimes worse, and sometimes better than the things which we already know.
Consciousness is essentially the psyche’s organ of perception, it is the eye and ear of the psyche.
We locate consciousness in the forehead, but the Indians think that the Americans are mad for doing this, the Indian thinks in the heart, and the nigger thinks in the stomach.
In fact it is only when the nigger’s stomach is affected that he thinks at all. On the level of the taboo it is only that which makes the heart b eat, or affects the intestines, which makes people think.
The life that we live consciously is lived in the unconscious by the primitive, he cannot think logically, or act logically, he is alive to fear or anger, but it is very rare for a primitive to be able to detach himself sufficiently to appreciate such a thing as the beauty of nature. Carl Jung, Lecture II, 27April1934, ages 96-98.

Carl Jung's analysis of Celebrities of 1934. (2015-04-06 14:03)

Lecture XV 16th ·February, 1934
I should like to show you today how the diagram which we were discussing last time came into being and how it functions from a practical point of view.

This diagram is no speculative invention, it grew out of my practical experience and in fact became a necessary groundwork, in the sifting and ordering of the immense and prodigiously complex empirical material.
I came to realise how unbelievably different people are, though outwardly they appear to be one great herd.
Every patient who comes to me has a different psychology and is a new experience, for people are fundamentally different; if we think otherwise we are judging superficially.
Naturally this diversity leads to an immense variety of conceptions and convictions.
This fact is particularly apparent in the history of psychological theories.
Today, if we want to explain a certain fact psychologically, we are confronted with a whole series of possibilities, each one seen from a different point of view.
These diversities are the sign of the very living quality of a science, but they are also an additional difficulty in the task of explaining the empirical material.
This is one of the reasons why the problem of psychological types, for instance, is so difficult.
Words prove to be not only poor, but misleading.
Take for example the German word ”Gefiihl” (feeling); it holds a whole labyrinth of meaning, everybody understands it in a different way, even the classical authors have confused it with sensation. When one considers the fact that you use a word and attach a certain meaning to it, yet it conjures up a wholly different picture in the mind of the person you are talking to, one realises the difficulties of reaching an understanding.
It is the recognition of these difficulties which urged me to make this attempt at an elucidation.
Let us see how the material we have been speaking of can be fitted into the diagram. (Diagram V, p. 59.)
Chart I (p. 64) The Clairvoyante of Prevorst.
When we set out to establish the boundaries of the Clairvoyante’s psychology, in order to localise her consciousness, we see that she stands very much on the Left side, for the outstanding fact is that she lived in the reality of inner objects; her consciousness therefore reaches its highest point in Left IV.
The question then arises: how does she stand with regard to Left V?
In what measure is her psychology influenced by something which is really beyond human reach?
The Sun Circle belongs to this sphere.
I should have to take you as far as Tibet in order to prove that such things actually exist.
It is very necessary to find parallels to a patient’s strange experiences, for as long as he can make himself understood he feels that he still stands in the world, and there is hope.
I therefore have to make every effort, when dealing with such cases, to keep the bridge of understanding open.
If I can, so to speak, nod to a strange experience as to an acquaintance, the patient is related to reality and feels reassured.
If I were to say: ”No, that is unheard of, that thing does not exist anywhere except in your imagination”, the last bridge to human relationship would be broken down, the patient would be isolated in his experience and then the only open door would lead to insanity.
The Clairvoyante was able to describe the Sun Circle to her doctor, Kerner, who was really interested, and in this way she related her experience to the world.
She herself, however, did not stand in Left V, the symbol alone is there and it is not very expressive, it is fainter than her experiences in Left IV.
If we proceed to the Right side, we must recognise that the Clairvoyante was very much concerned with her body: she was always ill and absorbed in her own condition, everything had to revolve round her.
Her consciousness, however, stretched very little further into the world of reality, her relationship to people was singularly subjective, her relation to her child, for instance, was fitful and she saw Kerner in a very one-sided way.
From the nature of the curve on this chart we can draw definite conclusions, in the first place how the Clairvoyante stands in relation to the world.
Any one else with exactly the same chart would be forced to react in much the same way.
Her actual reality did not lie on this Right side, but in the spirit world.
The chart shows us further that, whereas she hardly had an interest in the outer world, the emphasis is on the Left side.

If this condition should continue to be stable, the curve would remain as I have marked it on the chart; but, as the Clairvoyante had so little relation to the outer world, should a change set in, we can expect her sphere of consciousness to move still further to the Left; so I have drawn the arrow pointing in that direction.
The long straight line beginning at the end of Left I and running over the whole of Left II and Left III, denotes a break in the continuity of consciousness.
The Clairvoyante was only aware of these sections in a state of somnambulism; and the line does not rise again till Left IV.
Chart II (p. 64) Helene Smith.
This is a totally different case.
Helene's figure Leopold is very subjectively coloured.
There is a psychological element behind this figure, the animus, which is closely connected with Flournoy; we may, therefore, conclude that Helene was genuinely interested in her doctor.
We can then expect to find a marked emphasis on the Right side, so this case cannot be interpreted from the Left.
We know that Helene was well adapted to life and efficient in her work.
She was very successful in managing to interest an American, who presented her with enough dollars to provide herself with a comfortable old age; so we may conclude that she was quite clever on the worldly side.
Her spirits on the Left side were very different from those which filled the Clairvoyante's world, they were extremely subjective in character.
She relatively objectified her complexes, but they are explained from the Right side.
She produced no mandalas and there were no manifestations in Left IV.
Whereas the Clairvoyante gives us an objective picture of the Left side, Helene's information is only relatively valid, she really speaks of the Right side under the guise of the Left.
She liked her spirits, they brought her fame, but they remained very subjective.
She would have been greatly disturbed had they become too objective and self-willed.
In Helene's case the eclipse of consciousness begins immediately behind the ego and covers most of Left I and Left II; had she experienced more of Left I she would have been more self-critical.
Should her condition cease to be static, her sphere of consciousness would move towards the Right side because her chief relation is to the world, so I have drawn the arrow pointing in that direction.
This movement is checked however, by the constellation of the contents of the unconscious.
Chart III (p. 64)
Sigmund Freud.
We will take this world-wide celebrity as a further example.
His summit is reached in the sphere of objective ideas.
His idea in itself is the only salvation, he does not allow other people's ideas to exist, and he thus cuts himself off from the rest of humanity.
He no longer handles the idea, it handles him, thus he reaches enthusiasm in Right V.
Freud is the psychologist of the complexes, so his curve is high in Left II.
If it were higher one would have to call him neurotic, but this would not be justified.
We can only say that he is very much concerned with complexes and is keenly aware of the negative side of the unconscious.
The shadow is Freud's disclosure, his fullest consciousness on the Left is in I and he revealed his discoveries in this sphere to an astonished and shocked Europe!
Freud found out that neurotics must be regarded as individuals.
He also realised that as an explorer he had to be able to be subjective, for you can only induce the patient to declare his standpoint when you can tell him what you yourself think of him.
This is a chart where the curve of consciousness is unbroken, it is continuous on the Right side and runs through the centre, but the light ends in Left II.

complexes, that is from Left III to Left V, is handled negatively.
Owing to the sphere of consciousness from which he views it, he must be unable to understand religious experience; so when a patient brings him a vision, or he reads of mystics and artists, it is inevitable that he should explain them as complexes. Left IV and Left V do not exist for him, so God is only a complex.
Chart IV (p. 64) Rockefeller.
Here we have a very much simplified curve, consciousness is extremely narrow.
Rockefeller was really just a mountain of gold, and it had been dearly bought.
I stayed with him once in America and was able to study his psychology at close range, which was an interesting experience.
He was almost exclusively preoccupied with his bodily health, thinking of different medicines, new diets and possible new doctors!
He suffered from an extremely bad conscience, so he was conscious of Left I, where the shadow lurks, giving rise to self-criticism.
His secretary had to keep him provided with coins which he distributed among the children he met on his daily walks; he did this to get their thanks, for he was appallingly lonely, and needed such devices in order to reach some kind of human contact.
Rockefeller's outlook ends in the subjective sphere, his consciousness reaches no further than I and II on either side.
The following conversation will serve to illustrate his subjective thinking; I was an attentive listener in spite of his slow speech and long artistic pauses.
R - So you are a European, - I like Europeans, but there are some bad people among them.
Dr. J - Yes, people are much the same as elsewhere, good and bad.
R - The Austrians are very bad people.
Dr. J - No, really, I never knew that.
R - You don't know everything, doctor, but I expect you realise that I am an idealist.
For many years I have been striving to do something for humanity, to establish a standard price for petrol throughout the world.
Every country agreed except Austria, whose government had just signed a separate agreement with Rumania - the Austrians must be very bad people. Carl Jung, Lecture XV, 16Feb1934, Pages 63-67.

Carl Jung on the "Four Functions." (2015-04-07 06:43)

Lecture III 4th May, 1934
Ego consciousness is no universal condition; it could rather be called the organ of orientation which is sub-divided into functions.
In looking at a human being you can usually decide what his conscious functions are, they tend to form an inseparable "continuum" throughout his life.
The conscious functions are the organs of observation or perception ("Wahrnehmung").
These functions give observations of the outer world to the inner man and vice versa.
We will speak first of observations of the outer world.
We will begin with the function of sensation.
This is perception through the senses. The sense organs transmit these perceptions to the brain.
To examine a function we must arbitrarily cut it off from its surroundings.
In reality there is no such thing as pure sensation, or any other function, working by itself, it is always mixed with psychic contents of some kind, and can only theoretically be pure.
Sensation is usually mixed with some primitive thinking, with what a thing means.
In its pure form sensation gives us a picture of this or that thing, but the eyes do not say what it is.
The thinking function comes in to tell us that.
Thinking in its pure form is an inner function and is only indirectly connected with the impressions of outer objects given us by our senses.

Sensation as well as being mixed with thinking is usually also joined to feeling.
Practically every sensation has a feeling tone.
It is a purely artificial separation to consider a sensation which is not so coloured.
When thinking is more developed in a sensation type than feeling, a primitive kind of feeling follows after the thought, the aim being to decide whether a thing is worth retaining or should be discarded.
To like a thing, or not to like it, is feeling in its most primitive form. We say “Yes” or “No” to it.
Language itself often confuses us about the functions.
In German, for instance, it is hard to divide feeling and sensation, Goethe himself confused them.
The French are perfectly clear about this, and so are the English.
With these three functions we know that and where a thing is, what it is and its value, so that there is already a considerable grasp and outlook on the world, but there is no whence or whither, the object is not seen in full connection to its surroundings, its place and its belongings.
The invisible is missing, it has no “«environs”.
For this we need intuition to make it intelligible.
Intuition is a word with a definite meaning in English and French, but in German ”Ahnung” is better.
The intuitive basis of knowledge is recognised in philosophy, the “dureee creatrice” of Bergson is such an intuition, he is an intuitive philosopher who recognizes these ideas.
He did not discover them for they existed far earlier, you find their prototypes in very ancient Persia.
In Zoroaster there is the idea of Zurvan Akarana, of endless duration in which everything comes to pass.
When we think of this, it is as though we imagined a teacher trying to make a stupid pupil understand the idea and inventing an endless snake in order to make it clearer, but the primitive approaches this quite differently, he sees the snake first, or some other picture and then he comes slowly to thinking about what it is.
The history of energetics is largely intuitive, it starts primitively as intuitions of archetypes, first they were beings, now they are mathematical formulas.
The old archetypes or beings were full of feeling and of magic effect; the mana concept is tremendously meaningful.
A very unusual man or event has mana, according to the primitive; where we ejaculate “Oh God!” the primitive exclaims “Mana!”
Mana also conveys the idea of importance.
Intuition is the perception of invisible things.
You think you have your handbag closed, but the intuitive looks inside it and inside you as well, for no secrets are safe from him.
The most pronounced intuitives have what the Scotch call “second sight”, they can, for instance, foretell the weather, many animals also have this last power.
Intuition is a great danger as well as a power in the hands of its possessor for it is quite illegitimate, it does not fit into reason any better than a woman fits into a book of logic!
Women, however, have their own logic.
I T F This diagram is a simple design with the functions at the four points of the compass.
The functions can be moved from point to point at pleasure, but not in their relation to each other, that is fixed.
There is unchanging opposition, war in fact, between thinking and feeling.
If you feel about a thing it is impossible to think clearly of it.
There is a pleasant object, for instance, you feel agreeably towards it, you must put that feeling behind you in order to think coldly and objectively about it, for it certainly possesses bad qualities as well and you will not be able to see them because of your positive feeling.

If thinking appears cold to feeling, feeling certainly appears stupid to thinking.
It takes a very long time to reach the point where these two are workably united, a thinking type does everything he can to prevent himself from having feelings, to repress them, but sometimes in spite of all his efforts out they come, and how!
Paul Bourget tells a story of a married couple waiting in the antechamber of a parliamentary office and the wife comments on everyone who appears.
At the sight of a shrewd professor, she exclaims “Voila un me chant homme, il est surement de la police Secrete!”
This is how thinking appears to· the feeling type.
Intuition and sensation are also immoveably opposed to each other.
If you want to observe facts minutely, what else could be there without disturbing the whole matter?
So intuition must be locked out.
The eyes of the sensation type are usually sharp owing to focus sing on the object, whereas the intuitive does not see, he gazes, his eyes are radiant, it is as if something streamed out of them.
A highly gifted intuitive appears to be looking through you, you do not know exactly what he is looking at, certainly not at you, at your every-day face, but at your atmosphere, or Heaven knows what.
Intuition and sensation lock each other out all the time.
Intuitives show a quite extraordinary inability to register sensation facts, they have extraordinary fantasies about a thing, they intuit what is inside the locked drawer, but have no idea what the bureau looks like outside.
So there is a system of four functions which cross each other.
Thinking and feeling have one point in common, they are both rational functions, they must be rational, but if you try to be rational in sensation-perception or in intuition you will prevent yourself from seeing the unexpected, and you will see nothing.
The whole essence of these two is to see what is there, however unexpected it is.
This is what makes it so hard for someone with second-sight to commercialize it.
When people with great gifts of second-sight begin to try to use it as a means of earning their living, they usually begin to cheat, because often they see nothing at all, and anyway what they see is generally the last thing people expect or want to hear, so that it is very hard for them to remain honest towards their gifts.
Each of these functions has a fixed quantity of psychical energy attached to it and when the functions disappear the energy vanishes, it disappears into the unconscious and then a disturbance shows itself somewhere.
No one has all four functions equally developed, and the more developed and used to its fullest extent one is, the more repressed its opposite becomes.
At least one function is always repressed, often two, and sometimes even three. A thinking type always has inferior feeling, he will often describe his marvellous feelings, but every word shows how uncontrollable they are, they become absolutely archaic in the unconscious.
And the archaic thinking of a feeling type is astonishing, he speaks with such developed nuance in the feeling realm that you think he must have superior thoughts as well, and find archaic nonsense.
It is well known that many highly develop ed intellectuals hate women, because they are connected with their inferior function, and they frequently marry their housekeepers in consequence!
The functions do not cease to exist because they are in the unconscious they go on working, but automatically.
You always feel somewhere, even if you are a thinker, but it feels, you do not. We shall see by some surprising examples later on how the repressed function can work with the conscious totally unaware of what it is doing.
The functions are not suspended in empty space, but are related to the ego.
The ego is another complex, it is the subject or the object of the functions.
What is the ego?
Most people point to their body and say: “That is I”, but psychic processes are undeniable facts.
You can quite well say “I think”, “I feel” but the other view works also, “I am thought”, “I am felt“.
Between these four functions are the intermediary functions; scientists are mostly empirical thinkers, that is thinking with sensation and such thinkers as Schopenhauer are speculative thinkers, thinking with intuition. Carl Jung, Lecture III, 4May1934, Pages 99-101

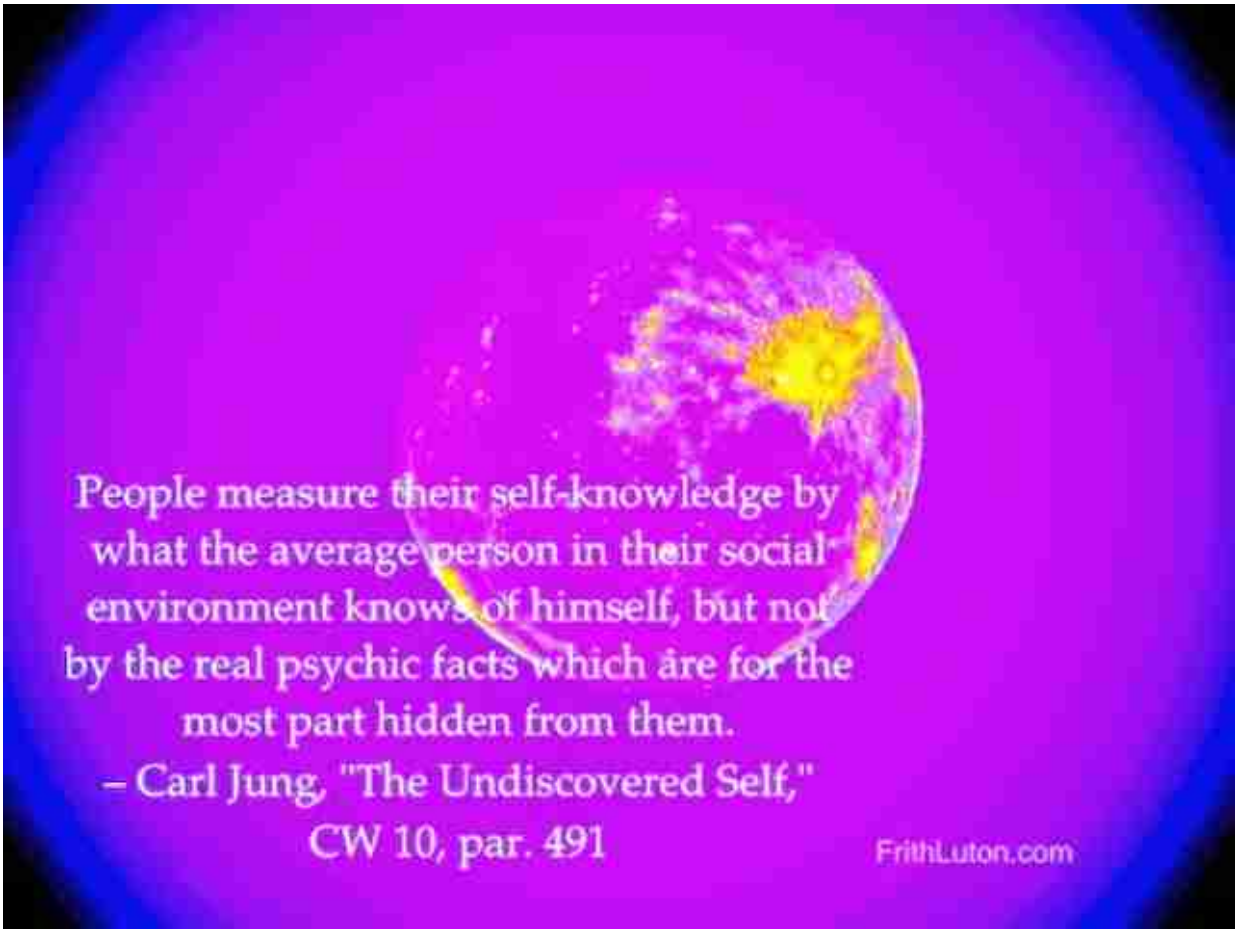
Carl Jung: "Nothing exists which was not psychic once." (2015-04-07 07:13)



Lecture I 20th April 1934
I will begin with some explanations of how the ideas which I spoke of in the last semester came into being.
When we speak of psychology, we enter an infinitely wide and complicated sphere.
It is not like other sciences which have their definite boundaries.
It is a significant fact that there is an American University which publishes a volume about psychology every year under the title of: "Psychologies of 1904" and so on.
Psychology consists of a number of individual beliefs and not of fixed systems, but beliefs always strive to become the generally valid truth, and these convictions often become exaggerated.
Many varying opinions exist about psychology because it has so many different aspects.
Psychology is concerned with the psyche in which everything primarily originated.
Nothing exists which was not psychic once.
This desk, for instance, was once an image in someone's mind.
This building first existed as the phantasy of some architect; they both originated in someone's psyche.
There is nothing which man has done, thought or undertaken which has not originated in the psyche.
Our experience also is above all psychic.
In fact, we can only experience through the psyche.

The only immediately perceivable is psychic: a psychic image, and this is the only basis of experience.
”I find this to be so and so”, that is th e first truth.
Reality is the reality of our experience, of our perception, it is our perception which is real and which colours the character of reality for us.
If you can make yourself formulate your experience, you have the outlines of your own psyche.
There is, naturally, an outer world, and things which stand outside our psyche, but psychology is essentially the science of the directly experienced, and everything else which can happen is neither direct nor immediate.
When you burn yourself, for instance, by touching a hot iron, the process is not simple but highly complicated.
Pain requires certain affections, of the nerves, brain etc., but a large part of the re action is unconscious; what the pain really looks like and where it is in the nerves or brain - that one does not know.
As psychology is such a fundamental matter it naturally touches other sciences: pedagogy and philosophy, for instance.
Its widespread character gives rise to numerous misunderstandings.
The psyche appears to everyone as that which is reality to him and it takes an exceedingly long self-education to see that one’s own experience is not the general experience.
This is such a hard task that some people give it up altogether, and for this reason they are glad to limit and confine psychology.
Here I must point out a paradoxical truth, that the psyche is a general phenomenon and also a personal thing.
There is nothing living except the individual, there is no life except individual life but, since the individual is the bearer of life, it is also universal.
The psyche experiences itself and is at the same time a general phenomenon; everything that exists depends on this fact.
Moral and religious hypotheses are an important factor in our lives, we are dependent on them.
Some we really consciously share, others we do not, some indeed we fight against, and yet they influence us.
They come from our milieu, our culture, our speech.
Moreover, the earth influences the psyche.
Man is greatly influenced by where he is born; a European born in the colonies is colonial, there is something about him which is not quite in tune in Europe. Very difficult psychological problems arise from this fact.
You see this especially in the English who have been born in the colonies, and in Americans, on account of the Indians who are indigenous to their soil.
These things are exceedingly important for one must treat such people differently.
An Englishman needs quite different treatment from a Frenchman.
Different conditions can even modify the skeleton.
In a family of seven children, four of whom had been born in Hamburg, and three in America, the latter looked real Americans.
I once watched the men leaving a factory in Buffalo and thought what a lot of Indian blood they must have, but the American doctor I was with assured me that they had none.
Even their skulls had changed and taken on Indian form.
When I was in Africa I watched my own dreams going black, and I observed that many of the Europeans who had settled there were in a nervous condition.
The poison of ”going black” was working in them.
You can see signs of this in their houses, the crockery is chipped, the pictures are crooked, everything is untidy and has a ramshackle look.
Natives never look you in the face; only the medicine man does this, the others are probably afraid of the evil eye; and Europeans in the process of ”going black” never look at you either, and develop a strange motion of the eyes.
The natives are able to see a great deal which is hidden from the European.
A friend of mine was nearly killed by a mamba which he did not s e e but which was quite visible to the natives.
I observed my own eyes rolling once when I was botanising in the jungle, it is as if the unconscious got into the eyes in order to reveal the hidden dangers of the jungle.
One of the most frequent assumptions regarding psychology is that it is a kind of cookery book which tells ”how one must make it".

There can be no cookery book and we must make our own recipes.
Otherwise we are like the American mother who took her child on her knee in order to punish it and had to hold it there while she found the right place in her book on education in order to see what to do next!
Psychology is no arbitrary matter, it is more a phenomenology that consists of many realities which have to be accepted as they are.
This is exceedingly difficult.
There are many facts in psychology which are very irritating.
One cannot help saying: "This should not be so, it should be otherwise", because one is hit by it and has a personal judgment.
An ther great difficulty in psychology is the presentation of its facts and of the material.
We must necessarily represent them in ordinary every-day language, but that gives an image which is highly unsatisfactory to the audience.
One should really describe every single one of these facts in its own language in order to make it intelligible.
These things app ear differently to everyone, and beyond that the languages we use are very poor in psychological nuances.
The French language is the worst of all, it is far too clear and definite,
English is better, and German is comparatively good because of its indefinite character; Chinese would be the best of all for this purpose.
The fundamental outlines of psychological truths cannot be expressed in concepts or ideas, only very indefinite formulation is suitable to them.
The sharper and more definite a formulation is, the less it expresses a psychological idea.
Nothing is simple in psychology, the psychological unit is always a complexity, nothing psychic can be isolated.
It is therefore peculiarly difficult to explain ones elf in terms that really describe anything.
We are surrounded by the opposites in psychology so that the language we use should hold a double meaning. Carl Jung, Lecture I, 20April1934, Pages 93-95.

Carl Jung on Dream Interpretation from Sigmund Freud's perspective. (2015-04-07 10:51)

Lecture II
2nd November, 1934
Last time we spoke of the three main different conceptions of dream analysis.
I recommend three books to you on this subject:
I) Die Psychoanalyse by W. M. Kranefeldt.
This is written chiefly from a philosophical standpoint.
II) Organismus der Seele by G. R. Heyer.
This is written more from a medical standpoint.
III) Entde ckung der Seele by G. H. Adler.
This is quite a new book and is exceedingly clear and practical.
We have seen that Freud conceives of dreams as disguised wish fulfilments in hallucinatory form.
He speaks of two contents of the dream:
I) The manifest content.
This is the text of the dream, the facade, the simple outside story.
II) The latent content.
This is also a story, but one which has been censored, that is, carefully disguised by the factor which Freud calls the censor, therefore the thought it contains cannot be directly understood.
It is only possible to translate the manifest content into the latent content by careful study and work, for the hidden wishes have been both morally and aesthetically censored.
Freud goes so far as to say that the censor is not only morally active, but that it is also the protector of our sleep and wards off those contents which are likely to disturb it and only allows them to approach as unrecognisable allegories.

We do in fact have dreams which seem specially designed to protect our rest:
We know for instance that we are to be called at a certain hour by a knock or by an alarm clock and we have a dream which incorporates the noise so that we shall not be disturbed, we can even dream that we get up and dress; then the thing is accomplished and we can sleep on.
These facts do to some extent justify Freud's theory.
Freud devised a whole series of methods by which to reach the language of the latent content of the dream:
I) Abbreviated translation:
Things which appear shortened into words or signs.
You are, for instance, in a considerable conflict over something during the day.
That night you dream of it shortened into one word - war.
If you dreamt of the conflict it would disturb your rest, but even in sleep you know that the war dreamt of is not an actual war, or it would be in the newspapers, so you can go on sleeping and register what happens quite calmly.
To give a concrete example:
A patient brings me a dream in which he has dreamt of Mr. X.
He says that he cannot imagine why he should dream of him, that he hardly knows him, but he believes that he heard something about him the other day and has forgotten it.
I wait, for one can always afford to wait, it comes, and in a minute he adds "Oh yes, I remember I heard that his wife had run away from him".
This patient has most strained relations with his wife, she had unfortunately as yet not run away, but the dream puts the complicated situation in a nutshell: "Mr. X is a lucky man."
II) Displacement:
This is shifting the emotion onto an indifferent figure.
My patient for instance should dream of his wife and he actually dreams of Mr. X.
The dream is then free to speak without emotion, for why should my patient be affected by the state of affairs between Mr. X and his wife?
He does not see the reason for any emotion, so he is left in peace about it.
In the dream about the crab-lizard monster, which we are considering, Freud would s ay that the peasant woman replaced the patient's mother in a form which would not disturb his sleep.
III) Visualisation:
Seeing the situation as a picture.
To dream of proverbs and sayings might make us uneasy for all proverb s contain situations, collectively expressed, which can hold a great deal of emotion.
If we dream "He has fallen into the soup " we at once feel alarmed and think that we must have done so.
We are probably really in a difficulty and we immediately translate it and are disturbed, but if we dream of really falling into an actual hole there is no likeness to the concrete situation and so it causes no emotion.
We no longer visualise the words we use and have distorted their real meaning.
Take for instance the German word "Behandlung" (treatment - handling), who thinks of actual handling, touching with the hands, when he uses this word now?
If we visualise the word, as a dream might do, it gives a very queer picture.
IV) Expression through the opposite:
This mechanism plays a very important role in dreams. "Les extremes se touchent", we are constantly entangled in the opposites without realising it.
When we s ay "Sacrecamr" for instance we mean sacred, but when we say "Sacre nom de chien" it means exactly the opposite.
In primitive languages there is often exactly the same word for black and white, it is left to the tone of voice or the context to show which is meant at the time.
You get the same idea in the Swiss dialect word " g'sp assig" (funny).
You say "g'spassig" when you mean humorous, and also when you mean something very different, something sinister, creepy or unexpected.

We use such a word for fear of calling a sinister thing by its dangerous name; it might come if you called it by name!
In speech we ”touch wood” all the time , not necessarily because we are personally superstitious, but because it has grown into the language, so that we cannot help it.
In low German the word for good is ”bat” which is almost the same as the English ”bad”.
(Here were given several examples of words which have an opposite meaning in different languages.)
The meaning and sense of a word changes with time.
The French word ”pucelle” meant, in the time of Joan of Arc, ”vierge” (virgin) used in the sense of the Virgin Mary.
A little later it came to mean chamber-maid, it was still respectable but very humble, from the Latin word pulex, a flea: the pucelle was the ”flea of the noble lady”.
Later still, 150 years ago, in Voltaire’s time, it just meant ”houri”.
Now the meaning of the word has risen again and it again means virgin as it did in the time of Joan of Arc.
So a word degenerates and rises again, it is the play of the opposites.
The Spanish language is full of curses, Spaniards would hardly be able to talk if they ever thought what they were saying; this is also true of the Swiss dialect, but it is used automatically.
The word ”chaib” for instance means corpse of a stallion; but it is used just to emphasize what you are saying.
If you dreamt of a decaying stallion in front of a beautiful view, you would find the dream difficult to interpret, but, if you were Swiss, it would just mean that it was a very beautiful view!
V) Fear:
Freud claims that in dreams in general you separate yourself as a defence from an incompatible wish which you fear.
”I wish it all too much” and then naturally I am terribly afraid of it.
We are even more afraid of inevitable things, things I know I must do.
Freud, therefore, sees the dream as the expression of a collection of censored incompatible wishes, things that we could know but which are suppressed and buried for certain reasons.
The unconscious has stored all these away with the things we have forgotten, unpleasant thoughts which we have pushed away from us.
We will now consider Freud’s method as applied to concrete dreams.
Perhaps you think that I am being unnecessarily fussy over the difference which exists in the ways in which dreams are conceived of.
But this is immensely important, for the way we look up on the dream is the conception which we shall adopt and act up on.
You remember the two simple dreams our dreamer had first, what could be the disguised wish in them?
It is quite clear in the dream where he was back in his own village with his earlier school companions.
”Oh s elig, oh selig, ein Kind noch zu s ein ” [what a blessed state it would be if one were still a child).
The dreamer wishes he were a schoolboy in his village.
There is nothing disturbing in the manifest conception of the dream.
In the second dream, the one of the train disaster, wild haste, excitement and compulsion are portrayed.
Freud, it is well known, always interprets from the sexual motive, so we can safely employ this theme here.
The first picture in the dream is very harmless, it is just going to the station, but then the censor relaxes his guard a little and the catastrophe happens.
The wish was to run off the rails, to have an adventure outside matrimony and the dream represents a disaster, but a wish fulfilment - for it is off the rails - which of course, the dreamer cannot see consciously at all.
So the meaning of the two dreams from Freud’s point of view is:
1) That he wishes to be a child again.
2) That he would like to have an extra marital adventure.
We come next to our special dream, the one of the crab-lizard monster.
The dream opens very simply and harmlessly, this is already a suspicious circumstance, evidently the censor has been highly successful.
We can, however, guess the Mother behind it and already intuit a conflict, the Oedipus complex which is Freud’s special pet.

The second picture in the dream is the proposed journey to Leipzig; he boasts to the Mother, hoping that she will think ”He is a fine fellow”.
This wish to make an impression was already visible in the schoolboy dream, but now it is much intensified.
We can guess that something has been planned, which is altogether too bad to be made conscious.
He desires the Mother, he wishes to commit incest, this is very awkward, it is much better to disguise it.
The details, if we picture them, are really very disagreeable; this is a pity, but in order to understand Freud’s idea I am afraid we must face them.
”Going on foot” is a curious detail.
These sort of details should never be overlooked.
The foot has a phallic significance , though it seems so innocent, so Oedipus is the arriere pensee again - Freud always conceives of primitive man as living in a kind of degenerate lust, always planning how to commit an incest.
This is not true at all, the primitive does not find sex exciting, it is much too easy to obtain.
There are plenty of women and sex is to him the simplest and most natural of things; the food supply is more precarious and therefore far more exciting.
Where sexuality is obstructed, these phantasies and repressed wishes undoubtedly do exist.
The more it is obstructed, the more exciting it becomes.
When a conversation approaches dangerous ground, someone changes the subject and says ”Apropos” and the dream is now getting dangerous, so it says ”apropos the haymakers”.
The arriere pensee was becoming too obvious, so the censor steps in and the whole thing begins at the beginning again - but in this case the idea is really anxious to become conscious, so it walks up over the hill, in the form of the crab-lizard monster.
This is the Oedipus complex again, the Mother in her most monstrous form.
The dreamer feels like an ant beside the crab-lizard and the childhood situation is again fulfilled, he is a small child with his huge monster mother.
This is a childhood memory of the time when the mother appeared as fabulously large.
We have all experienced going back to places and finding that what we remembered as so large is quite small and ordinary.
It takes the normal individual 20 or 30 years to find out that his parents are ordinary sized mortals and not Napoleons, saints or devils, and some people never find this out, but carry these images with them throughout their lives. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture II 2Nov1934 Pages 143-146

Carl Jung on Leopold the Guardian Angel of Helene's (2015-04-07 16:33)

Lecture XIII 2nd February, 1934
From the reactions that I have received from some of the youthful members of my audience.
I am aware that they object to so much factual material and would like me to give you more of my own point of view.
I consider that I have done this pretty freely already, but you must bear in mind that I set out to give a course of lectures on modern psychology and that subject comprises a great many people besides myself.
On the other hand, factual material is an indispensable component of such lectures, we have to deal with the whole psyche and we must keep close to the warmth of the human herd, or we should get lost in cold theories.
I should like to repeat that the cases we have been discussing are not unique or abnormal, as some of my audience still seem to think, they lie more or less hidden in the unconscious of ordinary people.
It is true that few have these actual experiences and therefore it is an exceedingly difficult task to make them comprehensible, But it is a necessary preparation for the study of modern psychology.
To proceed with our case, Leopold is the figure who acted for years as Helene's guardian angel, interfering with her from time to time especially in critical situations.
He is a shadowy figure from the dark unconscious background, with initiative of his own.
We cannot treat this phenomenon merely as a disturbing element, it possesses intention and intelligence and is not just an automaton.
During a sitting with Group N. Helene had the vision of a conjuror waving a magic wand over a carafe of water.
This figure was interpreted as Joseph Balsamo because Alexandre Dumas in his novel: "Memoires d'un Medecin, Joseph Balsamo", describes a similar scene.
The guide himself then said that Leopold was only his pseudonym and that he was in reality Joseph Balsamo, or rather Cagliostro, under which name the famous magician and arch imposter of the XVIIIth century fooled the world.
This led to a whole romance, for Helene imagined that she had been Balsamo's medium in a former existence and that she was the reincarnation of his Lorenza Feliciani.

She only gave up the idea when she realised that Lorenza was a creation of Dumas' and had never existed in reality.
Leopold then told Helene that she was Marie-Antoinette who played a role in the famous "scene· de la carafe".
In Dumas' novel Marie-Antoinette meets Joseph Balsamo in the Chateau de Tavernay where she is resting on her way to Paris.
He is gazing into a carafe of water and sees her fate.
When he refuses to reveal it to her, Marie-Antoinette kneels down and looks into the carafe herself and faints away.
As a result of this story, Helene got into her head that she was a Alexandre Dumas.
reincarnation of Marie-Antoinette and had a love affair with Balsamo.
As Cagliostro was very much en vogue at the court of Louis XVI, it is probable that the Queen also consulted him, but the love episode is certainly a creation of Dumas' fertile imagination.
The name Leopold intrigued Flournoy, and rightly, for such names often hold a deeper meaning than is at first apparent.
A friend of Flournoy's suggested that its choice hung on the three consonants L.P.D.
These letters stood for the device of the "Illuminati".
In the introduction to his novel Dumas describes a meeting of the "Illuminati" and Free Masons of all countries on the Donnersberg near Mainz in 1770.
He tells how a stranger (who is 110 other than Joseph Balsamo) begs to be admitted to the society and gives himself out as "The one who is".
The president confirms him as the "enlightened one", for on his breast he bears the three letters L.P.D.; the delegates from all the countries, Swedenborg and Lavater among them, recognise him as their leader and ask for his commands.
His aim is to abolish the monarchic system within twenty years, with the help of his followers, and to introduce a new and universal order.
For this purpose all representatives, in their respective countries, must work for the destruction of the royal fleur de lys under the device "lilia pedibus destrue" (L.P.D.).
This is not quite historical, for the order of the "Illuminati" was founded by Adam Weishaupt only in 1776; the latter went to France to prepare the revolution.
The order was destroyed there and had practically disappeared in that country by the year 1800, but it was revived in Germany in 1880.
This society had a way of adding all famous men to the list of its members, in its early days Goethe and Herder, for instance.
These historical facts are important in this connection because they are symbolic; they characterise the interesting point that Helene's spiritual leader, Leopold, is a member of a secret society.
This is significant because Leopold is not a unity, but a plurality, he is at once the monk, Victor Hugo, BalsamoCagliostro and Leopold himself; we must bear this in mind.
When asked about his name, he said that he had taken that of a friend belonging to the House of Austria.
He now succeeded in writing with the medium's hand.
There would often be a long struggle with the pencil, for Helene was used to holding it between the first and second fingers and he insisted on the ordinary way, which gave her cramp.
The writing was old fashioned and the spelling that of the XVIIIth century; but it bore no resemblance to Cagliostro's authentic handwriting.
The control neither spoke nor understood Italian, although he spoke through the medium with an Italian accent.
One of Leopold's peculiarities was to give very evasive answers to direct questions.
His style was very wordy, he wrote verse in the manner of a "Victor Hugo inferieur" and he flowed over with moral and philosophical talk.
His memory was far better than that of the medium.
Helene often had the feeling that she was identical with her guide, to the point of her actually being Leopold, although Flournoy says that she never lost her own identity.
The identification with Leopold happened especially at night and in the early morning.
The two states of consciousness were not completely separate and they shared certain peculiarities such as temperament and animosity.

Leopold set himself up as an authority on all subjects, the less he knew of them the more authoritative he became.
He appeared sometimes as a sorcerer and alchemist in possession of elixirs and secret remedies and played the role of doctor with success.
Many people consulted him through Helene although he affected a great disdain for modern medicine and his prescriptions were as antiquated as his spelling.
It is interesting to learn that Helene's mother was well versed in the curative properties of plants and herbs and was skilled in the preparation of old fashioned prescriptions and so-called old wives' remedies.
This is probably the source of Leopold's knowledge.
His tender love for the medium, as Marie-Antoinette, played a great role; he also wrote in endearing terms to "le grand ami Flournoy", but Helene was not aware of her own attachment to the doctor who was observing her.
On the other hand, Leopold was violently jealous and made tempestuous scenes if a male member of the group paid the medium attention.
Occasionally when Helene was writing Leopold would suddenly break through with his XVIIIth century style; he also appeared in her dreams.
Flournoy says of him: "ce mentor austere et rigide, ... presente, en somme, une donnee psychologique tres generale; il n'y a aucune arne feminine bien nee qui ne le porte loge dans un de ses recoins".
Flournoy is quite right, this figure is by no means unique, on the contrary it is very common, only we do not often see it in such a definite form.
It is a typical and universal figure which I have called the "animus"; no woman exists who does not possess it.
In the whole of my experience I have only come across two exceptions to this rule: the first was an Englishwoman, a friend of Mrs. Pankhurst, a militant suffragette; she lacked this figure because she was identical with it.
The second was a hermaphrodite who came to me because she was in doubt as to whether she should live her life as a man or a woman.
Very few women realise that they have such a masculine figure and it is very difficult to point out in so-called normal women, for it leads its existence in the dark and only shows itself indirectly.
In order to explore such figures we must turn again to the shadow consciousness of the human being. Carl Jung, Lecture XII, 2Feb1934, Pages 55-57.

Lecture V 17th November, 1933

Justinus Kerner belongs to the school of Romanticists, he is not really a scientist and his book contains a number of more or less naive interpretations.

In the ”Clairvoyante of Prevorst” Kerner describes the case of his patient, Frau Friederike Hauffe, who was born in 1801 in the village of Prevorst, where her father was a forester.

All we know about her immediate family is that her brothers and sisters were subject to convulsions, but we are given to understand that there was no trace of epilepsy the most interesting fact is that her grand-father was gifted with what the Scotch call second sight.

The Clairvoyante began life as a happy normal child, soon however a very vivid dream-life developed, with the striking characteristic that her dreams came true; she hers elf believed in them and was often, for instance, able to tell where a lost object was to be found.

She also showed great skill as a water-diviner.

The child had a horror of graveyards and her grandfather, who undertook her education, noticed on their daily walks that she would suddenly be taken with uncontrollable shivering fits when they reached certain spots, and he believed that they were then walking over long forgotten graves.

This feeling became so acute that she was unable to sit in the choir of the village church because there were tombs directly beneath it.

She developed a specific sense for the uncanny and could see ghosts in haunted places.

In Schloss Lowenstein she peeped into the kitchen, but could on no account be induced to enter it and years later the ghost of a woman was seen there.

These stories do not as yet prove anything, for it may merely have been the fear of ghosts that gave rise to such visions.

Nevertheless it is a fact that the Clairvoyante’s thoughts took on a visible form.

She was completely unconscious of certain thinking processes within herself and they could therefore only reach her consciousness in the form of visions.

For it is a rule that no conscious thought becomes exteriorised: if we go into a haunted place thinking that we may see a ghost we never do, because the thought has already been thought, but if, on the other hand, we enter it without expectation we may see something.

To the distress of the child’s grandparents, this sense of unseen ghostly influences around her soon took the shape of real apparitions.

She first actually saw a ghost in her grandparents’ house at midnight, a tall dark figure swept past her with a sigh and stood gazing at her from the end of the passage.

She was not in the least frightened, but her grandfather was terrified when she told him what she had seen, for he had had the same experience in exactly the same spot but had kept the incident to himself.

We might say that the child had been influenced by her grandfather, but it is more likely that she als o was gifted with second sight.

He tried to reason her out of her belief in what she had seen, but he was unable to shake her sense of reality with regard to these experiences.

Kerner does not doubt that she really did see ghosts because he himself was convinced of their existence.

It is useless to reason with people who believe in ghosts, by saying ”ghosts do not exist” etc.

We have to talk to them on their own level, taking for granted that there are such things; if we do not, we throw away any advantage the conversation may offer.

In any case we can make no sweeping assertions in this field, for all proof is lacking.

In the same way you must speak to primitives in their own language, assuming that the things they believe in really exist.

The word ghost should never be mentioned among them, for to do so calls the ghosts forth.
I learned this in Africa, where I made the mistake of asking the natives what their ghost houses were and they reacted exactly as a drawing room full of respectable people would to an obscene remark.
In any case, the Clairvoyante's visions lead us to the conclusion that she possessed the faculty of exteriorization, of seeing psychic processes as if existing outside herself.
These processes are based on psychological facts, but we do not know scientifically whether ghosts exist or not.
Kant may possibly be right when he says:
"It will yet be proved in the future that even in this life the human being stands in an indissoluble association with all immaterial beings of the spirit world, that he affects them and receives impressions from them of which however he is not conscious, so long as all goes well."
But this noteworthy remark is very optimistic, because we should need exact physical methods to be able to prove objective reality in this field, otherwise the subjective factor would always have to be taken into account.
In my estimation, second sight is not an illness, but a gift; you might as well say that it is pathological to be endowed with remarkable intelligence, but the possession of a gift always carries with it the burden of responsibility.
We can have prophetic dreams without possessing second sight, innumerable people have such anticipatory dreams.
The Clairvoyante, however, soon began to show unmistakably pathological symptoms , the first of these was an extraordinary sensitiveness to light and irritation of the eyes and this condition lasted a year.
This is a common symptom and is psychogenetic.
It is a kind of psychic blinking, an inability to stand the clear light of consciousness.
This typical psychological affection, which is a symbolic over sensitiveness to light, is also often met with in people who have an unconscious bad conscience; they blink from fear that they might reveal themselves.
Nothing of importance happened after this till the Clairvoyante reached her nineteenth year, when she became engaged to Herr Hauffe, a colorless young man who plays only a shadowy role in the story.
On the day of the betrothal an old preacher died, he was a man whom she greatly honoured and revered.
The Clairvoyante was singularly affected at his funeral.
She could hardly tear hers elf away from the grave and was in a very strange condition, as the result of a vision in which the old preacher appeared as a ghost hovering over the grave.
She was used to seeing ghosts and look them as a matter of course, but this experience impressed her very deeply, for at this moment she felt the stirring of a life in her innermost b eing; she wrote a poem ab out it and remained for a long time under its spell.
The Clairvoyante married in August 1821 and at first she lived a normal life and had a child.
Shortly after her marriage, in February 1822, she had a fateful dream: she dreamt that she lay in bed beside the corpse of the preacher; in the next room she heard the voice of her father talking to two doctors who had been called in in consultation as she was very seriously ill.
She called out to them: "Leave me alone beside this dead man, he can cure me and no doctor can".
She felt as if they wished to draw her away from the corpse and cried aloud in her dream:

”How well I feel beside this dead person, now I shall be completely cured”.
Next day she was seized with a violent fever which lasted fourteen days; a bad neurosis followed which led to her death in her twenty-ninth year.
What has happened here?
The Clairvoyante has taken the side of her dream.
We think we could not possibly allow ourselves to be entangled in a certain fate through a dream, but Frau Hauffe could not have acted otherwise, she was so constituted that the dream was her reality, she identified with the dead man and died while she still lived, that is to say she dropped back more and more into the psychic background.
The death of the old preacher was the experience that made clear to her that she lived more with the dead than with the living, the figures of the inner world were her realities, beside which husband and child were mere shadows.
If she accepts the dream, she will accept her inner reality and feel well, but then she must follow it into the psychic background until she ceases to exist.
If a patient were to bring me a dream in which the dead and not the doctor worked the cure, I should ask:
”Why did you come to me?
”If she replied: ”The dream seems strange to me, I cannot imagine why I should think that the dead could cure me”, I should undertake the case;
but if she gave the same answer as in the dream, it would be fatal, I could do nothing for her.
As a matter of fact such a person would probably never come to analysis and if she did she would certainly manage to man oeuvre the doctor on to the side of death, unless he had great experience in such cases.
One might say that the very fact of her coming to analysis would in itself be a considerable argument against her being wholly on the side of her dream.
But it is a very ominous dream and as a doctor I consider it very questionable whether anything could have been done for her.
There are cases where it is better not to interfere; we must fulfil our duty as doctors, but the fact remains that some people are not meant to be cured, they are not fitted for life and if you step in and interfere fate always takes its revenge on you.
I have known cases where people become as it were somnambulists and disappear into the unconscious, it is as if they had never been born.
This disproves the theory that a child’s mind is a tabula rasa, for it shows us that the unconscious is no empty surface, but a prepared ground; the brain is complete with the history of the world and every child is born with an unconscious assumption of the world.
But for this we could not grasp the world at all.
There is no escape from this psychic background with which we enter life, it can only be accepted, we are bound to see the world through our own inborn temperament.
Frau Hauffe feels healed and normal when she slips back into the psychic processes and ill if she ventures into the real world where she encounters insurmountable conflict; so she steps ever further back into the unconscious. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture V, Pages 25-28.

Carl Jung on “Clairvoyance,” “Ghosts and Spirits,” and “Mandalas.” (2015-04-08 07:50)

Lecture IX 15th December, 1933
The phenomena with which we have been especially concerned in the Clairvoyante’s experience, fall under three heads:
1 . Supernatural sense perceptions (clairvoyance, etc.) .
2. Ghosts and Spirits .
3 . Vision of the Sun Circle, or Mandala (Mandala is the Indian term for circle).
1. The Supernatural sense perceptions consist principally of clairvoyant phenomena.
They appear in space and time.
At first it may seem nonsensical that such unnatural things can happen and I am aware, from the reactions that I have received, that a large part of my audience looks upon the Clairvoyante’s case as a very exaggerated one.
This is, however, sheer ignorance.
We simply do not know how common such experiences are.
Every one of us has Frau Hauffe in our unconscious , but the human psyche is amazingly unknown.
Such a mass of irrefutable evidence exists, however, that we cannot overlook these phenomena, and, as a psychologist, I handle these things too frequently not to believe in them.
We should approach such things with an attitude of unlimited patience, allowing the material to work upon us in its own way.
But in this field it is very easy to deceive ourselves, we cannot be too careful how we sift our material, for we are on dangerous ground.
We must assume, then, that at any rate some of the reports of the Clairvoyante’s strange experiences which I have given you really correspond to the facts.

After so many years it is of course impossible to verify them, but such things really do occur and I have met with similar cases.
I should like to stress the fact that intense withdrawal from outer reality brings about an animation of the inner world which calls forth these phenomena. People like Frau Hauffe, whose psychic energy has left the outer world, have such experiences; it is simply a fact, even if it is a very inconvenient one, which we must take into account.
The existence of such things is only denied by those who are determined to prove their own theories of the universe, so determined that they simply ignore everything that does not fit in with them.
Such people deny these phenomena any scientific validity and leave any inconvenient and too obtrusive facts to the poets.
But psychology, of all things, demands that we be honest and shut our eyes to nothing.
This brings us to the strange problem of the relativity of space and time.
We have fixed ideas about these and when we meet with facts, such as those experienced by Frau Hauffe, we are greatly disturbed for these phenomena go right against our usual conception of the absolute validity of space and time.
Some of the cleverest people, however, have always questioned the absolute character of space and time; Kant, for instance, had such doubts when he wrote:
”Space is a necessary a priori conception, which lies at the base of all external perceptions. One can never conceive of there being no space although one can quite well imagine finding no objects in it.”
Space is a pure conception, the condition a priori of all spatial experiences generally.
It possesses ”empirical reality” and is the frame of all outer experience.
Time is ”the formal condition a priori of all phenomena”.
Time as inner sense (space being the outer sense) has “subjective reality”.
It would be difficult to challenge these formulae.
Modern physics have also come to doubt the absolute character of space and time.
If they are relative factors they cannot possess absolute validity; we have to assume that an absolute reality would be differently constituted from our space and time reality.
It is possible then that phenomena appear which are not subject to the laws of space and time.
The psychic facts have neither length, breadth , nor weight, but are essentially spaceless, and it is exceedingly difficult to determine their duration.
We are unable to measure the time in which a psychic process takes place; we can measure the psycho-physical reactions, but psychic things in and for themselves cannot be determined by time.
On the contrary, we often experience the fact that psychic events do happen in an unbelievably short fraction of time.
It has been proved over and over again that very long dreams can take place in the shortest time imaginable.
You dream, for instance, of long military preparations, then war is declared, it breaks out, the guns thunder . . .and you find that you are being called in the morning.
Did the endless dream happen between the first knock and the last, or did it start earlier and lead up to the moment of the knocking from an anticipatory knowledge of the very second in which the knock at the door would occur?
Another long dream culminates in your head being cut off and at that very instant the canopy of the bed falls on your neck.
It is common knowledge that in the second before they drown, people can see their whole lives pass before them in a flash.
This can also happen when falling over a precipice.

Thus we get endless examples of a different space and time reality which cannot be grasped by the empirical mind.
I have chosen the case of the ”Clairvoyante of Prevorst” in order to show you how intense introversion causes the characteristic peculiarities of the psychic background to come out into the light of day, for it is very important that we should understand this inner life.
Numerous examples show us that without doubt everyone of us is capable of having anticipatory dreams.
Read J. W. Dunne’s book: ”An Experiment with Time”, where the author relates the dream he had in Africa, describing the terrible Martinique earthquake the night before the newspaper accounts reached him.
He was in touch with something which had not yet reached his sphere of consciousness.
Dreams border all the time on things which are right outside our space and time conception.
Dunne speaks of a displacement in time.
It is as if a slip occurred in the time we are familiar with and enabled us to see round the corner into another order of time.
2. Ghosts and Spirits.

These phenomena are projections from the background of the psyche, autonomous inner images of a subjective nature, obeying no conscious intention, but coming and going at their own volition.
We all experience these autonomous contents, only they strike us in different ways, for instance when we say:
”It has suddenly occurred to me” or such and such a thing has «just come into my mind”; if we stood a little closer to

Frau Hauffe's makeup, we should say that we saw a ghost; or again if we were nearer to the lunatic, we should declare: "A voice told me so and so.
"A man walked down a London street, taking no notice of the names of the shop s or the advertisements, but he heard a loud trumpeting voice announcing them.
We have this sort of thing within us, but we are unaware of it till something goes suddenly out of gear and out it all pours.
is only through a certain effort that the conscious registers what it encounters; that which is not in its focus is also recorded, but it fails to reach consciousness and remains unconscious.
This shows us that the psyche is not identical with consciousness.
The threshold of consciousness, where the unconscious is forever intruding, is very indistinct: we notice things and do not really notice them, or we forget them and they suddenly appear.
All we have ever heard lies dormant in our unconscious till something provokes it and it walks out autonomously.
A patient was once brought to me in a very neurotic condition, she was a girl of 18 who had been most carefully brought up and had led a very sheltered existence; yet, to the horror of her family, she now swore with a fluency that a bargee might have envied.
I was asked how she could possibly be acquainted with such a vocabulary?
I could not tell just where she had heard such language, I could only suggest that she had, for instance, heard navvies and carters swearing at their horses.
The street is full of such things and the unconscious always sees and hears everything, but it requires a great effort of concentration to register this consciously.
If the light were suddenly to go out and you could no longer see me, you would not be likely to think that I had ceased to exist, yet it would be no more foolish than to assume that the contents of the psychic background only exist when we can see them.
These autonomous things follow their own laws and not ours.
The ancients understood this far better than we do, they did not speak, therefore, of being in love but of being possessed or hit by a god.
We do not only experience these psychic contents as a state of possession, but also as a sense of loss, for the unconscious can steal away fragments of our conscious psyche and rob us of our energy.
This is what has happened when we say that we have "keine Lust" (no inclination) for something or other.
The primitive would say that he had lost one of his souls, for he believes that he has many, and he would lie on the ground trying to remind himself who he was.
We are moved by the same instinct when we bite our nails during a dull lecture to remember who is sitting there, for we are in danger of partially losing ourselves.
The psyche has a great desire to become whole and to collect back its scattered parts.
When we say: "I jumped out of my skin", or "I was beside myself with rage", we mean just the same as the primitive when he says: "I have lost a soul".
We cannot escape b eing influenced by psychic contents, it is our natural condition; therefore I always feel very suspicious when somebody assures me that he is very normal, too many normal people are just compensated madmen.
The really normal man has no need to be always correct, or to stress his normality; he can be possessed by an idea, a conviction, a feeling, he can live all sides of himself and do many foolish things.
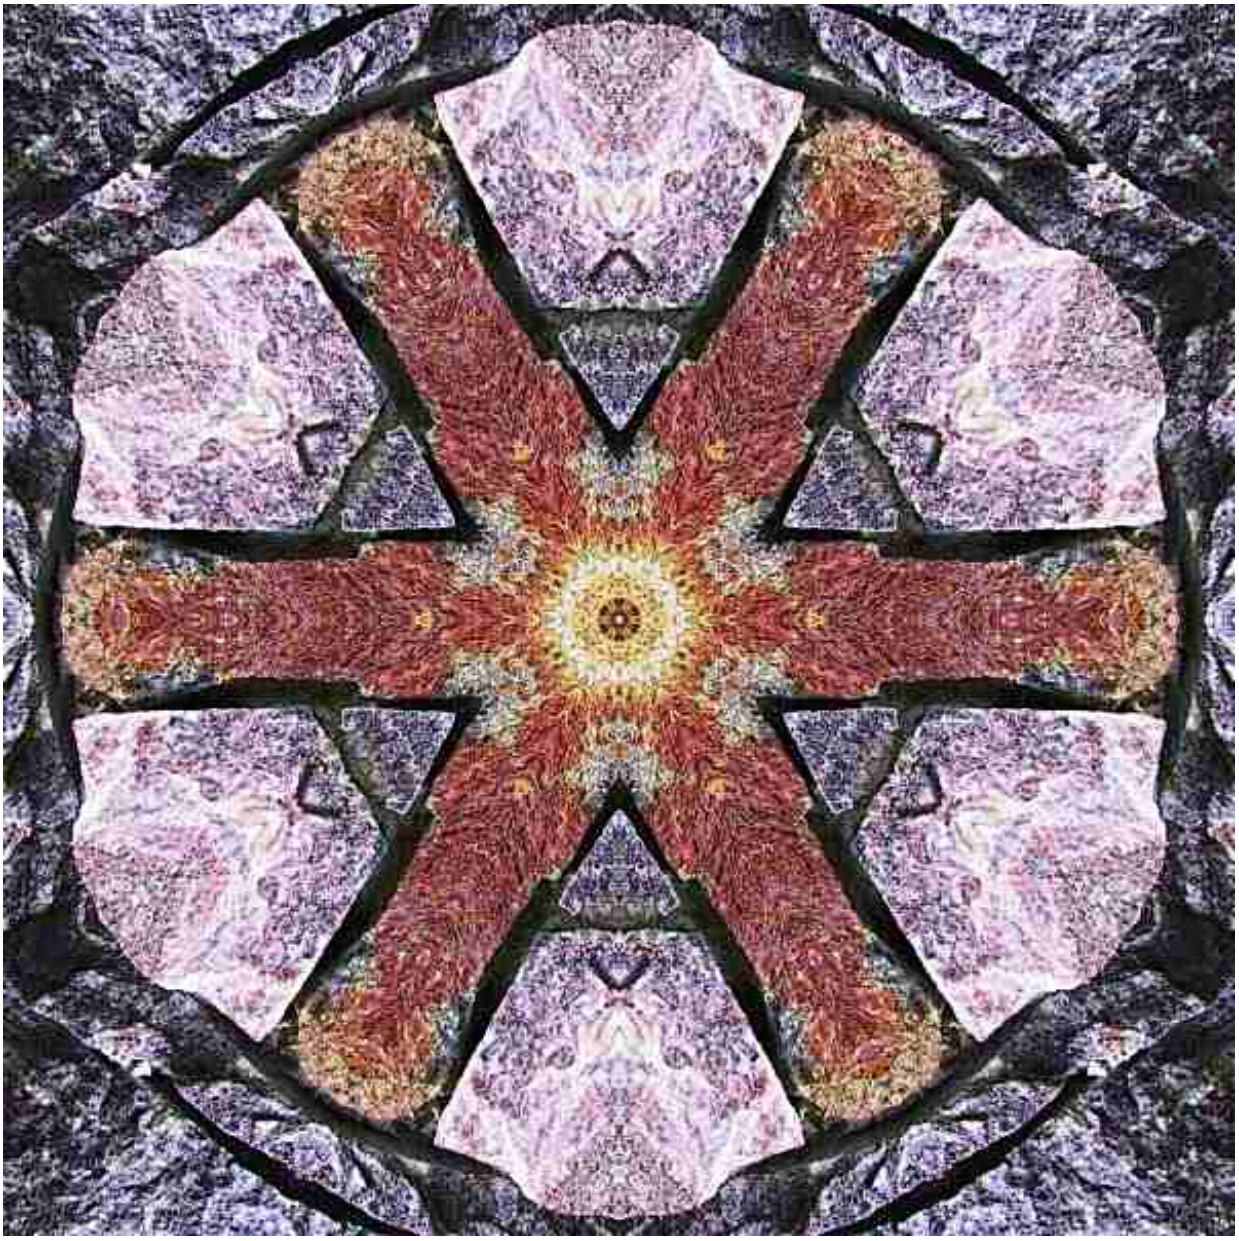
3. Mandalas.



This third phenomenon, the circle or mandala, is one of the most remarkable in existence.
Unfortunately it is very little known, although it is a fundamental expression of the human psyche.
Up till the present, this phenomenon has been given very little consideration, and yet mandalas occur all over the world.
Since man has existed, the circle has had its symbolic and magic meaning, we meet it everywhere, from the sand paintings of the Pueblos to the mandalas of the Chinese and the same basic elements are always present.
It is really necessary that we should realise that such things exist, even if we know nothing of them.
I have purposely used a case of Kerner's and not one of my own in bringing this phenomenon to your notice, so that there could be no question of influence or suggestion.
When I was a student, I came across a girl of fifteen who was a somnambulist, gifted with second sight and she produced a circle very similar to the Clairvoyante's.
She spoke of the central point as full of energy and radiant light and of the second ring as cold.
Whereas the Clairvoyante of Prevorst looked up on her circle as a wall, protecting her from the darts of the outer world, the magic circle has, from time immemorial, been used as a protection against the inner world, the world of spirits. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture IX,15Dec1933, Pages 39-42.

Carl Jung on a Life of Complete Introversion. (2015-04-08 16:38)

Lecture X 12th January, 1934
Last time we brought the case of the Clairvoyante of Prevorst to a close.
She was a case of pure introversion, everything in her turned away from the reality of the outer world.
Reality as we know it had no value for her, indeed she defended herself against it; but another kind of reality appeared which is unknown to us, of which we only hear in legends.
This is the background of the psyche and it was as substantial to her as outer reality is to most people.
Where we live among real people, she dwelt among spirits, where we see the real sun and moon, she saw the inner sun and moon.
This is the result of very pronounced introversion, wherever it exists in such an extreme form these experiences are its natural outcome.
When questioned about these inner experiences people will usually deny them, and for several reasons.
Firstly because they feel shy about them and are afraid of exposing themselves to ridicule; the Clairvoyante, however, was too deeply convinced of the reality of her experiences to be troubled by such fears.
Secondly, people are as a rule afraid of these things, for they have heard that they belong to the field of psychiatry.
Thirdly, because people frequently remain unconscious of these experiences, and as a consequence they suffer indirectly from symptoms.
In every case of very pronounced introversion, the three groups of phenomena, which I mentioned in the last lecture, occur:

first, experience of the relative character of space and time; secondly, the autonomy of certain psychic contents and thirdly, the experience of symbols belonging to a centre which does not coincide with the centre of consciousness and which is equivalent to an experience of God.
It is true that the Clairvoyante's was a border line case and that these cases are rare, but we do meet with them.
Cases of extreme introversion which is being compensated by extraversion are more frequent; these will seem less remote to us than the case we have been studying and we shall then see more clearly how near such experiences are to us all.
If people are not fated to die in a state of complete introversion, this compensation must take place.
The inner background then becomes less intense, it is clouded over and all sorts of elements of an outer reality begin to mingle with it, till the psychic background is finally translated into the banality of daily life.
We will consider this compensation in its main stages, not in regard to any particular case, but as I have been able to observe it generally.
1. The inner centre gradually disappears, the vision of the inner sun grows dim; spirits still persist and phenomena of a telepathic nature which are characterised by deviations from our laws of space and time.
2. Autonomous spirits or figures disappear, only dreams and intuitions, sudden warnings and inspirations remain.
At the same time, certain peculiarities appear in consciousness: the memory is unreliable and this partial amnesia cannot be accounted for rationally.
These disturbances are all that remain of the autonomous phenomena.
Primitives explain lapses of memory by the presence of ghosts and witches who suddenly steal away the content.
3. The whole psychic background disappears, no phenomena remain and the memory is normal.
Psychic events do not seem to exist any longer.
But the more normal the attitude becomes, the more we find a defense mechanism being set up against the contents of the psychic background which no longer appear attractive.
Such people have resistances against these inconvenient psychic elements and begin to build a thick wall of rational skepticism and scientific attitudes round them, hoping to lock out and banish them altogether - and if something does creep through, it is dismissed as "merely psychological".
But on account of this splitting off, a regular witches' Sabbath of incompatible complexes goes on behind the wall.
The conscious also grows too strong in proportion to the degree in which the psychic background is walled off.
These people begin to consider themselves very interesting and important and thus become most dreadful bores; this is an inflation of the ego and is a neurotic condition.
Because they have a wrong attitude, and really know it, they become hypersensitive (over sensitiveness is always suspicious!) and a regular egg dance has to be performed around them in order not to tread on their psychological toes.
4. This unbalanced condition improves when extraversion really sets in and all thought of the wall and what it hides is forgotten.
The person then leaves all introspection behind and turns towards the conscious world with a sense of relief and freedom.
His friends will push him still further along the path he has chosen: he must meet people, he must travel, he must throw himself into something, fill up his time, use his will etc., these people become real acrobats of the will.

The objective values now act as so many magnets, to be normal and healthy is of the first importance - but do we really know what to be ”normal” means?
The inner world is now completely in the dark and appears only here and there in the form of slight disturbances.
Such a person says that he is happy and that he feels splendid.
He adopts the attitude of ”healthy mindedness” towards life which is typical of the American, built up entirely on the extraverted principle.
All seems to go swimmingly, he overflows with wonderful descriptions of his family and his enviable lot, till one day he goes over into the opposite and appears with a face a yard long, because he has had a bad dream.
Dreams are invasions from the Hinterland, from time to time the shadow from behind the wall announces itself.
A patient once came to me in exactly this exaggeratedly extraverted condition.
I advised him to take an hour off every day and spend it with himself.
He jumped at the idea, saying this would enable him to play the piano with his wife, to read, to write etc., and when I objected to one alternative after the other and with great difficulty made him realise that he was to be really alone, he looked desperate and exclaimed: ”But I should become melancholy!”
5. The peak of extraversion is reached when the inner world becomes entirely unconscious and the person is identical with what he would like to be or thinks he is.
We can often observe this in people who have been successful in life, they are their profession, for instance, and nothing else ;they are identified with the object and have no idea what their subject is like.
Such people appear to be wonderfully adapted to their surroundings and radiate their marvellous rightness.
They have given themselves up to a cause, they are no longer themselves, they are their position, their profession, their cause, and are already living in their biographies.
There is a good story about a Basel parson which illustrates this condition admirably (psychology consists of good stories!).
He was full of zeal for the welfare of his congregation and eager to provide it with the recreation he felt it required, but he was poor - such people choose their parents badly and never have any money, they always have to beg it from others!
On his rounds among the richer Basel citizens, he called on a very sarcastic professor of theology who was well furnished with this world’s goods.
After much pleading, during which the professor remained unmoved, the parson leapt up in a rage, screaming: ”Der Herr will es!” (The Lord demands it !)
The professor, pointing at him, replied ”Der Herr will es.” (This lord demands it.)
This road leads to the illusion that what I, a lamentably small ego, want, is the will of God.
But this outward movement is not just ridiculous, for it is part of the psychological growth of man.
It is a right attitude for children and young people who have to forget the psychic background in order to go wholeheartedly into the world where they must make their way.
Youth has to build many walls in order to shut off the background from the ego, so that it may believe in the outer world; for to remain under the fascination of the inner images causes hesitation and lack of accomplishment, and to live, to be wholly devoted to something, is also an art which must not be despised.
Getting into life is absolutely essential to young people.
One could argue that they should not hear the things of which I have been speaking, yet those among them who are philosophically, religiously or artistically minded, must know that something exists besides the outer world; for if they misplace the values which belong to the inner world and try to see them outside, their world picture will become distorted.
Many difficulties arise from the fact that relationships and other outside values are treated with an importance which they do not deserve. Carl Jung, Lecture X, 12Jan1934, Pages 43-45

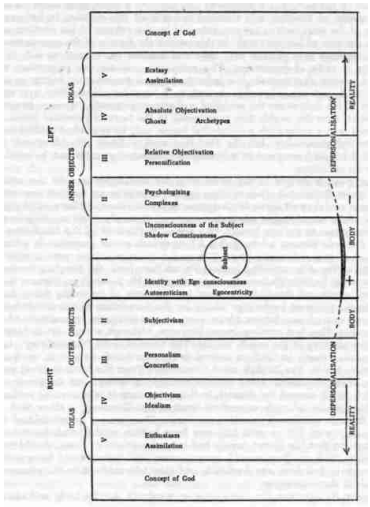
Carl Jung on “Figures of the Unconscious.” (2015-04-08 17:36)



[Carl Jung on “Figures of the Unconscious.”]
Lecture XIV 9th February, 1934
We will again resort to a diagram (Diagram V, p. 59) in order to elucidate the figures of the unconscious which we spoke of last time.
It consists of ten spheres of consciousness; the five on the Right side belong to consciousness of outer reality and the five on the Left side belong to consciousness of inner reality.
Everybody is conscious in some of these spheres.
Left side of Diagram.
In the sphere of consciousness marked as Section I the shadow begins to make itself felt.
But it is only experienced in this section as a slight feeling of something missing, a ”leger sentiment d’incompletude” which gives rise to self-consciousness and a sense of inferiority.
People look for the cause of these disturbing feelings in the outer world, they think their collar is crumpled or their tie crooked; the savant will doubt his book, the singer his voice and so on.
They unwittingly place their inferiority where they really do not fear criticism; but in analysis I have to show 1hem that the real cause lies further back on this unconscious shadow side, where it is much more difficult to see.
While the light of consciousness is entirely on the Right side, people are able to have implicit faith in their good intentions.
They come to me with a glowing description of their ideal marriage and happy circumstances, yet I know that a neurosis has brought them, and why should they be neurotic if the conditions of their life are so perfect? In analytical treatment the light moves further and fur1her to the left, as one endeavours to make each successive sphere conscious.
Though the shadow makes itself felt in section I, yet the focus of concentration is on the ego.
This section is in close relation to the body and its needs are all important.

When the field of consciousness is narrow, the body plays an important role.
Such people connect their complexes with the body; psychological disturbances appear to them in the form of physical illness.
They are ego-centric and feel inferior, but dwelling so much on themselves may at least give them some idea of their shadow and their field of consciousness thus tends to become less restricted.
In Section II the body is still important, but there is no longer just one object as in Section I, but several objects, inner objects.
People begin to become conscious of the existence of complexes as factors which work independently of the ego.
Anybody who is conscious of a complex knows what a disobedient animal it is: you wish, for instance, to be particularly pleasant to somebody, it walks in and prevents you, you want to sleep and it keeps you awake; it is as objective as a disobedient dog or a tormenting fly.
All the inner objects thus tend to pull the ego out of its comfortable snail's shell.
In this section, people tend to become more interested in the psychological aspect of their conflicts, and in certain neurotic cases the reality of the body suffers.
A patient of mine once sat down on a bench by the lake to think over her psychological difficulties, although the thermometer registered six degrees below zero, and was surprised that she had to pay for her folly with inflammation of the lungs.
Another patient, who had been in analysis for a long time, arrived one day in a completely bewildered condition and it was some time before
I discovered what the reason for this was: she had forgotten to lunch!
Fatigue or hunger, especially if unrealized, takes its revenge in mental confusion.
In Section III the body may be largely forgotten.
The complexes become personified, their autonomy is more pronounced and we can look upon them as relative objectivation, although they are still subjectively coloured.
Leopold is such a figure, a state of trance was necessary to make him visible.
In Section IV the body has disappeared and absolute objectivation takes place; the Clairvoyante of Prevorst is a classic example of this section.
In her case the figures of the unconscious are not coloured by the subject of the medium as they are in the case of Helene Smith.
In this section the figures of the unconscious are so autonomous and strange that they can enslave us.
Primitives call this phenomenon a state of possession.
The complexes assume the proportion of figures and powers that possess the individual; these autonomous beings come and go at will and compel people to act in a way for which they are not responsible.
These figures are the so-called archetypes, primordial types or images which exist all over the world, they correspond to the facts of primitive psychology.
Leopold is in a sense such a primordial figure, only he is clothed in the form of an historical personality, but the fact that such a figure should appear is archetypal.
If Leopold were not so subjectively connected with Helene, he would himself be an archetype.
Ideas can possess people in the same way, for archetypes can be the equivalents of ideas.
Primordial types of ideas appear strange to us, for they are very different from our abstract ideas. Ideas appear to primitives as attributes of things, they speak of the actual object when they mean an idea: of a river meaning freedom, of a mountain to express loyalty.
In a book "At the Back of the Black Man's Mind", by Osborne Dennet, a king makes a long speech on his accession in which he speaks of objects and means ideas.

It is as if a Swiss politician were to speak of the chain of the Alps standing immovably on their base, the Jungfrau rearing its majestic white head to the heavens - meaning that his political programme was magnificent, sound and should be believed in.
This way of regarding things has its origin in the primeval beginnings which are the foundation of the archetypes.
Originally, what are now abstract ideas, were always things or transactions of a practical nature.
This fact appears in our language, although we are apt to forget the primitive meaning of the words we use.
The German word ”Behandlung”, for instance, means literally to handle a patient, to lay your hands on him, to work on him with your hands.
The English word ”treatment” (from the Latin trahere) and the French word ”traitement” mean to draw out (that is, to draw out the illness or an evil spirit which caused the illness).
In this connection it is interesting to find the Neolithic remains of such an ancient treatment in Cornwall, a stone with a hole in it through which sick people were drawn.
They were then considered to be reborn; they were fed on milk like new born babies, washed and dressed in clean clothes, so that the illness, which had been drawn out of them, should not recognise them.
Sick children are still drawn through this hole today.
I have given you one example, but there are thousands and they take us back to the primeval background of the archetypes.
To return to the diagram, the centre acts as a magnet, for the body will claim recognition and if we try to leave it behind it will pull us back.
People who are apparently entirely concentrated on something abstract, find themselves suddenly called back to the body by a slight pain, and others have to submit to long lingering illnesses in order to become interested in their neglected bodies.
Section V also acts as a magnet, but it draws you in the opposite direction, out of yourself, out of your body; its pull works against the senses and you forget yourself.
If we go back to Section II we see the beginning of this process.
It is there that we first got a dim inkling of something very uncanny in ourselves, something very different from the picture we had made of ourselves.
Naturally we tried to turn away from such an unpleasant idea, but the hunch was at work, and we were driven to see that, unbelievable as it might seem, this less reputable person roas also myself.
In Section V this work is completed and the appearance of an altogether different or superhuman entity, ”totaliter aliter”, leads to a depersonalization.
This is the sphere of ecstasy and mystical experience, in which the human being is dissolved in an absolute self.
The experiences which mystics describe are simply this stepping out of reality.
Right side of diagram.
This is the side of consciousness, of the so-called known world.
Section I on this Right side is the sphere of the empirical ego, this is identical with the body.
Section II is the sphere of objects, these correspond to the inner objects.
Outer objects affect us actively, but our perception of them is subjectively coloured, they appear to us as we see them and not as they really are.
It is very difficult to overcome this subjective stage.
This psychical subjectivism is a kind of egocentricity and leads to difficulties, for we take for granted that people and things are as we see them and so we often come to grief.
Section III is the sphere of personalism, where the objective factor becomes apparent, we are becoming aware of our own personalism and the other person has a value of his own.

The veil of subjectivism is lifted and we discover that people are not what we thought they were or what we should like them to be.
Our ”biltes noires” and our treasured heroes then turn into quite ordinary people.
In the sphere of subjectivism we expect the other person to be like ourselves and think him wrong if he is not.
In the sphere of personalism we accept him for what he is.
A hotel keeper, who finds that his chef does not share his own ideas about cooking and yet does not dismiss him, has already discerned personalism.
But already in this section, where other people become real to us, a certain doubt is beginning to form as to the absolute reality of pure concreteness, we are beginning to leave it behind as we move slowly towards another kind of reality.
Section IV is the sphere of objectivism.
In the sphere of personalism we had to reckon with a number of people whom we recognised to be different from ourselves, but they appeared to us as individuals.
In the sphere of objectivism we find the social idea, the personal world picture disappears and is replaced by impersonal idealism.
We are interested in people as groups: relations, friends, acquaintances, strangers etc.; they form clubs and societies and the ideas
And ideals which lie behind these societies are all important.
The political party appears as a compelling ideal, or patriotism becomes the highest obligation.
The idea of duty takes on the most ridiculous and the most sublime forms.
We must not lose sight of the fact that all these generally human ideas and ideals can be abused (for there is nothing in heaven or earth which the human animal will not abuse), but nevertheless real ideals do exist in this sphere and these have given rise to state, society, church, religion, etc.
In Section V, as in Section V on the Left side, the altogether different entity, ”totaliter aliter”, becomes an active force, magnetizing people out of themselves and bringing about a state of depersonalization. I do not feel competent to speak of this stage.
These poles themselves are really beyond human understanding, a mystic or a poet occasionally reaches them and speaks to us out of such a state of ecstasy, but any partial experience of them in our own lives is so strange to us that we wonder if it is not beyond the bounds of sanity.
These poles however cannot be ignored or treated as a ”nothing but”; when people will give their lives for something it cannot be a ”nothing but”.
It simply is a fact that some people are drawn out of themselves by a power which we do not understand.
This diagram is the result of years of experience with people of all ages and nationalities.
It is a diagram that one can think about for a long time.
One fact stands out clearly: namely that the human ego stands between two magnetic poles which pull eternally in opposite directions.
The ego is always in danger of having its unity destroyed.
If a complete split occurs, psychic dissociation or hysteria follows, and if it is rent in pieces, the result is schizophrenia.

Carl Jung on Kant, Hegel, Schelling, other early Psychologists (2015-04-09 05:30)

Lecture II 27th October, 1933
We will resume the line of development which we have been following.

We have now reached the age of critique and knowledge which begins towards the end of the XVIIth century.
Emanuel Kant (1724-1804) stands out as its dominating figure.
Kant contests the possibility of psychology being a science, he considers it at best a ” discipline”.
With his conception of ”dim representations”, Kant pursues Leibnitz’ train of thought and carries his ideas further.
In the first book of his ”Anthropology”, he speaks of ”representations” which we possess although we are not conscious of them.
He gives as an example the impression one gets of a person at some distance in a field, whom one sees indistinctly; the details, eyes, nose, mouth etc., are not recognisable, yet one has the idea that it is a person.
Kant continues ”That the field of our sense representations and sensations is infinite, though we are not conscious of most of these, yet we can without doubt conclude that we possess them, that is ’dim representations’ in people (and also in animals); the clear representations on the contrary contain only a few of these points which could be in consciousness; the fact that only a few places are illuminated on the great map of our minds can imbue us with awe and admiration at our own being: for a higher power would only have to cry: Let there be light! and without the least co-operation on our part . . . . . half a world would lie before (our) eyes. So the field of ’dim representations’ is the greatest in man.”
We may like to think that all psyches are single psyches, that no such thing as a collective psyche exists, in other words that the psyche is nothing more than consciousness, for consciousness is an individual phenomenon.
But can we really be so very sure of this?
Primitives, on the other hand, are not at all certain that they are distinct from each other or from their surroundings; when you are among them you hardly dare to kill a crocodile, for the primitive says: ”I am also that crocodile.”
It is only single illuminated points that we are clearly conscious of; the whole is dark.
I am reminded of the savant who said: ”If I knew what I have forgotten I would be the most learned of all men.”
Kant was the first to recognise the enormous extension of that which is not conscious.
The epoch of ”empirical psychology” comes to a close in Germany after Kant and is replaced by the age of the great metaphysical speculators.
Hegel and Schelling were in reality metaphysical speculators but when you examine their writings - particularly those of Hegel - carefully, you see they are full of projected psychology.
Georg Wilhelm Hegel (1770-1831) would be considered a psychologist today, but he was not conscious of this and called himself a philosopher, although he expressed some essential psychological ideas.

Friedrich Wilhelm Schelling (1775-1854) has a more positive attitude towards the unconscious and a certain insight.

He was able to formulate the idea that the unconscious is the absolute foundation of consciousness.
He speaks of ”the eternal unconscious, which as it were like the sun in the realm of the spirit, hides itself through its own unclouded light”.
He goes on to say: ”And although the unconscious never becomes the object, yet it stamps its identity on all free actions, being the same for all intelligences; it is the invisible root of which all intelligences are only the potentials, and is the eternal mediator between the self-determining subjective in us and the objective or contemplator, it is at once 1he basis of lawfulness in freedom and of freedom in lawfulness”.
We see that Schelling puts the accent altogether on the unconscious.

He makes a most important statement when he says: ”It is the same for all intelligences”; the primeval \ foundation is not differentiated, but universal.
In contrast to the line of development which we have been following in Germany, we see empirical psychology step forcefully into the foreground in England, where it takes its place very early as an important line of thought in modern science.
George Berkeley (1685-1753) is the first English empirical psychologist.
Berkeley makes sense perception his starting point.
He is convinced that when one neither sees, hears, nor feels anything, then nothing is present.
But he discovers the perception of his own senses as an equal factor to the object perceived.
Out of the fusion of subject and object Berkeley constructs the concept of psychological space.
David Hume (1711-1776) holds that representations derive from sensations.
He adopts Berkeley’s idea of fusion for his representations and asks himself by what laws things fuse with each other.
He concludes that they associate owing to similarity, coexistence in time and space and causality.
The association is brought about by means of “gentle force”, a law similar to that of gravitation.
The representations therefore mutually attract each other.
David Hartley (1705-1757) who is Hume’s contemporary, ventures among the complex psychic phenomena.
He explains these by a fusion of rapidly recurring or simultaneous sensations into a whole.
Joseph Priestley (1733-1804) materializes Hartley’s attempt, he identifies the psychic processes with brain processes.
The idea of instinct, the so-called common sense, appears with the Scottish School of philosophy.
Thomas Reid (1710-1796) is its first exponent.
According to Reid, the instinct of common sense is the direct and indubitable source of knowledge.
It is also through this instinct that we become acquainted with complex psychic processes.
Psychology, therefore, is bound to confine itself to the description of facts as observed by common sense.
The idea of looking at everything simply and objectively may seem banal at first sight, but it is the empirical point of view par excellence and it can only be reached by a complete sacrifice of judgments and opinions.
So this way of looking at things is an invaluable contribution to psychology.
This is Rudyard Kipling’s attitude in his ”Just So Stories” and it is in its place when applied to the fearful complexities of the human psyche: it is ”just so” and there is nothing to be done about it.
You will have the right attitude to psychology in general and to the difficult things which you will hear in the course of these lectures, if you can treat them as a ”Just So Story”.
Dugald Stewart (1753-1828) is convinced that psychology could become a natural science, through a method of pure description, that is, by an objective description of the psychic processes, by the sacrifice of all opinions and by making no foregone conclusions.
Stewart’s discrimination of associations is important for pathology.
He divides them into:
1. Spontaneous simple associations: analogy, contrast, coexistence and proximity.
2. Arbitrary associations: through active conscious interference.
Some processes of the psyche obey the will, others do not, but follow a priori laws of their own.
People incline to identify with one of these views, but both are equally true.
Deep truths, such as the existence of voluntary and involuntary actions , are recurringly lost and have to be rediscovered again and again. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures 1-III, Pages 14-16.

Carl Jung on early French Psychologists. (2015-04-09 06:01)

Lecture III 3rd November, 1933
The sequence of the development of psychology which we have been following took us to the British Isles last time, today we will turn to France where the first psychologists appear in the early days of French enlightenment, at the beginning of the XVIIIth century.
This was the time when the ”encyclopedistes” were at work, knowledge was being heaped up and the ideas of philosophers, such as Voltaire and Diderot, were being spread abroad.

France was then a very Catholic country and in her new thirst for knowledge it was natural that she should swing from one extreme to the other and become very fundamentally enlightened.
Julien de la Mettrie (1709-1751) is the first French psychologist.
He was a doctor and an outstanding man of his time.
In 1748 Frederick the Great called him to Berlin, where he lived till his death three years later.
La Mettrie is a real materialist and empiricist.
His fundamental conception is that all life springs from dead matter; he considers the psyche to a certain extent as an appendage of organic life, as depending on the brain.
So the discovery of the relation of the psyche to the brain bears fruit here.
La Mettrie says: ”The brain has thinking muscles as the leg has walking muscles”.
He looks upon the living being as a machine that consists of springs like the works of a watch.
His book ”L’homme Machine” (1748) is based on the standpoint that the psyche is nothing more than a sensitive material part of the brain.
This point of view remained valid almost to the present day.
Etienne Bonnot de Condillac. (1715-1780) is La Mettrie’s contemporary.
Condillac draws his conclusion, that all life proceeds from sensation, from his experience in a love affair.
He defends this materialistic point of view in his principle scientific work ”Traite des Sensations” which first appeared in 1754 and was reprinted only in 1885.
It is significant that it should not have been translated into German till 1 870, when materialism was in full bloom.
Contrary to the general belief at that time that certain ideas are a priori innate in man, Condillac asserts that the whole of the psyche is empty.
In working out their theories, philosophers have often sought a ”point de repere”, an idea, a metaphor or even a material object on which to develop them.
Kant, while lecturing, found such a focusing point in the top button of a student’s waistcoat, and on one occasion, when the young man did not appear, the great philosopher found himself unable to proceed with his lecture!
Condillac relies in much the same way up on the image of a man, who is no real human being, but a statue that is nevertheless endowed with sense capacities.
Gradually all its senses awake, the first being that of smell.
From this statue and its sensations, he constructs the whole human psyche.
This approach is characteristic of the psychological method of the investigator who is impelled to kill the living, illusive, iridescent quality of the human psyche and to change it into cold stone.
Reason kills the psychological material in order to be able to dissect it.
This is the expression of a definite mental attitude which lasted till the end of the XIXth century.
Condillac considers everything which is psyche as a ”sensation transformee”, for him, the psyche is a perceiving, immaterial substance, a perception devoid of subject that wanders through the universe.
We find similar ideas in Rudolf Steiner’s ”ethereal worlds” and in Chr. Morgenstern’s poem ”Das Knie” (The Knee).
The absolute character of French psychology is founded on Latin tradition.
Its prototype is the Latin Father of the Church, Arnobius Africanus, who lived about 300 A. D.
His teaching was that the human soul is empty and of a material nature and that everything which enters it depends up on the experience of the senses.
His belief, which is shared by Christianity in general, is that the soul either does not exist before baptism, or if it does, it is necessarily in a very deplorable condition, that of original sin, which calls for enlightenment.
The human soul does indeed require enlightenment, but it is perhaps not quite so empty!
Condillac is a true follower of Arnobius when he says that the psyche requires to be filled from outside.
This belief is very popular today, people are still persuaded of their own complete harmlessness and it is a most comforting thought that all evil must necessarily have dropped into our empty and innocent souls from outside!
We can then make our parents and schoolmasters answerable for all that we do not care to be responsible for.

But the truth is that the soul is no ”tabula rasa”, it is already filled with good and evil when we come into the world, though we may remain unconscious of it.
How else can we account for the fact that the child’s mind is full of mythological ideas?
The idea that the soul comes to man only through baptism is a Christian interpretation woven into the roots of the baptismal rite.
Anatole France’s book ”L’lle des Pingouins” is written round this belief: When the misty-eyed old St. Mael, in his enthusiasm, had baptised a school of penguins, a dispute arose in heavenly circles as to whether it was not a blasphemous act, for only human beings have immortal souls.
A council was held in Heaven, but feeling ran high and no decision was reached. When St. Catherine was called in, woman’ s wisdom solved the question.
She praised both sides, saying that penguins, being birds, cannot have immortal souls; yet it was als o true that through baptism immortality is attained.
Therefore she asked God to grant them ”une iime immortelle, mais petite ”!
I am personally of the opinion that not only people, but even animals have souls.
I am also deeply convinced of the truth of all creeds.
No logical standard of comparison exists, they all contain genuine and real psychological experience and it is merely stupid to criticize them with the aim of establishing one truth.
After la Mettrie and his machine man a reaction set in against this absolute empirical psychology; Jean-Jacques Rousseau was one of the first to react in this way.
Charles Bonnet (1720-1793) , who was born in Geneva of French parents, introduces the psycho-physical standpoint in his principle work ”Essai analytique sur les facultes de l ’ iime”, where he maintains that the nature of the psyche is neither purely spiritual nor purely corporeal.
To characterise this middle position he uses the ether as an illustration, matter which is not matter and yet fills space; the psyche has an ethereal body in which such things as memories are stored.
This idea of the ethereal body appears in Indian philosophy, yet this is not where Bonnet found it, for it was only later that Anquetil Duperron brought the first translations of the Upanishads to Europe, thus opening a new world to the West.
Bonnet’s idea springs from mediaeval conceptions and the idea of the ”subtle body”, smoke resembling, air resembling, the breath of life that lives in us.
We find a parallel to this in the Indian custom of the son breathing in the dying father’s last breath of life and also in cannibalism which is not practised for the sake of food, but for magical purposes, in order to assimilate the enemy’s life energies or virtues.
The autonomous reappearance of the Indian world of ideas in Bonnet is an example of palingenesis.
Another instance of this phenomenon is Bergson’s idea of the ”duree creatrice”, a reanimation of Proclus’ statement: ”Always where there is creation there is also time”.
In contrast to palingenesis (the autonomous revival of an idea in another epoch) we have the phenomenon of cryptomnesia, the reappearance of something that was once known and then totally forgotten.
I can give you an instance of cryptomnesia which I discovered in Nietzsche’s writings:
In the 40th chapter of ”Thus Spake Zarathustra”, ”Great Events”, the following passage occurs:
”Now about the time that Zarathustra sojourned on the Happy Isles, it happened that a ship anchored at the Isle on which standeth the smoking mountain, and the crew went ashore to shoot rabbits. After the noontide hour, however, when the captain and his men were together again, they suddenly saw a man coming towards them through the air and a voice said distinctly: ’It is time, it is highest time ! ’ But when the figure was nearest to them (it flew past quickly , however, like a shadow, in the direction of the volcano), then did they recognise with the greatest surprise that it was Zarathustra; for they had all seen him before except the captain himself, and they loved him as the people love: in such wise that love and awe were combined in equal degree. ’Behold! ’ said the helmsman, ’there goes Zarathustra to hell’ ” .
In reading this passage the rabbit shooting struck me as peculiarly out of place in the context and it seemed to hit a forgotten chord in me.

The years at Basel university slowly came back to me and with them the memory of a small green book: Kerner's "Blatter a us Prevorst".
I read it again and came upon a very similar incident:
"An extract of awe-inspiring import from the log of the ship 'Sphinx' in the year 1680, in the Mediterranean."
"The four captains and a merchant, Mr. Bell, went ashore on the island of Stromboli to shoot rabbits. At three o'clock they called the crew together to go aboard, when, to their inexpressible astonishment, they saw two men flying rapidly over them through the air. One was dressed in black, the other in grey. They approached, them very closely in the greatest haste; to their greatest dismay they descended amid the burning flames into the crater of the terrible volcano, Mount Stromboli. They recognised the pair as acquaintances from London."
I wrote to Nietzsche's sister and asked her if he had read "Blatter a us Prevorst".
She replied that, after thinking the matter over for a long time, she remembered distinctly that he had done so as a boy of eleven when nosing about his grandfather's library.
What could rabbits have to do with Zarathustra?
This parallel alone seems to explain them.
The memory must have secretly crept up and reproduced itself.
After Bonnet, the line of philosophers in France is broken by the French Revolution.
This great event was no sudden external outburst, it had long been prepared by philosophers and psychologists, for ideas always come first and actions follow, even when it takes twenty years for an idea to push its way through to the masses.
We cannot afford therefore to be indifferent to the thoughts which a teacher expresses, for they may materialize in history.
The French Revolution is a striking example of this. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture III, Pages 17-19.

Carl Jung and the history of Psychology (2015-04-10 05:27)

Lecture IV 10th November, 1933
We are laboriously working our way through the pre-history of psychology.
The last lecture came to a close with the French Revolution from which a new spirit was born ; we will now return to Germany where we shall also see the dawning of a new attitude.
Herbart (1776-1841) is the next to follow the empirical approach.
He moves along the lines of the English School which Hume and Hartley represent, he is therefore also interested in association psychology.

Adopting Burne's idea of "gentle force", Herbart establishes the principle of attraction and repulsion of ideas; he is the father of the new physiological and experimental psychology.
Herbart is followed by Fechner and Wundt.
With the latter a culminating point is reached.
Gustav Theodor Fechner (1801-1887) is the founder of a new psychological point of view: psycho-physics, which has proved essential for the whole development of psychology.
His work "Elementen der Psycho-physic " (Rudiments of Psycho-physics - 1860) is based on the Weber law, which is called later the Fechner-Weber law. This law lays down that the relative differences in stimuli correspond to the same differences in sensation intensity.
There is, therefore, a certain possibility of approaching the psyche through measurements.
Fechner sets up tables and calculations, but his law is only valid within certain limits.
Had this been his only book, we could have afforded to ignore him, but he was also a philosopher and the titles alone of his further works speak of his profound interest in the other side.
In 1836 "Das Biichlein vom Leb en nach dem Tode" (The book of Life after Death] appeared, it was followed in 1848 by "Nanna, oder iiber das Seelenleben der Pflanzen" (Nanna, or concerning the psychic life of plants) and in 1851 by "Zend Avesta, oder iiber die Dinge des Himmels und des Jenseits " (Zend Avesta, or concerning the things of heaven and the world beyond).
In these works, which are the confession of his personal psychological convictions, Fechner defends the standpoint of a universal psycho-physical parallelism: the psyche is simply the inner manifestation, the "self-manifestation" of the thing and the body is the outer or "foreign manifestation " of the psychic.
Fechners great value is that he discriminates between an empirical inner world and an empirical outer world.
He further holds that not only human bodies, but all bodies undoubtedly possess an inner manifestation, a "self-manifestation".
He speaks of mother earth for instance, as being alive and as possessing a soul, which is as the soul of an angel, embracing the totality of human souls.
The totality of human brains thus constitutes the brain of the earth soul, the highest omniscient being of the godhead.
This train of thought is not interesting as philosophy, but it is as psychology, for Fechner makes the important confession that his single soul is not isolated, but is contained in a whole.
He is the first to conceive of a psychic cohesion ruling over all, which can only be reached by thought and is not contained in the single psyche.
C. G. Carus (1789- 869) , a doctor and philosopher, follows the same line of thought.
He differs nevertheless from Fechner in that he is principally a philosopher and psychologist, he is not an empiricist, but a pantheist influenced by Schelling. His value lies in his comparative psychology.
In 1846 his book Psyche; zur Entwicklungsges chichte der Seele" (Psyche; concerning the history of the development of the soul] appeared and in 1866 "Vergleichende Psychologie" (Comparative Psychology.].
He is the first to call the universal soul the unconscious and his works contain highly modern points of view with regard to it:
"The key to the understanding of the nature of the conscious life of the psyche lies in the region of the unconscious".
He looks up on the psyche as the creative principle of the body.
To illustrate the relation of the unconscious to the conscious, he uses the allegory of the stream: the life of the psyche is an unceasingly winding great stream, which is lit by the sun, that is by consciousness, only in the small part which is its surface.
As the stream bears away many valuable things that remain undiscovered, so many treasures are hidden from us and the real dynamic force spends itself in the unseen, in the unconscious.
This strikingly recalls Kant, but in his case the dynamic aspect was missing.

The key to real psychology is only to be found in the darkness; both the diseases of the mind and the creative principle originate in the dark sphere of the unconscious.
Carus believes that unconscious will and intelligence exist in cosmic extension.
This philosophy was taken up later by E. von Hartmann.
The next link however, in this long chain is Schopenhauer.
Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860) is a great phenomenon and his message to the world is of the utmost importance.
Before his time the belief was widely held that the psyche could be rationally understood, being principally composed of conscious processes.
The genius of Schopenhauer brought an answer to the world which thousands had been obscurely groping for and for which they had looked to the empiricists in vain.
This new note is the voice of suffering: the human psyche is not only order and purpose, it is suffering.
In contradiction to all rational belief, Schopenhauer brings forward the idea of the existence of a split between intellect, on the one side, and a blind will or creative urge, on the other. He might just as well have called this will the unconscious.
His conception of the will has the character of chaos, whereas Caru' idea of the creative will is almost too beautiful and sweet, it verges on the mawkish and tedious.
Schopenhauer sees a tragic conflict between consciousness and a dark, miserable, suffering will.
He thus brings a point of view into the psychological situation which we must not allow ourselves to lose sight of, for it concerns modern man most closely.
In his later writings , such as "Ueber die anscheinende Ab sichtlichkeit und iiber den Willen in die Natur" (Concerning the apparent purpose and the will in nature] , he appears to draw nearer to Carus; but on the whole he continues to see the world as an accidental and faulty creation to which the intellect alone can bring order.
For this purpose, the intellect must hold up a mirror to the blind disorder so that it may recognise its work of destruction.
This peculiarly pessimistic philosophy is strongly influenced by the East.
We see a similar denial of Christian ideas for the first time in France when the Revolution enthroned the Deesse de la Raison in Notre-Dame, in the place of the Christian God.
Never before had Christianity been publicly denied and this blow shook the walls of the Church to their foundations.
People awoke to the fact that accepted truths could be openly and officially questioned, but nobody foresaw then that the whole of civilization would rock.
Yet this was no solitary outbreak, but a movement that found its echo in the whole world; forces had been let loose which could no longer remain imprisoned in the old forms.
But in this hour of overthrow and destruction, human instinct was at work to bring about a compensatory action: a Frenchman, Anquetil-Duperron, went to the East in search of the truth.
It was as if Europe had been a single human being, seeking for a new hope in exchange for the one it had lost.
The first shreds of Eastern light, which Anquetil-Duperron brought back with the Upanishads, poured into the cracks made by the French Revolution, and, as France had destroyed, so it was France who first brought something new and living to broken hopes.
Schopenhauer was influenced by this message and translated it into language which the West could understand, into philosophy.
Eduard von Hartmann (1842-1906) was influenced by his great predecessor Schopenhauer and also by Schelling and Hebbel, but his philosophy comes direct from Carus.
Hartmann conceives of the unconscious as the unity of will and idea, at the same time it is the active purposive foundation of the world of a divine and absolute nature.
He is more a philosopher than a psychologist and wrote "Die Philosophie des Unb ewussten " (The Philosophy of the Unconscious - 1869).

In the meantime a new development had been taking place in France.
Maine de Biron (1766-1824) recognizes an unconscious sphere which, however, he presents with the characteristics of consciousness.
Ribot and Binet follow in his footsteps.
The latter' s conception of the psyche as a totality is interesting. In his book "Alterations de la personalite", Binet's point of view is for the most part modern, in that he does not start from separate units but from the totality of the human personality.
Pierre Jan et and Liebault are followers of Binet.
We must now turn to America in order to continue this line of development.
William James (1842-1910) steps into the front rank of psychologists with his work "Principles of Psychology", and carries us still further.
He leads psychology away from academic circles to the investigation of the personality itself and into the realm of the doctor.
Here we enter the real sphere of these lectures, to which this introduction has been leading.
The people I am going to speak to you about are not the striking personalities to which the world is usually attracted. Hitherto it is the man of action who has principally awakened the historian's interest and held the stage; but other people exist also, psychic people, people whose activity is inward, they do not stand out in the same way and yet history also provides us with authentic records of their existence: in the Acta Sanctorum, for instance, in the trials for witchcraft and later in the miraculous testimonies of the stigmatists and somnambulists.
In the XVIIIth century an extensive literature already existed which deals with psychic personalities.
Justinus Kerner (1786-1862) has left us one of these records in his work "Die Seherin von Prevorst " (The Clairvoyante of Prevorst) which appeared in 1829.
It is the history of his patient's illness, the story of a psychic personality.
Nobody seems to have thought of bringing it into line with modern psychology, yet we shall find that it contains some very interesting psychic phenomena.
The further title of the book runs "Eroffnungen iib er das innere Leb en des Menschen und iib er das Hereinragen einer Geisterwelt in die unsere " (Disclosures concerning the inner life of man and concerning the invasion of our world by a world of spirits) and shows us where the real attraction of this story lay for Kerner, that is, in the fact of the existence of an obj ective, substantial world of spirits. End of the Introduction.

Carl Jung: "She was so interested in these phantasies that she liked to reproduce them in drawings and embroideries." (2015-04-10 06:58)

Lecture XI 26th January, 1934
Today we will begin to study the case of a psychic personality which illustrates the Right side of the diagram which we were considering last time (Diagram III, p. 47).
The case of the Clairvoyante of Prevorst, on the contrary, belongs entirely to the Left side.
This is the case of Helene Smith, described by Theodore Flournoy. His report of it appeared in Geneva in 1900, under the curious title :

”Des Indes a la Planete Mars. Etude sur un cas de somnambulisme avec glossolalie.”
Helene Smith’s father was a Hungarian, he was intelligent, well-educated and an excellent linguist.
As far as we know her mother was Swiss and it was from her that the daughter inherited the remarkable psychic faculities which led to the peculiar phenomena which we are about to study.
The mother was a convinced spiritualist; her belief was founded on personal experiences and she was gifted with second sight.
Helene’s brother spoke of having experienced strange phenomena and evidently could also have been a medium.
Besides this, we learn that Helene was brought up in a modest milieu, the family being rather poor and this fact had a considerable influence on her later attitude towards life.
Helene’s character was excellent and Flournoy emphasises her intelligence and her natural dignity.
She was baptised in the Roman Catholic Church, but she was entered in the register of the Protestant Church a few months later, and was educated at a (Protestant) State school, where she was a very good pupil, if somewhat inattentive owing to her active inner life.
As she grew up, she was apprenticed to a large store where they thought very highly of her.
From childhood she was given to day dreams which, though they ordered on visions, were not neurotic symptoms.
She was so interested in these phantasies that she liked to reproduce them in drawings and embroideries.
When Helene was fourteen, she had a very impressive vision of a light and unknown letters appeared at the same time.
Then she frequently had the vision of a man, wearing a wonderful embroidered garment, who stood beside her bed and frightened her.
She complained of being followed in the street by strange men, but whether they were objective or phantasy figures was never proved. Her writing was liable to be suddenly disturbed, letters being left out and replaced by strange signs.
She had an increasing feeling that spirits were near her and that she was protected by a guardian angel.
When she was ten, a big dog attacked her and a monk wearing a brown habit and a white cross on his breast, saved her by chasing the animal away.
Later, in any difficult situation, if a man for instance became too pressing, the monk would come to her rescue.
A t twelve years old she used to start whenever the doorbell rang, for she was convinced that her phantasy would come true and expected daily that a distinguished man would drive up in a magnificent carriage, to carry her off to the far-away land to which she belonged.
She had a pronounced fear of the world and shunned people.
She was somehow never really happy, and her pride and ambition chafed against humble surroundings which left her strong personality unsatisfied.
When she reached the age of twenty, however, her condition rather improved and her fears slowly disappeared.
We might have expected that she would marry, but her guardian spirit, the monk, was always there to whisper that the right man had not yet turned up, thus keeping her away from the natural experiences of life.
She had, however, fundamentally a great deal of temperament, and the prospect of remaining an old maid was one of the causes of her unhappiness.
Her strong personality had to find an expression somehow.
In 1892 Helene came into contact with spiritualistic séances for the first time; she was introduced to the group of Mme. N. in Geneva, but it was a very mixed gathering. Helene soon revealed herself as its leading medium.
At first the spirits conveyed their messages through automatic writing, but before long, in a state of trance, she had the following remarkable vision:
a balloon appeared, which was sometimes light and sometimes dark, bright ribbons flowed out of it, which changed into a radiant star.
In a further sitting the star developed into the grimacing face of a kind of devil, he had red hair which gave place to a bunch of roses, out of which a little snake wriggled.

These visions are very typical, the things that Helene sees correspond to inner possibilities: phantasies, spirits, light etc.
She had recently watched a balloon go up in reality and it might be argued that this event was simply reproduced in the vision, but the causality is of no importance here.
It was the vision on the contrary that seized upon the balloon as a good image for the thing which was seeking expression in consciousness.
Helene saw the light first and only remembered the actual balloon afterwards.
The sequence of these visions is an excellent illustration of enantiodromia: the light balloon becomes dark; the star, which is always the symbol for something particularly elevating, changes into a devil and a snake emerges from the roses; pleasant things turn into ugly ones and vice versa, things go over into their opposites.
At this period Helene also had visions when alone at home and other phenomena occurred.
For instance, once during business hours a certain pattern was lost; the man in charge, who was considerably troubled, told Helene about it and she answered automatically: ”It was sent to Mr. J ”
At the same time she saw the number 18 and she added: ”It was sent to him 18 days ago” - and this turned out to be the case, although she could have had no knowledge of the actual facts.
In the spiritualistic sittings with Group N. Helene gradually developed a high degree of somnambulism, in which the guide and shadow spirit came into action.
About this time she became acquainted with Flournoy who was deeply interested in these phenomena.
He observed, even at the first séance which he attended, that Helene was liable to one-sided anesthesia, for instance, she would lose all feeling in the right hand whilst the left would become hypersensitive; when her right hand was hurt she felt nothing, but after some time the pain would appear in the left hand; if asked to lift the right hand she would raise the left, insisting that it was the right.
Helene’s control, a masculine and very personal figure, now appeared in the séances; he would take possession of her right arm and wrap out messages while she was apparently conscious and still able to converse with the audience, but later he actually spoke through her mouth with a gruff, masculine voice.
When he wrote through her his handwriting was absolutely different from hers.
This control was completely autonomous, sometimes he would not appear for weeks although Helene invoked him; he obeyed neither the medium nor the audience for he had more personality than the medium herself.
At first his character was somewhat undefined, but he soon showed definite characteristics: for instance he had poetic gifts and announced himself as Victor Hugo, although the sentimental stuff which he wrote shows that the real. Victor Hugo had no connection with it! For five months he held the stage, then a rival appeared, a certain Leopold, with a gruff voice and an Italian accent.
He behaved rudely to Victor Hugo, making fun of his verse.
The newcomer would have liked to blow up the whole group which he disdained, considering it inferior; but he wished above all to push his rival out of the way, for he was openly in love with Helene and showed it passionately, disturbing the séances with his jealous scenes.
His manner was arrogant and overbearing and he was determined to be sole master of his medium.
He wrote at first in her writing, but later in his own.
Victor Hugo protested at first, but gradually he gave way and when Helene was persuaded to leave Group N. he disappeared altogether.
Flournoy, who observed these phenomena very closely, considers Leopold to be the result of auto-suggestion.
This marvellous word, which means nothing, had a particularly happy ring at that time, for in 1899 the idea of auto-suggestion was !he fashion and was welcomed as an explanation for everything.
Flournoy, in speaking of auto-suggestion, implies that the medium has taken it into her head to imagine such a figure.
In reality we imagine nothing, it imagines itself.
This reminds me of the story of a traveler who once persuaded an Indian to speak of his experiences; they were altogether too irrational for such a highly educated, sophisticated man and his comment was that the Indian had simply imagined it all!

The Indian replied: ” Who do you suppose imagined it for me? ”
How often do we act from the assumption that we have voluntarily thought so and so or that it is our intention to have imaginations?
We do not ask ourselves : ”Have I imagined it purposely or did it imagine itself?”
It is too disconcerting to have to admit that something exists in us over which we have no control, and the fact that it can tell us things and act through us is altogether too uncanny; it is as bad as discovering somebody under our bed.
Auto-suggestion is therefore a very comforting idea - but if we ignore the true facts, the psyche is shorn of its helpful powers.
Flournoy would have done better to say: ”Leopold suggested himself to Helene.”
Leopold did not suddenly spring into existence when he appeared as a control, he was always present in Helene Smith, he was part of her psychic structure.
His first appearance was in the form of the monk.
The light of consciousness has only to travel a little to the left, to the unconscious side, for such figures to become visible.
William James had a true understanding of these facts when he said: ”Thought tends to personal form.”
When consciousness leaves its sphere on the right side, and moves over to the left, ideas become personified and autonomous.
This is what takes place when mediums are in a trance, everything is reversed, for the psychic picture comes up and the guide or control is in command.
Mediums then receive all manner of information that they could not possibly know, often of a sinister character.
Something like this is probably the origin of the Italian word ”sinistra” (left , for these things are often very unfavourable. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture XII, Pages 51-54.

Carl Jung: “Psychology did not suddenly spring into existence, one could say that it is as old as civilization itself.” (2015-04-10 12:00)

Lecture I 20th October, 1933
Psychology did not suddenly spring into existence, one could say that it is as old as civilization itself.
The ancient science of astrology, which has always appeared in the wake of culture all over the world, is a kind of psychology and alchemy is another unconscious form.
In such forms, however, the psyche is seen as entirely outside man, it is projected into the stars or into matter ; but I do not intend at present to speak of those days.
In this short introduction to “Modern Psychology” I shall take you back only to its first conscious beginnings.
Psychology proper appears with the dawn of the age of enlightenment at the end of the XVIIth century and we will follow its development briefly through a long line of philosophers and scientists who made the manifestations of the psyche their field of study.
In the works of Descartes (1596-1650) the psyche is still held to be thinking directed by the will. In his time, the whole of scientific interest flowed outward to the concrete object.

The external world was thoroughly explored, but no one looked inwards.
The soul was assumed to be known and everything concerning it was left to the care of religion.
Psychological phenomena occurred only within the framework of the Church, - as mystical realities and religious experiences.
All psychic manifestations took place within the dogmatic symbol and as long as this symbol remained a living thing, in which man felt completely contained, there were no psychological problems.
This was the case for the whole of Europe up till the first half of the XIXth century and this condition still remains undisturbed for those who feel secure in a living effective religious form.
At the time when the great navigators were discovering new continents, something which could no longer be contained in the dogmatic symbol, freed itself, and the result of this unseen event was the Renaissance.
This cultural phenomenon reveals a psychological problem which found expression as early as 1467, for instance, in Francesco Colonna's book "Hypnerotomachia" (literally love-dream-conflict).
This document gives a true picture of the secret psychology of the Renaissance. It is significant that it should have been written by a monk and expressed in pagan form, for this is a characteristic symptom of a whole age.
Colonna's work was translated into French at the end of the XVIth century by Beroalde de Verville under the title of "Le Songe de Poliphile"
The story was much admire d at the time and was even thought to be a divine revelation, but later it fell into disrepute and was dismissed as nonsense.
This early psychological document was written round the monk's love for a certain Dame Polia.
The scene opens in the Black Forest, a dragon bars his path and he meets with many adventures before he reaches fulfilment on a blessed island with Dame Polia.
Under the cloak of this allegory the monk describes a descent into the underworld of the psyche.
Dame Polia held something for him which he could not find in the Madonna.
When we come to the philosophers, who took the path of psychological discovery and who became the founders of this comparatively modern science, we find that they were almost without exception Protestants.
In earlier days the healing of the psyche was regarded as Christ's prerogative, the task belonged to religion, for we suffered then only as part of a collective suffering.
It is a new point of view to look up on the individual psyche as a whole with its own individual suffering.
The Protestant is the natural seeker in the field of psychological research, for he no longer has a symbol in which he can express himself and therefore his sense of incompleteness makes him restless and pushes him to search for what he feels to be missing.
In this attempt he often reaches out to other faiths, such as theosophy, Christian Science, Buddhism etc.
"Why does my spiritual life no longer satisfy me?" is particularly the problem of the Protestant; he thinks that it should but the fact remains that it does not and that he is often troubled with neurotic symptoms.
Psychology, therefore, is primarily the concern of the Protestant, the sceptic - and the doctor.
Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz (1646-1716) was the first of the philosophers to be concerned with what we now call psychology.
His theory is that of the so-called "petite perception" or "perception insensible".
The word "perception" means representation here, for a "perception" is at the same time a subjectively coloured representation or picture.
As an example of the existence of "perceptions insensibles", Leibnitz gives his experiment with blue and yellow powder.
When they have been insufficiently mixed the blue and yellow grains are still perceptible but when, however, the operation has been carried out thoroughly the powder appears to be green although it is still composed of blue and yellow grains: it looks green but is blue and yellow.
Leibnitz tried to find a psychological meaning to his experiments and sought to make analogies to similar processes which take place in the human mind: "something happens in me of which I am not aware".

Our daily life abounds in concrete psychological examples of Leibnitz' "unconscious perceptions" as illustrated by the above experiment.
These are the many things we do unconsciously.
We look, for instance, at our watch, but we have to consult it again if asked the time a minute later, yet we perceived it unconsciously.
There are other cases, such as riding a bicycle, where the process is almost wholly unconscious and if, while actually bicycling, we suddenly become aware of the unconscious perceptions by which we keep our balance, it may prove directly dangerous.
Over and against the "petites perceptions" Leibnitz sees the principle of the intellect or the idea, he recognizes that ideas are born in us and says: "c'est ainsi que les idees et les verites nous sont innees comme des inclinations, des dispositions, des habitudes ou des virtualites".
The "perceptions" are the opportunities and causes by which the inborn ideas and dispositions can be made conscious.
Leibnitz' ideas, which came very close to modern psychology, remained latent for a very long time as is often the case with ideas when the time is not yet ripe for them.
Christian August Wolff (1679-1754) differs from his great predecessor by his completely rational approach; he remains in the conscious.
In his works we find the beginnings of empirical psychology.
Wolff's psychology consists of two parts:
1. Empirical psychology, which lays special stress on the faculty of cognition.
2. Specific psychology, which is concerned with the desires and inter-relations of body and soul.
In other words, the psyche has the faculties of representation, desire and cognition, yet thinking is the essence of the psyche.
Wolff's psychology is one of the first psychologies based on experience.
Johann Nicolaus Tetens (1736-1805) is the real originator of experimental, physiological psychology, influenced by the English physiological approach which Hartley represents.
Tetens is the first to measure the sensations of light,-hearing and touch .
His altogether empirical attitude is very modern and he looks up on all systems as mere hypotheses which have yet to be proved. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture I, 20Oct1933, Pages 11-13.

Carl Jung on the Dream of Archelaus' wife, Glaphyra and a homo-sexual young man. (2015-04-10 12:54)

Lecture VIII 14th December, 1934
At the end of the last lecture we spoke briefly of the Gilgamesh epic.
It is a very interesting parallel to our dream and makes its meaning clear.
The dreamer had reached a summit in life, for the moment he can go no further without disaster.
His neurosis is a kind of exhaustion with the symptoms of mountain sickness.
I will give you two more examples of the same theme, those of Archelaus and Nebuchadnezzar.
Archelaus, King of Judea, had reigned for ten years with great severity and even cruelty, but very prosperously.
He then dreamt that ten years of wheat were devoured by ten oxen.
Archelaus was greatly perturbed by this dream and sent for Simon the Essene to interpret it.
The Essenes were a sect of people who lived in a monastery by the Dead Sea, they practised a kind of mental healing, or therapy, and believed in the interpretation of dreams.
They were very courageous and would tell the truth even to a king and Simon told Archelaus that for ten years he had lived in might and splendour, but that the ten oxen appearing to devour that prosperity meant that his harvest would now be destroyed This was a prophecy which speedily fulfilled itself, for within a few days he was deposed and ended his life as an exile.
Archelaus' wife, Glaphyra, had a similar dream at the same time.
She was a near relation of her husband's, in those days incest was considered very distinguished; the Pharaohs indulged in it to such an extent that they actually married their sisters and almost married themselves!

The idea was to keep the mana in the family. Glaphyra's first husband had been Alexander, a brother of Archelaus, who had been murdered.
Alexander appeared to Glaphyra in this dream and said that he would take her back into his house.
She caught the right meaning of the dream, and seeing that she had to die, committed suicide.
To the spirit of antiquity, dreaming of someone who was dead meant death, so she acted accordingly.
Another striking example of the same theme which comes to us from antiquity is that of Nebuchadnezzar, King of the Jews.
He had reached the height of his great power when he had the following dream: he dreamt of a great tree, its top reached up into the heavens and its branches spread over all the earth.
It gave fruit and shade to all beasts and shelter to all birds.
A messenger from Heaven told Nebuchadnezzar to cut it down, to expel the birds and the beasts from it, but to leave the stump in the earth.
His human heart was to be taken from him and a beast's heart was to be given to him.
Daniel interpreted the dream and told Nebuchadnezzar that he had reached his zenith, he must turn back and show mercy to the humble if he wanted to avert the terrible downfall and catastrophe which were prophesied.
He would not listen, but went on as before for a year, and then one day, as he was standing on the roof of his palace, rejoicing in Babylon which he had built, a voice repeated the end of his dream to him.
At this moment a fearful change came up on him, he was stricken with madness and ate grass like a beast.
That is, he changed into Enkidu or rather he even became monstrous like Chumbaba.
The gods decided his fate, as they did in the case of Gilgamesh, h e would not cut down the tree himself, so the messenger from Heaven did it for him.
The messenger from Heaven does not appear in the dream which we are considering for we have changed our manner of speech, though indeed such figures appear even now occasionally in some dreams.
We can see that our dream is no exception, but a motif which recurs again and again in the history of the world.
We will now return to the methods which we must employ in order to understand our dream.
First of all it is necessary to know the context from which the dream springs , to discover its psychological setting, we have to enrich the dream with associations and then we can make use of our reason and judgement.
Things in dreams often appear to be so banal or grotesque that it is really very difficult to see their connections.
The imagination of the patient often fails completely and we have to help to establish the context by questions.
We have to place the dream so that we can see it in human life, we have to see its meaning in the psyche.
A dream comes in a fragmentary form like a telegram and we often fail to understand it for want of context.
The meaning is frequently revealed when we see what it is that the dream fits into.
This is the method of amplification and we can consider this in relation to Freud' s theory.
To him the dream is a facade of repressed material, a repressed wish appearing in changed form so his method is a "reductio in primam figuram".
If the dream is a complicated structure it should, according to Freud, be reduced to a primitive, simple sentence in order to get at the truth;
he considers the dream as an adjustment which covers the wish for the mother.
Logically the reverse process should also be possible, one should be able to arrive at the complicated structure working from the simple wish, but the following example will show that such methods may land one in utter nonsense, for you can reduce a relatively true sentence till it becomes nonsense and vice versa:
1) No unreasonable being is free - therefore –
2) No free being is unreasonable - and further –
3) All men are free - so

4) No man is unreasonable - which last is sheer nonsense.
We are on very dangerous ground when we begin to use generalisations such as the reduction of all dreams to the wish to go back to the mother.
We can reduce another simple reasonable sentence till it becomes nonsense, as a further example:
1) Incest wishes are unconscious - s o –
2) The unconscious wishes incest - and further –
3) All men are unconscious - therefore –
4) All men desire incest.
It is much wiser to beware of generalisations and let the dream work in its pure form.
We will only go thus far in speaking of method.
This is my last lecture before Xmas, so we are in our last hour of the old year, but nevertheless we will begin up on a new series of dreams.
Unfortunately I have no more dreams of the same patient; it is always better to have a series in order to be able to test whether our conclusions are correct; so I have brought you a series where we can watch the themes recurring and control our guesses.
A single dream is not convincing, one dream flows out of another, they are images which come from an inner source, a stream that never ceases and which comes to the surface when our consciousness relaxes.
They are images , that is, when they touch consciousness but we have no means of knowing what their form is in the pure unconscious.
Dreams repeat themselves and motifs appear again and again, sometimes quite regularly, showing the continuity of the unconscious processes.
Our new dreamer is an intelligent young man with pink cheeks and a rather girlish appearance.
He knew nothing of the black art of analysis and cameh to me because of his omo-sexuality which had begun to be problematic.
He had already been under treatment with another doctor who had been fatherly towards him and had given him a great deal of advice.
He had not, however, mentioned the unconscious to him.
The young man, of himself, had developed an interest m his dreams and wrote them down before he came to me.
People with problems often do this, obeying a primitive instinct, long before they come to analysis.
Dream I –
I was on a motor drive with a very handsome homosexual chauffeur.
We met a herd of cows and had to get out of the car in order to drive them away.
The bull then appeared, pierced my sweater with his horns and tossed me into the air.
I fell to the ground with terror and woke up.
It was a nightmare.
Context. (associations)
Motor drive. The young man had recently been on a motor tour in the Tyrol and they took a chauffeur with them.
Once when they had to stop on account of a breakdown, a herd of cows had really come along and the party had watched them with interest.
Corns are the feminine principle naturally and the bull the masculine.
He associated the bull's horns to the masculine organ, to the sexual act.
The sweater he associated to a warm covering.
(He was in truth kept warmly wrapped up by his family, he looked exactly like a peach tucked up in cotton wool!)
Falling he associated to a fall that he had had as a child down a bank into aa stream, this gave him a phobia about falling which lasted for many years.
Motors are a very frequent theme in dreams; before they existed, and I analyzed before they were common, railways, carriages and even co aches took their place.
Auto means self, so when we dream of an automobile it means "as I move myself". The dreamer lets himself be driven by a homo-sexual, so this is evidently his leading principle.

It brings him however, to a herd of cows, so the feminine gets at him in its most biological form.
This is how he sees the feminine principle, he sees it as calves and milk.
His is a facultative, curable homo-sexuality, it really consists of an enormous mother complex.
Though he has bad resistances against his mother, both she and his aunts are immensely important to him.
He has a high pitched voice and his attitude is very aesthetic, hetero-sexuality appears to him as unbelievably coarse and brutal, so it is represented in the dream by the bull and cows.
The curious thing about this dream is that it is the masculine principle which catches him as if he were a woman.
He has indeed the feelings of a flapper.
He has a tremendous admiration for the heroes of the sporting world, good looking tenors and Valentinos and follows their footsteps tremulously!
In short he is completely feminine, a woman, so naturally the masculine seizes hold of him, for that is how sex appears to him. He is with cows, the feminine, a problem which he is not up to, so the bull comes along and treats him as if he were a cow.
His fear of falling is fear of the unconscious, which does indeed resemble a precipice.
Dream II –
My sister scratched my throat and wounded me, I hit her over the head and our parents were horrified.
Context.
The throat i s a particularly sensitive and ticklish place for the dreamer.
His sister is very violent and he reported that he had suffered a great deal from her, but added ”Am I my sister as I seemed to feel the blow on my own head? ”
The sister is extremely masculine, this is often the case in families where the boy is kept in cotton wool.
Where the brother is homo-sexual, the sister, though she may not be the same, is commonly very tomboyish and mannish: this is apt to go over suddenly into its opposite, the hysterical ultra-feminine woman.
One may be sure that every hysterical woman has at one time or other gone through a masculine phase.
The dreamer speaks of having felt the blow on his own head, so he has discovered himself as a woman and this is his vulnerable spot.
The parents are horrified for it means that he must tear himself out of the home if he is to be a man, or his mother will not allow him to grow up.
Mothers are covered in invisible little hooks to keep their children in the nest, they like to rear such pets and to keep them young and dependent so that people may say ”What a young mother”. Lecture VIII December 14, 1934 Pages 166-169.

Carl Jung on the reorganization of the General Medical Society for Psychotherapy. (2015-04-11 06:04)

To Poul Bjerre
Dear Colleague, 22 January 1934
I would like to express my best thanks for your willingness to take part in the reorganization of the General Medical Society for Psychotherapy.
I am very glad of your help.
The main concern at present is the organization of the International Society.
As you know, the German Society has been compelled by the political change in Germany to form a national group under a leader.
This group has to comply with the strictest political guidelines, as you can well imagine.
Its existence would have been impossible without absolute submission to the National Socialist State.
I have therefore advised the Germans to submit without hesitation, for what matters above all is that psychotherapy in Germany, now gravely threatened, should survive the adversities of the time.
Therefore I have also got into touch with the leading circles in order to do everything possible to ensure the continued existence and recognition of psychotherapy.
All the German organizations are now under the uniform direction of Prof. Goring in Elberfeld.
He is the responsible leader.
Through this founding of a national group influenced by the special political conditions, the international section of the Society has been compelled to form national groups in turn, constituting an organization wi thin the framework of which the German group is absorbed.
By means of this organization I am trying to prevent the special political currents in the German group, which is numerically the strangest, from spilling over into the Society as a whole.
This is what many foreigners fear, particularly the Jews, who as you know are very numerous.

If we succeed in organizing some national groups in neutral countries, this will act as a counterweight and at the same time afford the Germans a much needed opportunity to maintain a connection with the outside world in their present spiritual isolation.
This connection is essential for the continued development of psychotherapy.
ln Germany, since at present she is even more cut off than during the war.
I should be very grateful to you if you would take the initiative in Sweden for the founding of a national group which would be a member of the International Society.
It would be sufficient for individual members to declare their enrolment in this Society.
Naturally you are free to organize your group in such a way that it also holds local meetings in Sweden itself, though this is not necessary.
Dr. W. Gimbal is secretary-general of the whole Society and I would ask you to get in touch with him as regards both the membership fees and the subscription to the Zentralblatt.
Perhaps there would also be an opportunity to discuss preferential terms for subscribers.
Further, I want to tell you that I would be very pleased if you could assure us of your cooperation with the Zentralblatt.
For the present it would be a matter of your now and then bringing to our notice, either personally or through one of your co-workers, new publications of a psychotherapeutic nature by means of reviews.
We should also be grateful for original contributions.
Submissions to the Zentralblatt should be sent to the secretary-general, Dr. Gimbal.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 135-136.

Carl Jung: "The case I told you about-evil eye, paranoiac impression-was cleared up as follows." (2015-04-11 06:51)

To Sigmund Freud
Dear Professor Freud, Burgholzli-Zurich, 2April1909
Worry and patients and all the other chores of daily life have beset me again and quite got me down for the first 2 days.
Now I am slowly coming to the surface and beginning to bask in the memories of days in Vienna.
12.IV
After a ten day interruption I my letter.
From this interlude it appears that the above complaint was premature because as usual worse was to follow.
Today I have put the last bad day behind me.
All during the Easter holidays, when other people were walking, I was able to snatch only one day's breath of air.
On 15, IV I shall wrench myself free without fail and start my bicycle tour.
Since Vienna all scientific work has been out of the question.
But in my practice I have accomplished much.
At the moment a madly interesting case is stretching me on the rack.
Some of the symptoms come suspiciously close to the organic borderline (brain, tumour?) yet they all hover over a dimly divined psychogenic depth, so that in analysing them all one's misgivings are forgotten.
First-rate spiritualistic phenomena occur in this case, though so far only once in my presence.
Altogether it makes a very peculiar impression.
The patient is a man-slaying Sara, Raguel's daughter.

The case I told you about-evil eye, paranoiac impression-was cleared up as follows.
She was abandoned by her last lover, who is altogether- pathological (Dem. praec.?); abandoned also by an earlier lover-this one even spent a year in an asylum.
Now the infantile pattern: hardly knew her father and mother, loving instead her brother, 8 years older than she and at 22 a catatonic.
Thus the psychological stereotype holds good.
You said the patient was merely imitating Dem. praec.; now the model has been found.
When l left Vienna I was afflicted with some sentiments d'incompletude on account of the last evening I spent with you.
It seemed to me that my spookerys struck you as altogether too stupid and perhaps unpleasant because of the Fliess analogy.(Insanity!)
Just recently, however, tl1e impression I had of the last-named patient smote me with renewed force.
\¥hat I told my wife .about it made the deepest impression on her too.
I had the feeling that under it all there must be some quite special complex, a universal one having to do with the prospective tendencies in man.
If there is a "psych-analysis" there must also be a "psychosynthesis" which creates future events according to the same laws.
(I see I am writing rather as if I had a flight of ideas.)
The leap towards psychosynthesis proceeds via the person of my patient, whose unconscious is right now preparing, apparently with nothing to stop it, a new stereotype into which everything from outside, as it were, fits in conformity with the complex.
(Hence the idea of the objective effect of the prospective tendency!)
That last evening with you has, most happily, freed me inwardly from the oppressive sense of your paternal authority.
My unconscious celebrated this impression with a great dream which preoccupied me for some days and which I have just finished analyzing.
I hope I am now rid of all unnecessary encumbrances.
Your cause must and will prosper, so my pregnancy fantasies tell me, which luckily you caught in the end.
As soon as I get back from Italy I shall begin some positive work, first of all for the Jahrbuch.
I hope you had a good Easter holiday and feel the better for it.
Ossipow head physician of the Psychiatric University Clinic in Moscow, has published a fine report on our affairs.
They seem to be working along our lines.
I have heard that Abraham with others have issued a psychological questionnaire Let s hope it is a canard!
Cordial greetings,
Gratefully, Jung Carl Jung to Freud, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 9-11.

Carl Jung's Definition of the "Anima." (2015-04-11 18:28)

Anima
The inner feminine side of a man. (See also animus, Eros, Logos and soul-image.)
The anima is both a personal complex and an archetypal image of woman in the male psyche. It is an unconscious factor incarnated anew in every male child, and is responsible for the mechanism of projection. Initially identified with the personal mother, the anima is later experienced not only in other women but as a pervasive influence in a man's life.
The anima is the archetype of life itself.["Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious," CW 9i, par. 66.]
There is [in man] an imago not only of the mother but of the daughter, the sister, the beloved, the heavenly goddess, and the chthonic Baubo. Every mother and every beloved is forced to become the carrier and embodiment of this omnipresent and ageless image, which corresponds to the deepest reality in a man. It belongs to him, this perilous image of Woman; she stands for the loyalty which in the interests of life he must sometimes forego; she is the much needed compensation for the risks, struggles, sacrifices that all end in disappointment; she is the solace for all the bitterness of life. And, at the same time, she is the great illusionist, the seductress, who draws him into life with her Maya-and not only into life's reasonable and useful aspects, but into its frightful paradoxes and ambivalences where good and evil, success and ruin, hope and despair, counterbalance one another. Because she is his greatest danger she demands from a man his greatest, and if he has it in him she will receive it.["The Syzygy: Anima and Animus," CW 9ii, par. 24]
The anima is personified in dreams by images of women ranging from seductress to spiritual guide. It is associated with the eros principle, hence a man's anima development is reflected in how he relates to women. Within his own psyche, the anima functions as his soul, influencing his ideas, attitudes and emotions.
The anima is not the soul in the dogmatic sense, not an anima rationalis, which is a philosophical conception, but a natural archetype that satisfactorily sums up all the statements of the unconscious, of the primitive mind, of the history of language and religion. . . . It is always the a priori element in [a man's] moods, reactions, impulses, and whatever else is spontaneous in psychic life.["Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious," CW 9i, par. 57.]
The anima . . . . intensifies, exaggerates, falsifies, and mythologizes all emotional relations with his work and with other people of both sexes. The resultant fantasies and entanglements are all her doing. When the anima is strongly constellated, she softens the man's character and makes him touchy, irritable, moody, jealous, vain, and unadjusted.["Concerning the Archetypes and the Anima Concept,"[ibid., par. 144.] As an inner personality, the anima is complementary to the persona and stands in a compensatory relationship to it.
The persona, the ideal picture of a man as he should be, is inwardly compensated by feminine weakness, and as the individual outwardly plays the strong man, so he becomes inwardly a woman, i.e., the anima, for it is the anima that reacts to the persona. But because the inner world is dark and invisible . . . and because a man is all the less capable of conceiving his weaknesses the more he is identified with the persona, the persona's counterpart, the anima, remains completely in the dark and is at once projected, so that our hero comes under the heel of his wife's slipper.["Anima and Animus," CW 7, par. 309.]
Hence the character of the anima can generally be deduced from that of the persona; all those qualities absent from the outer attitude will be found in the inner.

The tyrant tormented by bad dreams, gloomy forebodings, and inner fears is a typical figure. Outwardly ruthless, harsh, and unapproachable, he jumps inwardly at every shadow, is at the mercy of every mood, as though he were the feeblest and most impressionable of men. Thus his anima contains all those fallible human qualities his persona lacks. If the persona is intellectual, the anima will certainly be sentimental.[”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 804.]

Similarly, where a man identifies with the persona, he is in effect possessed by the anima, with attendant symptoms.

Identity with the persona automatically leads to an unconscious identity with the anima because, when the ego is not differentiated from the persona, it can have no conscious relation to the unconscious processes. Consequently it is these processes, it is identical with them. Anyone who is himself his outward role will infallibly succumb to the inner processes; he will either frustrate his outward role by absolute inner necessity or else reduce it to absurdity, by a process of enantiodromia. He can no longer keep to his individual way, and his life runs into one deadlock after another. Moreover, the anima is inevitably projected upon a real object, with which he gets into a relation of almost total dependence.[Ibid., par. 807.]

Jung distinguished four broad stages of the anima, analogous to levels of the Eros cult described in the late classical period. He personified them as Eve, Helen, Mary and Sophia.[”The Psychology of the Transference,” CW 16, par. 361.]

In the first stage, Eve, the anima is indistinguishable from the personal mother. The man cannot function well without a close tie to a woman. In the second stage, personified in the historical figure of Helen of Troy, the anima is a collective and ideal sexual image (”All is dross that is not Helen”-Marlowe). The third stage, Mary, manifests in religious feelings and a capacity for lasting relationships. In the fourth stage, as Sophia (called Wisdom in the Bible), a man’s anima functions as a guide to the inner life, mediating to consciousness the contents of the unconscious. She cooperates in the search for meaning and is the creative muse in an artist’s life.

Ideally, a man’s anima proceeds naturally through these stages as he grows older. In fact, as an archetypal life force, the anima manifests in whatever shape or form is necessary to compensate the dominant conscious attitude.

So long as the anima is unconscious, everything she stands for is projected. Most commonly, because of the initially close tie between the anima and the protective mother-imago, this projection falls on the partner, with predictable results.

[A man’s] ideal of marriage is so arranged that his wife has to take over the magical role of the mother. Under the cloak of the ideally exclusive marriage he is really seeking his mother’s protection, and thus he plays into the hands of his wife’s possessive instincts. His fear of the dark incalculable power of the unconscious gives his wife an illegitimate authority over him, and forges such a dangerously close union that the marriage is permanently on the brink of explosion from internal tension.[”Anima and Animus,” CW 7, par. 316.]

No matter where a man is in terms of psychological development, he is always prone to see aspects of his anima, his soul, in an actual woman. The same is true of the animus. Their personal aspects may be integrated and their significance understood, but their essential nature cannot be exhausted.

Though the effects of anima and animus can be made conscious, they themselves are factors transcending consciousness and beyond the reach of perception and volition. Hence they remain autonomous despite the integration of their contents, and for this reason they should be borne constantly in mind.[”The Syzygy: Anima and Animus,” CW 9ii, par. 40.]

The psychological priority in the first half of life is for a man to free himself from the anima fascination of the mother. In later life, the lack of a conscious relationship with the anima is attended by symptoms characteristic of ”loss of soul.”

Younger people . . . can bear even the total loss of the anima without injury. The important thing at this stage is for a man to be a man. . . . After the middle of life, however, permanent loss of the anima means a diminution of vitality, of flexibility, and of human kindness. The result, as a rule, is premature rigidity, crustiness, stereotypy, fanatical one-sidedness, obstinacy, pedantry, or else resignation, weariness, sloppiness, irresponsibility, and finally a childish ramollissement [petulance] with a tendency to alcohol.[”Concerning the Archetypes and the Anima Concept,”CW 9i, par. 146f.]

One way for a man to become familiar with the nature of his anima is through the method of active imagination. This is done by personifying her as an autonomous personality, asking her questions and attending to the response.

I mean this as an actual technique. . . . The art of it consists only in allowing our invisible partner to make herself heard, in putting the mechanism of expression momentarily at her disposal, without being overcome by the distaste one naturally feels at playing such an apparently ludicrous game with oneself, or by doubts as to the genuineness of the voice of one's interlocutor.[”Anima and Animus,” CW 7, pars. 323f.] Jung suggested that if the encounter with the shadow is the ”apprentice-piece”in a man's development, then coming to terms with the anima is the ”master-piece.”[”Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious,”CW 9i, par. 61.] The goal is her transformation from a troublesome adversary into a function of relationship between consciousness and the unconscious. Jung called this ”the conquest of the anima as an autonomous complex.”

With the attainment of this goal it becomes possible to disengage the ego from all its entanglements with collectivity and the collective unconscious. Through this process the anima forfeits the daemonic power of an autonomous complex; she can no longer exercise the power of possession, since she is depotentiated. She is no longer the guardian of treasures unknown; no longer Kundry, daemonic Messenger of the Grail, half divine and half animal; no longer is the soul to be called ”Mistress,”but a psychological function of an intuitive nature, akin to what the primitives mean when they say, ”He has gone into the forest to talk with the spirits”or ”My snake spoke with me” or, in the mythological language of infancy, ”A little bird told me.”[”The Mana-Personality,” CW 7, par. 374.]

Carl Jung's Definition of ”Animus.”] (2015-04-12 05:02)

Animus

The inner masculine side of a woman. (See also anima, Eros, Logos and soul-image.)

Like the anima in a man, the animus is both a personal complex and an archetypal image.
Woman is compensated by a masculine element and therefore her unconscious has, so to speak, a masculine imprint. This results in a considerable psychological difference between men and women, and accordingly I have called the projection-making factor in women the animus, which means mind or spirit. The animus corresponds to the paternal Logos just as the anima corresponds to the maternal Eros.[”The Syzygy: Anima and Animus,” CW 9ii, pars. 28f.]
The animus is the deposit, as it were, of all woman’s ancestral experiences of man-and not only that, he is also a creative and procreative being, not in the sense of masculine creativity, but in the sense that he brings forth something we might call . . . the spermatic word.[”Anima and Animus, &quo CW 7, par. 336.]
Whereas the anima in a man functions as his soul, a woman’s animus is more like an unconscious mind. [At times Jung also referred to the animus as a woman’s soul. See soul and soul-image.] It manifests negatively in fixed ideas, collective opinions and unconscious, a priori assumptions that lay claim to absolute truth. In a woman who is identified with the animus (called animus-possession), Eros generally takes second place to Logos.
A woman possessed by the animus is always in danger of losing her femininity.[”Anima and Animus,” CW 7, par. 337.]
No matter how friendly and obliging a woman’s Eros may be, no logic on earth can shake her if she is ridden by the animus. . . . [A man] is unaware that this highly dramatic situation would instantly come to a banal and unexciting end if he were to quit the field and let a second woman carry on the battle (his wife, for instance, if she herself is not the fiery war horse). This sound idea seldom or never occurs to him, because no man can converse with an animus for five minutes without becoming the victim of his own anima.[”The Syzygy: Anima and Animus,” CW 9ii, par. 29.]
The animus becomes a helpful psychological factor when a woman can tell the difference between the ideas generated by this autonomous complex and what she herself really thinks.
Like the anima, the animus too has a positive aspect. Through the figure of the father he expresses not only conventional opinion but-equally-what we call ”spirit,” philosophical or religious ideas in particular, or rather the attitude resulting from them. Thus the animus is a psychopomp, a mediator between the conscious and the unconscious and a personification of the latter.[Ibid., par. 33.]
Jung described four stages of animus development in a woman. He first appears in dreams and fantasy as the embodiment of physical power, an athlete, muscle man or thug. In the second stage, the animus provides her with initiative and the capacity for planned action. He is behind a woman’s desire for independence and a career of her own. In the next stage, the animus is the ”word,” personified in dreams as a professor or clergyman. In the fourth stage, the animus is the incarnation of spiritual meaning. On this highest level, like the anima as Sophia, the animus mediates between a woman’s conscious mind and the unconscious. In mythology this aspect of the animus appears as Hermes, messenger of the gods; in dreams he is a helpful guide.
Any of these aspects of the animus can be projected onto a man. As with the projected anima, this can lead to unrealistic expectations and acrimony in relationships.
Like the anima, the animus is a jealous lover. He is adept at putting, in place of the real man, an opinion about him, the exceedingly disputable grounds for which are never submitted to criticism. Animus opinions are invariably collective, and they override individuals and individual judgments in exactly the same way as the anima thrusts her emotional anticipations and projections between man and wife.[”Anima and Animus,” CW 7, par. 334.]
The existence of the contrasexual complexes means that in any relationship between a man and a woman there are at least four personalities involved. The possible lines of communication are shown by the arrows in the diagram.[Adapted from ”The Psychology of the Transference,”CW 16, par. 422.]
While a man’s task in assimilating the effects of the anima involves discovering his true feelings, a woman becomes familiar with the nature of the animus by constantly questioning her ideas and opinions.
The technique of coming to terms with the animus is the same in principle as in the case of the anima; only here the woman must learn to criticize and hold her opinions at a distance; not in order to repress them, but, by investigating their origins, to penetrate more deeply into the background, where she will then discover the primordial images, just as the man does in his dealings with the anima.[”Anima and Animus,” CW 7, par. 336.]

Carl Jung and ”Abaissement du niveau mental.” (2015-04-12 13:42)

A lowering of the level of consciousness, a mental and emotional condition experienced as ”loss of soul.” (See also depression.)
It is a slackening of the tensity of consciousness, which might be compared to a low barometric reading, presaging bad weather. The tonus has given way, and this is felt subjectively as listlessness, moroseness, and depression. One no longer has any wish or courage to face the tasks of the day. One feels like lead, because no part of one’s body seems willing to move, and this is due to the fact that one no longer has any disposable energy. . . . The listlessness and paralysis of will can go so far that the whole personality falls apart, so to speak, and consciousness loses its unity . . . .
Abaissement du niveau mental can be the result of physical and mental fatigue, bodily illness, violent emotions, and shock, of which the last has a particularly deleterious effect on one’s self-assurance. The abaissement always has a restrictive influence on the personality as a whole. It reduces one’s self-confidence and the spirit of enterprise, and, as a result of increasing egocentricity, narrows the mental horizon [”Concerning Rebirth, ” CW 9i, pars. 213f.]

Carl Jung on: “Abstraction.” [Lexicon] (2015-04-13 05:45)

[Carl Jung on: “Abstraction.”]
A form of mental activity by which a conscious content is freed from its association with irrelevant elements, similar to the process of differentiation. (Compare empathy.)

Abstraction is an activity pertaining to the psychological functions in general.
There is an abstract thinking, just as there is abstract feeling, sensation, and intuition.
Abstract thinking singles out the rational, logical qualities of a given content from its intellectually irrelevant components.
Abstract feeling does the same with a content characterized by its feeling-values . . . . Abstract sensation would be aesthetic as opposed to sensuous sensation, and abstract intuition would be symbolic as opposed to fantastic intuition.["Definitions," CW 6, par. 678.]
Jung related abstraction to introversion (analogous to empathy and extraversion).
I visualize the process of abstraction as a withdrawal of libido from the object, as a backflow of value from the object into a subjective, abstract content.
For me, therefore, abstraction amounts to an energic devaluation of the object. In other words, abstraction is an introverting movement of libido.[Ibid., par. 679.]
To the extent that its purpose is to break the object's hold on the subject, abstraction is an attempt to rise above the primitive state of participation mystique.

Carl Jung abandoned the use of “Abreaction.” [Lexicon] (2015-04-13 05:50)

[Carl Jung abandoned the use of “Abreaction.”]
A method of becoming conscious of repressed emotional reactions through the retelling and reliving of a traumatic experience. (See also cathartic method.)
After some initial interest in ”trauma theory, ” Jung abandoned abreaction (together with suggestion) as an effective tool in the therapy of neurosis.
I soon discovered that, though traumata of clearly aetiological significance were occasionally present, the majority of them appeared very improbable.
Many traumata were so unimportant, even so normal, that they could be regarded at most as a pretext for the neurosis. But what especially aroused my criticism was the fact that not a few traumata were simply inventions of fantasy and had never happened at all. . . .
I could no longer imagine that repeated experiences of a fantastically exaggerated or entirely fictitious trauma had a different therapeutic value from a suggestion procedure.[”Some Crucial Points in Psychoanalysis, ” CW 4, par. 582.]
The belief, the self-confidence, perhaps also the devotion with which the analyst does his work, are far more important to the patient (imponderabilia though they may be), than the rehearsing of old traumata.[Ibid., par. 584.]

The Publication of Liber Novus (2015-04-13 07:07)

The Publication of Liber Novus:
While Jung had stopped working directly on Liber Novus, the question of what to do with it remained, and the issue of its eventual publication remained open.

On April 10, 1942, Jung replied to Mary Mellon concerning a printing of the Sermones:
”Concerning the printing of the ’Seven Sermones’ I should wish you to wait for a while. I had in mind to add certain material, but I have hesitated for years to do it. But at such an occasion one might risk it.”
In 1944, he had a major heart attack and did not see this plan through. In 1952, Lucy Heyer put forward a project for a biography of Jung.
At Olga Froebe’s suggestion and on Jung’s insistence, Cary Baynes began collaborating with Lucy Heyer on this project.
Cary Baynes considered writing a biography of Jung based on Liber Novus.
To Jung’s disappointment, she withdrew from the project.
After several years of interviews with Lucy Heyer, Jung terminated her biographical project in 1955, because he was dissatisfied with her progress.
In 1956, Kurt Wolff proposed another biographical project, which became Memories, Dreams, Reflections.
At some stage, Jung gave Aniela Jaffe a copy of the draft of Liber Novus, which had been made by Toni Wolff Jung authorized Jaffe to cite from Liber Novus and the Black Books in Memories, Dreams, Reflections.I
In his interviews with Aniela Jaffe, Jung discussed Liber Novus and his self-experimentation.
Unfortunately, she did not reproduce all his comments.
On October 31, 1957, she wrote to Jack Barrett of the Bollingen Foundation concerning Liber Novus, and informed him that Jung had suggested that it and the Black Books be given to the library of the University of Basel with a restriction of 50 years, 80 years, or longer, as ”he hates the idea that anybody should read this material without knowing the relations to his life, etc.”
She added that she had decided not to use much of this material in Memories.
In one early manuscript of Memories, Jaffe had included a transcription of the draft typescript of most of Liber Primus.
But it was omitted from the final manuscript, and she did not cite from Liber Novus or the Black Books.
In the German edition of Memories, Jaffe included Jung’s epilogue to Liber Novus as an appendix.
Jung’s flexible date stipulations concerning access to Liber Novus were similar to that which he gave around the same time concerning the publication of his correspondence with Freud.
On October 12, 1957, Jung told Jaffe that he had never finished the Red Book.
According to Jaffe, in the spring of the year 1959 Jung, after a time of lengthy ill-health, took up Liber Novus again, to complete the last remaining unfinished image.
Once again, he took up the transcription of the manuscript into the calligraphic volume.
Jaffe notes, ”However, he still could not or would not, complete it. He told me that it had to do with death.”
The calligraphic transcription breaks off midsentence, and Jung added an afterword, which also broke off midsentence.
The postscript and Jung’s discussions of its donation to an archive suggest that Jung was aware that the work would eventually be studied at some stage.
After Jung’s death, Liber Novus remained with his family, in accordance with his will.
In her 1971 Eranos lecture, ”The creative phases in Jung’s life,” Jaffe cited two passages from the draft of Liber Novus, noting that ”Jung placed a copy of the manuscript at my disposal with permission to quote from it as occasion arose.”
This was the only time she did so. Pictures from Liber Novus were also shown in a BBC documentary on Jung narrated by Laurens van der Post in 1972.
These created widespread interest in it.
In 1975, after the much acclaimed publication of the Freud/Jung Letters, William McGuire, representing Princeton University Press, wrote to the lawyer of the Jung estate, Hans Karrer, with a publication proposal for Liber Novus and a collection of photographs of Jung's stone carvings, paintings, and the tower.

He proposed a facsimile edition, possibly without the text.
He wrote that "we are uninformed of the, number of its pages, the relative amount of text and pictures, and the content and interest of the text."
No one in the press had actually seen or read the work or knew much about it.
This request was denied.
In 1975, some reproductions from the calligraphic volume of Liber Novus were displayed at an exhibition commemorating Jung's centenary in Zurich.
In 1977, nine paintings from Liber Novus were published by Jaffe in C. G. Jung: Word and Image and in 1989 a few other related paintings were published by Gerhard Wehr in his illustrated biography of Jung.
In 1984, Liber Novus was professionally photographed, and five facsimile editions were prepared.
These were given to the five families directly descendent from Jung.
In 1992, Jung's family, who had supported the publication of Jung's Collected Works in German (completed in 1995), commenced an examination of Jung's unpublished materials.
As a result of my researches, I found one transcription and a partial transcription of Liber Novus and presented them to the Jung heirs in 1997- Around the same time, another transcription was presented to the heirs by Marie-Louise von Franz.
I was invited to present reports on the subject and its suitability for publication, and made a presentation on the subject.
On the basis of these reports and discussions, the heirs decided in May 2000 to release the work for publication.
The work on Liber Novus was at the center of Jung's self-experimentation.
It is nothing less than the central book in his oeuvre.
With its publication, one is now in a position to study what took place there on the basis of primary documentation as opposed to the fantasy, gossip, and speculation that makes up too much of what is written on Jung, and to grasp the genesis and constitution of Jung's later work.
For nearly a century, such a reading has simply not been possible, and the vast literature on Jung's life and work that has arisen has lacked access to the single most important documentary source.
This publication marks a caesura, and opens the possibility of a new era in the understanding of Jung's work.
It provides a unique window into how he recovered his soul and, in so doing, constituted a psychology.
Thus this introduction does not end with a conclusion, but with the promise of a new beginning. The Red Book, Introduction, Publication of Liber Novus, Pages 220-221.

Carl Jung on “Active imagination.” [Lexicon] (2015-04-13 13:12)

[Carl Jung on “Active imagination.”]
A method of assimilating unconscious contents (dreams, fantasies, etc.) through some form of self-expression. (See also transcendent function.)
The object of active imagination is to give a voice to sides of the personality (particularly the anima/animus and the shadow) that are normally not heard, thereby establishing a line of communication between consciousness and the unconscious. Even when the end products-drawing, painting, writing, sculpture, dance, music, etc.-are not interpreted, something goes on between creator and creation that contributes to a transformation of consciousness.
The first stage of active imagination is like dreaming with open eyes. It can take place spontaneously or be artificially induced.
In the latter case you choose a dream, or some other fantasy-image, and concentrate on it by simply catching hold of it and looking at it.
You can also use a bad mood as a starting-point, and then try to find out what sort of fantasy-image it will produce, or what image expresses this mood.
You then fix this image in the mind by concentrating your attention.
Usually it will alter, as the mere fact of contemplating it animates it.
The alterations must be carefully noted down all the time, for they reflect the psychic processes in the unconscious background, which appear in the form of images consisting of conscious memory material.
In this way conscious and unconscious are united, just as a waterfall connects above and below.[”The Conjunction,” CW 14, par. 706.]
The second stage, beyond simply observing the images, involves a conscious participation in them, the honest evaluation of what they mean about oneself, and a morally and intellectually binding commitment to act on the insights.
This is a transition from a merely perceptive or aesthetic attitude to one of judgment.
Although, to a certain extent, he looks on from outside, impartially, he is also an acting and suffering figure in the drama of the psyche.

This recognition is absolutely necessary and marks an important advance. So long as he simply looks at the pictures he is like the foolish Parsifal, who forgot to ask the vital question because he was not aware of his own participation in the action. [An allusion to the medieval Grail legend. The question Parsifal failed to ask was, "Whom does the Grail serve?"]. . .
But if you recognize your own involvement you yourself must enter into the process with your personal reactions, just as if you were one of the fantasy figures, or rather, as if the drama being enacted before your eyes were real.["The Conjunction," CW 14, par. 753.]
The judging attitude implies a voluntary involvement in those fantasy-processes which compensate the individual and-in particular-the collective situation of consciousness.
The avowed purpose of this involvement is to integrate the statements of the unconscious, to assimilate their compensatory content, and thereby produce a whole meaning which alone makes life worth living and, for not a few people, possible at all. [Ibid., par. 756.]

Carl Jung on "Adaptation." [Lexicon] (2015-04-14 07:03)

[Carl Jung on "Adaptation."] Adaptation
The process of coming to terms with the external world, on the one hand, and with one's own unique psychological characteristics on the other. (See also neurosis.)
Before [individuation] can be taken as a goal, the educational aim of adaptation to the necessary minimum of collective norms must first be attained. If a plant is to unfold its specific nature to the full, it must first be able to grow in the soil in which it is planted.["Definitions," CW 6, par. 761.]

The constant flow of life again and again demands fresh adaptation. Adaptation is never achieved once and for all.[”The Transcendent Function,” CW 8, par. 143.]
Man is not a machine in the sense that he can consistently maintain the same output of work.
He can meet the demands of outer necessity in an ideal way only if he is also adapted to his own inner world, that is, if he is in harmony with himself.
Conversely, he can only adapt to his inner world and achieve harmony with himself when he is adapted to the environmental conditions.[”On Psychic Energy,” ibid., par. 75.]
The transition from child to adult initially entails an increasing adaptation to the outer world.
When the libido meets an obstacle to progression, there is an accumulation of energy that normally gives rise to increased efforts to overcome the obstacle.
But if the obstacle proves insurmountable, the stored-up energy regresses to an earlier mode of adaptation.
This in turn activates infantile fantasies and wishes, and necessitates the need to adapt to the inner world.
The best examples of such regressions are found in hysterical cases where a disappointment in love or marriage has precipitated a neurosis.
There we find those well-known digestive disorders, loss of appetite, dyspeptic symptoms of all sorts, etc. . . . [typically accompanied by] a regressive revival of reminiscences from the distant past.
We then find a reactivation of the parental imagos, of the Oedipus complex.
Here the events of early infancy-never before important-suddenly become so. They have been regressively reactivated.
Remove the obstacle from the path of life and this whole system of infantile fantasies at once breaks down and becomes as inactive and ineffective as before.[”Psychoanalysis and Neurosis,”CW4, par. 569.]
In his model of typology, Jung described two substantially different modes of adaptation, introversion and extraversion. He also link-ed failures in adaptation to the outbreak of neurosis.
The psychological trouble in neurosis, and the neurosis itself, can be formulated as an act of adaptation that has failed.[Ibid., par. 574 (italics in original).]

Carl Jung on “Affect” Lexicon (2015-04-14 16:43)

[Carl Jung on “Affect” Lexicon]
Affect:
Emotional reactions marked by physical symptoms and disturbances in thinking. (See also complex and feeling.)
Affect is invariably a sign that a complex has been activated.
Affects occur usually where adaptation is weakest, and at the same time they reveal the reason for its weakness, namely a certain degree of inferiority and the existence of a lower level of personality.
On this lower level with its uncontrolled or scarcely controlled emotions one . . . [is] singularly incapable of moral judgment. Carl Jung, ”The Shadow,” Aion, CW 9ii, par. 15.

What is Jungian Analysis? (2015-04-15 05:28)

Analysis, Jungian
A form of therapy specializing in neurosis, aimed at bringing unconscious contents to consciousness; also called analytic therapy, based on the school of thought developed by C.G. Jung called analytical (or complex) psychology.
[Analysis] is only a means for removing the stones from the path of development, and not a method . . . of putting things into the patient that were not there before.
It is better to renounce any attempt to give direction, and simply try to throw into relief everything that the analysis brings to light, so that the patient can see it clearly and be able to draw suitable conclusions.
Anything he has not acquired himself he will not believe in the long run, and what he takes over from authority merely keeps him infantile.
He should rather be put in a position to take his own life in hand.
The art of analysis lies in following the patient on all his erring ways and so gathering his strayed sheep together.[”Some Crucial Points in Psychoanalysis,” CW 4, par. 643.]
There is a widespread prejudice that analysis is something like a ”cure,” to which one submits for a time and is then discharged healed.
That is a layman’s error left over from the early days of psychoanalysis.
Analytical treatment could be described as a readjustment of psychological attitude achieved with the help of the doctor. . . . [But] there is no change that is unconditionally valid over a long period of time.[”The Transcendent Function,” CW 8, par. 142.]
Jung initially made a distinction between analysis of the unconscious [Jung deliberately used this expression instead of ”psychoanalysis”: ”I wish to leave that term entirely to the Freudians.

What they understand by psychoanalysis is no mere technique, but a method which is dogmatically bound up with and based upon Freud's sexual theory.
When Freud publicly declared that psychoanalysis and his sexual theory were indissolubly wedded, I was obliged to strike out on a different path." ("Analytical Psychology and Education," CW 17, par. 180)] and anamnestic analysis.
The latter is concerned primarily with contents of consciousness already available or easily brought to mind, and with supporting or strengthening the ego. The unconscious is a factor only indirectly.
It consists in a careful anamnesis or reconstruction of the historical development of the neurosis.
The material elicited in this way is a more or less coherent sequence of facts told to the doctor by the patient, so far as he can remember them.
He naturally omits many details which either seem unimportant to him or which he has forgotten.
The experienced analyst who knows the usual course of neurotic development will put questions which help the patient to fill in some of the gaps.
Very often this procedure by itself is of great therapeutic value, as it enables the patient to understand the chief factors of his neurosis and may eventually bring him to a decisive change of attitude.["Analytical Psychology and Education," ibid., par. 177.]
In addition to the favourable effect produced by the realization of previously unconscious connections, it is usual for the doctor to give some good advice, or encouragement, or even a reproof.[Ibid., par. 178.]
Analysis of the unconscious begins when conscious material has been exhausted and there is still no satisfactory resolution of the neurosis; it requires an ego strong enough to deal directly with unconscious material, particularly dreams. Jung believed that analysis in this sense was particularly suited to psychological problems in the second half of life, but even then he expressed caution.
Consistent support of the conscious attitude has in itself a high therapeutic value and not infrequently serves to bring about satisfactory results.
It would be a dangerous prejudice to imagine that analysis of the unconscious is the one and only panacea which should therefore be employed in every case.
It is rather like a surgical operation and we should only resort to the knife when other methods have failed.
So long as it does not obtrude itself the unconscious is best left alone.["The Psychology of the Transference," CW 16, par. 381.]
In his analytic work, Jung shunned diagnosis and prognosis. He used no systematic technique or method. His aim was to approach each case with a minimum of prior assumptions, although he acknowledged that the personality and psychological disposition of the analyst made complete objectivity impossible.
The ideal would naturally be to have no assumptions at all. But this is impossible even if one exercises the most rigorous self-criticism, for one is oneself the biggest of all one's assumptions, and the one with the gravest consequences. Try as we may to have no assumptions and to use no ready-made methods, the assumption that I myself am will determine my method: as I am, so will I proceed. ["Appendix," ibid., par.543.] Jung also insisted that those training to be analysts must have a thorough personal analysis.
We have learned to place in the foreground the personality of the doctor himself as a curative or harmful factor; . . . what is now demanded is his own transformation-the self-education of the educator. . . . The doctor can no longer evade his own difficulty by treating the difficulties of others: the man who suffers from a running abscess is not fit to perform a surgical operation.["Problems of Modern Psychotherapy," ibid., par. 172.]

Carl Jung on “Apperception” Lexicon (2015-04-16 06:06)

[Carl Jung on “Apperception” Lexicon]
Apperception

A psychic process by which a new conscious content is articulated with similar, already existing contents in such a way that it is understood. (Compare assimilation.)
Sense-perceptions tell us that something is.
But they do not tell us what it is.
This is told us not by the process of perception but by the process of apperception, and this has a highly complex structure.
Not that sense-perception is anything simple; only, its complex nature is not so much psychic as physiological.
The complexity of apperception, on the other hand, is psychic. [”The Structure of the Psyche,” CW 8, par. 288.]
Jung distinguishes active from passive apperception.
In active apperception, the ego grabs hold of something new and comes to grips with it.
In passive apperception, the new content forces itself upon consciousness, either from outside (through the senses) or from within (the unconscious).
Apperception may also be either directed or undirected.
In the former case we speak of ”attention,” in the latter case of ”fantasy” or ”dreaming.”
The directed processes are rational, the undirected irrational. [Ibid., par. 294.]

Carl Jung on “Archaic.” (2015-04-16 06:16)

[Carl Jung on “Archaic.”]
Archaic
Primal or original. (See also participation mystique.)
Every civilized human being, however high his conscious development, is still an archaic man at the deeper levels of his psyche.[”Archaic Man,” CW 10, par. 105]

In anthropology, the term archaic is generally descriptive of primitive psychology.
Jung used it when referring to thoughts, fantasies and feelings that are not consciously differentiated.
Archaism attaches primarily to the fantasies of the unconscious, i.e., to the products of unconscious fantasy activity which reach consciousness.
An image has an archaic quality when it possesses unmistakable mythological parallels. Archaic, too, are the associations-by-analogy of unconscious fantasy, and so is their symbolism.
The relation of identity with an object, or participation mystique, is likewise archaic. Concretism of thought and feeling is archaic; also compulsion and inability to control oneself (ecstatic or trance state, possession, etc.).
Fusion of the psychological functions, of thinking with feeling, feeling with sensation, feeling with intuition, and so on, is archaic, as is also the fusion of part of a function with its counterpart.[”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 684.]

Carl Jung on "Attitude." (2015-04-17 00:29)

Attitude:
The readiness of the psyche to act or react in a certain way, based on an underlying psychological orientation. (See also adaptation, type and typology.)

From a great number of existing or possible attitudes I have singled out four; those, namely, that are primarily oriented by the four basic psychological functions: thinking, feeling, sensation, intuition. When any of these attitudes is habitual, thus setting a definite stamp on the character of an individual, I speak of a psychological type. These function-types, which one can call the thinking, feeling, sen-sation, and intuitive types, may be divided into two classes . . . the rational and the irrational. . . . A further division into two classes is permitted by the predominant trend of the movement of libido, namely introversion and extraversion.[Ibid., par. 835.]

The whole psychology of an individual even in its most fundamental features is oriented in accordance with his habitual attitude. . . . [which is] a resultant of all the factors that exert a decisive influence on the psyche, such as innate disposition, environmental influences, experience of life, insights and convictions gained through differentiation, collective views, etc. . . .At bottom, attitude is an individual phenomenon that eludes scientific investigation. In actual experience, however, certain typical attitudes can be distinguished . . . . When a function habitually predominates, a typical attitude is produced. . . . There is thus a typical thinking, feeling, sensation, and intuitive attitude.[Ibid., pars. 690f.]

Adaptation to one's environment requires an appropriate attitude. But due to changing circumstances, no one attitude is permanently suitable. When a particular attitude is no longer appropriate, whether to internal or external reality, the stage is set for psychological difficulties (e.g., an outbreak of neurosis).

For example, a feeling-attitude that seeks to fulfil the demands of reality by means of empathy may easily encounter a situation that can only be solved through thinking. In this case the feeling-attitude breaks down and the progression of libido also ceases. The vital feeling that was present before disappears, and in its place the psychic value of certain conscious contents increases in an unpleasant way; subjective contents and reactions press to the fore and the situation becomes full of affect and ripe for explosions.["On Psychic Energy," CW 8, par. 61.]

The tension leads to conflict, the conflict leads to attempts at mutual repression, and if one of the opposing forces is successfully repressed a dissociation ensues, a splitting of the personality, or disunion with oneself.[Ibid.]

Carl Jung and the “Auxiliary function” Lexicon (2015-04-17 05:11)

Carl Jung and the “Auxiliary function”:
A helpful second or third function, according to Jung’s model of typology, that has a co-determining influence on consciousness.

Absolute sovereignty always belongs, empirically, to one function alone, and can belong only to one function, because the equally independent intervention of another function would necessarily produce a different orientation which, partially at least, would contradict the first.
But since it is a vital condition for the conscious process of adaptation always to have clear and unambiguous aims, the presence of a second function of equal power is naturally ruled out.
This other function, therefore, can have only a secondary importance. . . .
Its secondary importance is due to the fact that it is not, like the primary function . . . an absolutely reliable and decisive factor, but comes into play more as an auxiliary or complementary function.["General Description of the Types," CW 6, par. 667.]
The auxiliary function is always one whose nature differs from, but is not antagonistic to, the superior or primary function: either of the irrational functions (intuition and sensation) can be auxiliary to one of the rational functions (thinking and feeling), and vice versa.
Thus thinking and intuition can readily pair, as can thinking and sensation, since the nature of intuition and sensation is not fundamentally opposed to the thinking function. Similarly, sensation can be bolstered by an auxiliary function of thinking or feeling, feeling is aided by sensation or intuition, and intuition goes well with feeling or thinking.
The resulting combinations [see figure below] present the familiar picture of, for instance, practical thinking allied with sensation, speculative thinking forging ahead with intuition, artistic intuition selecting and presenting its images with the help of feeling-values, philosophical intuition systematizing its vision into comprehensive thought by means of a powerful intellect, and so on.[Ibid., par. 669.]

Carl Jung and the “Axiom of Maria.” [Lexicon] (2015-04-17 17:11)

[Carl Jung and the “Axiom of Maria.”]
Axiom of Maria
A precept in alchemy: ”One becomes two, two becomes three, and out of the third comes the one as the fourth.”
Jung used the axiom of Maria as a metaphor for the whole process of individuation.
One is the original state of unconscious wholeness; two signifies the conflict between opposites; three points to a potential resolution; the third is the transcendent function; and the one as the fourth is a transformed state of consciousness, relatively whole and at peace.

Carl Jung on the “Child.” Lexicon (2015-04-18 05:47)

Child:
Psychologically, an image of both the irrecoverable past and an anticipation of future development. (See also incest.)
The ”child” is . . . . both beginning and end, an initial and a terminal creature. . . . the pre-conscious and the post-conscious essence of man.
His pre-conscious essence is the unconscious state of earliest childhood; his post-conscious essence is an anticipation by analogy of life after death.
In this idea the all-embracing nature of psychic wholeness is expressed.[”The Psychology of the Child Archetype,” CW 9i, par. 299.]
Feelings of alienation or abandonment can constellate the child archetype.
The effects are two-fold: the ”poor-me” syndrome characteristic of the regressive longing for dependence, and, paradoxically, a desperate desire to be free of the past-the positive side of the divine child archetype.
Abandonment, exposure, danger, etc., are all elaborations of the ”child’s” insignificant beginnings and of its mysterious and miraculous birth.
This statement describes a certain psychic experience of a creative nature, whose object is the emergence of a new and as yet unknown content. In the psychology of the individual there is always, at such moments, an agonizing situation of conflict from which there seems to be no way out-at least for the conscious mind, since as far as this is concerned, tertium non datur.[Ibid., par. 285.]
”Child” means something evolving towards independence.
This it cannot do without detaching itself from its origins: abandonment is therefore a necessary condition [of consciousness], not just a concomitant symptom.[Ibid., par. 287.]

Carl Jung on the ”Collective” Lexicon (2015-04-19 05:51)

Collective:
Psychic contents that belong not to one individual but to a society, a people or the human race in general. (See also collective unconscious, individuation and persona.)
The conscious personality is a more or less arbitrary segment of the collective psyche. It consists in a sum of psychic factors that are felt to be personal [”The Persona as a Segment of the Collective Psyche,” CW 7, par. 244.]
Identification with the collective and voluntary segregation from it are alike synonymous with disease.[”The Structure of the Unconscious,” ibid., par. 485]
A collective quality adheres not only to particular psychic elements or contents but to whole psychological functions. Thus the thinking function as a whole can have a collective quality, when it possesses general validity and accords with the laws of logic.
Similarly, the feeling function as a whole can be collective, when it is identical with the general feeling and accords with general expectations, the general moral consciousness, etc. In the same way, sensation and intuition are collective when they are at the same time characteristic of a large group.[”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 692.]

Carl Jung on the ”Collective Unconscious” [Lexicon] (2015-04-20 06:02)

Collective unconscious
A structural layer of the human psyche containing inherited elements, distinct from the personal unconscious. (See also archetype and archetypal image.)

The collective unconscious contains the whole spiritual heritage of mankind's evolution, born anew in the brain structure of every individual.["The Structure of the Psyche," CW 8, par. 342.]

Jung derived his theory of the collective unconscious from the ubiquity of psychological phenomena that could not be explained on the basis of personal experience. Unconscious fantasy activity, for instance, falls into two categories. First, fantasies (including dreams) of a personal character, which go back unquestionably to personal experiences, things forgotten or repressed, and can thus be completely explained by individual anamnesis. Second, fantasies (including dreams) of an impersonal character, which cannot be reduced to experiences in the individual's past, and thus cannot be explained as something individually acquired. These fantasy-images undoubtedly have their closest analogues in mythological types. . . . These cases are so numerous that we are obliged to assume the existence of a collective psychic substratum. I have called this the collective unconscious.["The Psychology of the Child Archetype," CW 9i, par. 262.]

The collective unconscious-so far as we can say anything about it at all-appears to consist of mythological motifs or primordial images, for which reason the myths of all nations are its real exponents. In fact, the whole of mythology could be taken as a sort of projection of the collective unconscious. . . . We can therefore study the collective unconscious in two ways, either in mythology or in the analysis of the individual.["The Structure of the Psyche," CW 8, par. 325.]

The more one becomes aware of the contents of the personal unconscious, the more is revealed of the rich layer of images and motifs that comprise the collective unconscious. This has the effect of enlarging the personality.

In this way there arises a consciousness which is no longer imprisoned in the petty, oversensitive, personal world of the ego, but participates freely in the wider world of objective interests. This widened consciousness is no longer that touchy, egotistical bundle of personal wishes, fears, hopes, and ambitions which always has to be compensated or corrected by unconscious counter-tendencies; instead, it is a function of relationship to the world of objects, bringing the individual into absolute, binding, and indissoluble communion with the world at large.["The Function of the Unconscious," CW 7, par. 275.]

http://www.nyaap.org/jung-lexicon/c/

Carl Jung and ”Compensation” [Lexicon] (2015-04-22 06:24)

Compensation:
A natural process aimed at establishing or maintaining balance within the psyche.
The activity of consciousness is selective.
Selection demands direction.
But direction requires the exclusion of everything irrelevant.
This is bound to make the conscious orientation one-sided. The contents that are excluded and inhibited by the chosen direction sink into the unconscious, where they form a counterweight to the conscious orientation. The strengthening of this counter-position keeps pace with the increase of conscious one-sidedness until finally . . . .
the repressed unconscious contents break through in the form of dreams and spontaneous images. . . .
As a rule, the unconscious compensation does not run counter to consciousness, but is rather a balancing or supplementing of the conscious orientation.
In dreams, for instance, the unconscious supplies all those contents that are constellated by the conscious situation but are inhibited by conscious selection, although a knowledge of them would be indispensable for complete adaptation[”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 694.]
In neurosis, where consciousness is one-sided to an extreme, the aim of analytic therapy is the realization and assimilation of unconscious contents so that compensation may be reestablished.
This can often be accomplished by paying close attention to dreams, emotions and behavior patterns, and through active imagination.

Carl Jung on a "Complex." Lexicon (2015-04-22 14:43)

Carl Jung on a "Complex." Lexicon
Complex:
An emotionally charged group of ideas or images. (See also Word Association Experiment.)
[A complex] is the image of a certain psychic situation which is strongly accentuated emotionally and is, moreover, incompatible with the habitual attitude of consciousness.["A Review of the Complex Theory," CW 8, par. 201.]
The via regia to the unconscious . . . is not the dream, as [Freud] thought, but the complex, which is the architect of dreams and of symptoms. Nor is this via so very Z"royal," either, since the way pointed out by the complex is more like a rough and uncommonly devious footpath.[Ibid., par. 210.]
Formally, complexes are "feeling-toned ideas" that over the years accumulate around certain archetypes, for instance "mother" and "father." When complexes are constellated, they are invariably accompanied by affect. They are always relatively autonomous.
Complexes interfere with the intentions of the will and disturb the conscious performance; they produce disturbances of memory and blockages in the flow of associations; they appear and disappear according to their own laws; they can temporarily obsess consciousness, or influence speech and action in an unconscious way. In a word, complexes behave like independent beings.["Psychological Factors in Human Behaviour," ibid., par. 253.]
Complexes are in fact "splinter psyches." The aetiology of their origin is frequently a so-called trauma, an emotional shock or some such thing, that splits off a bit of the psyche. Certainly one of the commonest causes is a moral conflict, which ultimately derives from the apparent impossibility of affirming the whole of one's nature.["A Review of the Complex Theory," ibid., par. 204.]
Everyone knows nowadays that people "have complexes." What is not so well known, though far more important theoretically, is that complexes can have us.[Ibid., par. 200.]
Jung stressed that complexes in themselves are not negative; only their effects often are. In the same way that atoms and molecules are the invisible components of physical objects, complexes are the building blocks of the psyche and the source of all human emotions.
Complexes are focal or nodal points of psychic life which we would not wish to do without; indeed, they should not be missing, for otherwise psychic activity would come to a fatal standstill.["A Psychological Theory of Types," CW 6, par. 925.]
Complexes obviously represent a kind of inferiority in the broadest sense . . . [but] to have complexes does not necessarily indicate inferiority. It only means that something discordant, unassimilated, and antagonistic exists, perhaps as an obstacle, but also as an incentive to greater effort, and so, perhaps, to new possibilities of achievement.[Ibid., par. 925.]
Some degree of one-sidedness is unavoidable, and, in the same measure, complexes are unavoidable too.["Psychological Factors in Human Behaviour," CW 8, par. 255.]
The negative effect of a complex is commonly experienced as a distortion in one or other of the psychological functions (feeling, thinking, intuition and sensation). In place of sound judgment and an appropriate feeling response, for instance, one reacts according to what the complex dictates. As long as one is unconscious of the complexes, one is liable to be driven by them.

The possession of complexes does not in itself signify neurosis . . . and the fact that they are painful is no proof of pathological disturbance. Suffering is not an illness; it is the normal counterpole to happiness. A complex becomes pathological only when we think we have not got it.["Psychotherapy and a Philosophy of Life," CW 16, par. 179.]

Identification with a complex, particularly the anima/animus and the shadow, is a frequent source of neurosis. The aim of analysis in such cases is not to get rid of the complexes-as if that were possible-but to minimize their negative effects by understanding the part they play in behavior patterns and emotional reactions.

A complex can be really overcome only if it is lived out to the full. In other words, if we are to develop further we have to draw to us and drink down to the very dregs what, because of our complexes, we have held at a distance.["Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype," CW 9i, par. 184.]

Carl Jung on “Conflict.” Lexicon (2015-04-23 06:07)

Carl Jung on “Conflict.” Lexicon
Conflict:
A state of indecision, accompanied by inner tension.
The apparently unendurable conflict is proof of the rightness of your life. A life without inner contradiction is either only half a life or else a life in the Beyond, which is destined only for angels. But God loves human beings more than the angels.[C.G. Jung Letters, vol. 1, p. 375.]
The self is made manifest in the opposites and in the conflict between them; it is a coincidentia oppositorum [coincidence of opposites]. Hence the way to the self begins with conflict.[”Individual Dream Symbolism in Relation to Alchemy,” CW 12, par. 259.]
Conflict is a hallmark of neurosis, but conflict is not invariably neurotic. Some degree of conflict is even desirable since without some tension between opposites the developmental process is inhibited. Conflict only becomes neurotic when it interferes with the normal functioning of consciousness.
The stirring up of conflict is a Luciferian virtue in the true sense of the word. Conflict engenders fire, the fire of affects and emotions, and like every other fire it has two aspects, that of combustion and that of creating light.[”Psychological

Aspects of the Mother Archetype," CW 9i, par. 179.]

When a conflict is unconscious, tension manifests as physical symptoms, particularly in the stomach, the back and the neck. Conscious conflict is experienced as moral or ethical tension. Serious conflicts, especially those involving love or duty, generally involve a disparity between the functions of thinking and feeling. If one or the other is not a conscious participant in the conflict, it needs to be introduced.

The objection [may be] advanced that many conflicts are intrinsically insoluble. People sometimes take this view because they think only of external solutions-which at bottom are not solutions at all. . . . A real solution comes only from within, and then only because the patient has been brought to a different attitude.["Some Crucial Points in Psychoanalysis," CW 4, par. 606.]

Jung's major contribution to the psychology of conflict was his belief that it had a purpose in terms of the self-regulation of the psyche. If the tension between the opposites can be held in consciousness, then something will happen internally to resolve the conflict. The solution, essentially irrational and unforeseeable, generally appears as a new attitude toward oneself and the outer situation, together with a sense of peace; energy previously locked up in indecision is released and the progression of libido becomes possible. Jung called this the tertium non datur or transcendent function, because what happens transcends the opposites.

Holding the tension between opposites requires patience and a strong ego, otherwise a decision will be made out of desperation. Then the opposite will be constellated even more strongly and the conflict will continue with renewed force.

Jung's basic hypothesis in working with neurotic conflict was that separate personalities in oneself-complexes-were involved. As long as these are not made conscious they are acted out externally, through projection. Conflicts with other people are thus essentially externalizations of an unconscious conflict within oneself.

Carl Jung on the "Summa." (2015-04-23 06:30)

Questio.I.

You sit and lean against the wall, and look at the beautiful, riddle-some totality.
The Summa lies before you like a book, and an unspeakable greed seizes you to devour it.

Consequently you lean back and stiffen and sit for a long time.
You are completely incapable of grasping it.
Here and there a light flickers, here and there a fruit falls from high trees which you can grasp, here and there your foot strikes gold.
But what is it, if you compare it with the totality, which lies spread out tangibly close to you?
You stretch out your hand, but it remains hanging in invisible webs.
You want to see it exactly as it is but something cloudy and opaque pushes itself exactly in between.
You would like to tear a piece out of it; it is smooth and impenetrable like polished steel.
So you sink back against the wall, and when you have crawled through all the glowing hot crucibles of the Hell of doubt, you sit once more and lean back, and look at the wonder of the Summa that lies spread out before you.
Here and there a light flickers, here and there a fruit falls.
For you it is all too little.
But you begin to be satisfied with yourself, and you pay no attention to the years passing away.
What are years?
What is hurrying time to him that sits under a tree?
Your time passes like a breath of air and you wait for the next light, the next fruit. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 270.

Carl Jung on the “Coniunctio.” Lexicon (2015-04-23 13:57)

Carl Jung on the “Coniunctio.” Lexicon
Coniunctio:
Literally, ”conjunction,” used in alchemy to refer to chemical combinations; psychologically, it points to the union of opposites and the birth of new possibilities.
The coniunctio is an a priori image that occupies a prominent place in the history of man’s mental development.

If we trace this idea back we find it has two sources in alchemy, one Christian, the other pagan.
The Christian source is unmistakably the doctrine of Christ and the Church, sponsus and sponsa, where Christ takes the role of Sol and the Church that of Luna.
The pagan source is on the one hand the hieros-gamos, on the other the marital union of the mystic with God.["The Psychology of the Transference," CW 16, par. 355.]
Other alchemical terms used by Jung with a near-equivalent psychological meaning include unio mystica (mystic or sacred marriage), coincidentia oppositorum (coincidence of opposites), complexio oppositorum (the opposites embodied in a single image) unus mundus (one world) and Philosophers' Stone.

Carl Jung on "Consciousness." Lexicon (2015-04-24 04:37)

Carl Jung on "Consciousness." Lexicon
Consciousness:
The function or activity which maintains the relation of psychic contents to the ego; distinguished conceptually from the psyche, which encompasses both consciousness and the unconscious.
There is no consciousness without discrimination of opposites.["Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype," CW 9i, par. 178.]
There are two distinct ways in which consciousness arises.
The one is a moment of high emotional tension, comparable to the scene in Parsifal where the hero, at the very moment of greatest temptation, suddenly realizes the meaning of Amfortas' wound.

The other is a state of contemplation, in which ideas pass before the mind like dream-images.
Suddenly there is a flash of association between two apparently disconnected and widely separated ideas, and this has the effect of releasing a latent tension.
Such a moment often works like a revelation.
In every case it seems to be the discharge of energy-tension, whether external or internal, which produces consciousness.[”Analytical Psychology and Education,” CW 17, par. 207.]
In Jung’s view of the psyche, individual consciousness is a superstructure based on, and arising out of, the unconscious.
Consciousness does not create itself-it wells up from unknown depths. In childhood it awakens gradually, and all through life it wakes each morning out of the depths of sleep from an unconscious condition.
It is like a child that is born daily out of the primordial womb of the unconscious
. . . . It is not only influenced by the unconscious but continually emerges out of it in the form of numberless spontaneous ideas and sudden flashes of thought.[”The Psychology of Eastern Meditation,” CW 11, par. 935.]

Crucifixion:
An archetypal motif associated with conflict and the problem of the opposites.
Nobody who finds himself on the road to wholeness can escape that characteristic suspension which is the meaning of crucifixion.
For he will infallibly run into things that thwart and ”cross” him: first, the thing he has no wish to be (the shadow); second, the thing he is not Carl Jung on “Depression.” Lexicon.

Depression:
A psychological state characterized by lack of energy.
Energy not available to consciousness does not simply vanish.
It regresses and stirs up unconscious contents (fantasies, memories, wishes, etc.) that for the sake of psychological health need to be brought to light and examined.
Depression should therefore be regarded as an unconscious compensation whose content must be made conscious if it is to be fully effective.
This can only be done by consciously regressing along with the depressive tendency and integrating the memories so activated into the conscious mind-which was what the depression was aiming at in the first place.[”The Sacrifice,” CW 5, par. 625.]
Depression is not necessarily pathological.

It often foreshadows a renewal of the personality or a burst of creative activity.
There are moments in human life when a new page is turned.
New interests and tendencies appear which have hitherto received no attention, or there is a sudden change of personality (a so-called mutation of character).
During the incubation period of such a change we can often observe a loss of conscious energy: the new development has drawn off the energy it needs from consciousness.
This lowering of energy can be seen most clearly before the onset of certain psychoses and also in the empty stillness which precedes creative work. Carl Jung, CW 16, par. 373.

Carl Jung: ”We are prejudiced in regard to the animal.” (2015-04-25 05:20)

We are prejudiced in regard to the animal.
People don’t understand when I tell them they should become acquainted with their animals or assimilate their animals.
They think the animal is always jumping over walls and raising hell all over town.
Yet in nature the animal is a well-behaved citizen.
It is pious, it follows the path with great regularity, it does nothing extravagant.
Only man is extravagant.
So if you assimilate the character of the animal you become a peculiarly law-abiding citizen, you go very slowly; and you become very reasonable in your ways, in as much as you can afford it” Carl Jung, Visions I, p. 168.

Carl Jung on ”Dissociation.” Lexicon (2015-04-27 04:58)

Dissociation:
The splitting of a personality into its component parts or complexes, characteristic of neurosis.
A dissociation is not healed by being split off, but by more complete disintegration.
All the powers that strive for unity, all healthy desire for selfhood, will resist the disintegration, and in this way he will become conscious of the possibility of an inner integration, which before he had always sought outside himself. He will then find his reward in an undivided self.[”Marriage as a Psychological Relationship,” CW 17, pars. 334f.]
In the analysis of neurotic breakdowns, the aim is to make the conscious ego aware of autonomous complexes.
This can be done both through reductive analysis and by objectifying them in the process of active imagination.
Every form of communication with the split-off part of the psyche is therapeutically effective.
This effect is also brought about by the real or merely supposed discovery of the causes.
Even when the discovery is no more than an assumption or a fantasy, it has a healing effect at least by suggestion if the analyst himself believes in it and makes a serious attempt to understand.[”The Philosophical Tree,” CW 13, par. 465.]

Carl Jung on the thirty-fifth year when things begin to change. (2015-04-27 17:53)

A point exists at about the thirty-fifth year when things begin to change, it is the first moment of the shadow side of life, of the going down to death.
It is clear that Dante found this point and those who have read Zarathustra will know that Nietzsche also discovered it.
When this turning point comes people meet it in several ways: some turn away from it; others plunge into it; and something important happens to yet others from the outside.

Carl Jung and “Dream” Lexicon (2015-04-28 04:55)

Carl Jung and “Dream” Lexicon
Dreams:
Independent, spontaneous manifestations of the unconscious; fragments of involuntary psychic activity just conscious enough to be reproducible in the waking state.

Dreams are neither deliberate nor arbitrary fabrications; they are natural phenomena which are nothing other than what they pretend to be. They do not deceive, they do not lie, they do not distort or disguise. . . . They are invariably seeking to express something that the ego does not know and does not understand.[”Analytical Psychology and Education,” CW 17, par. 189.]

In symbolic form, dreams picture the current situation in the psyche from the point of view of the unconscious.

Since the meaning of most dreams is not in accord with the tendencies of the conscious mind but shows peculiar deviations, we must assume that the unconscious, the matrix of dreams, has an independent function. This is what I call the autonomy of the unconscious. The dream not only fails to obey our will but very often stands in flagrant opposition to our conscious intentions[”On the Nature of Dreams,” CW 8, par. 545.]

Jung acknowledged that in some cases dreams have a wish-fulfilling and sleep-preserving function (Freud) or reveal an infantile striving for power (Adler), but he focused on their symbolic content and their compensatory role in the self-regulation of the psyche: they reveal aspects of oneself that are not normally conscious, they disclose unconscious motivations operating in relationships and present new points of view in conflict situations.

In this regard there are three possibilities. If the conscious attitude to the life situation is in large degree one-sided, then the dream takes the opposite side. If the conscious has a position fairly near the ”middle,” the dream is satisfied with variations. If the conscious attitude is ”correct” (adequate), then the dream coincides with and emphasizes this tendency, though without forfeiting its peculiar autonomy.[Ibid., par. 546.]

In Jung’s view, a dream is an interior drama.

The whole dream-work is essentially subjective, and a dream is a theatre in which the dreamer is himself the scene, the player, the prompter, the producer, the author, the public, and the critic.[”General Aspects of Dream Psychology,” ibid., par. 509.]

This conception gives rise to the interpretation of dreams on the subjective level, where the images in them are seen as symbolic representations of elements in the dreamer’s own personality. Interpretation on the objective level refers the images to people and situations in the outside world.

Many dreams have a classic dramatic structure. There is an exposition (place, time and characters), which shows the initial situation of the dreamer. In the second phase there is a development in the plot (action takes place). The third phase brings the culmination or climax (a decisive event occurs). The final phase is the lysis, the result or solution (if any) of the action in the dream.

Carl Jung and the "Ego." Lexicon (2015-04-28 14:50)

Ego:
The central complex in the field of consciousness.
The ego, the subject of consciousness, comes into existence as a complex quantity which is constituted partly by the inherited disposition (character constituents) and partly by unconsciously acquired impressions and their attendant phenomena ["Analytical Psychology and Education," CW 17, par. 169.]
Jung pointed out that knowledge of the ego-personality is often confused with self-understanding.
Anyone who has any ego-consciousness at all takes it for granted that he knows himself.
But the ego knows only its own contents, not the unconscious and its contents.
People measure their self-knowledge by what the average person in their social environment knows of himself, but not by the real psychic facts which are for the most part hidden from them.
In this respect the psyche behaves like the body, of whose physiological and anatomical structure the average person knows very little too. ["The Undiscovered Self," CW 10, par. 491.]
In the process of individuation, one of the initial tasks is to differentiate the ego from the complexes in the personal unconscious, particularly the persona, the shadow and anima/animus.
A strong ego can relate objectively to these and other contents of the unconscious without identifying with them.
Because the ego experiences itself as the center of the psyche, it is especially difficult to resist identification with the self, to which it owes its existence and to which, in the hierarchy of the psyche, it is subordinate.
The ego stands to the self as the moved to the mover, or as object to subject, because the determining factors which radiate out from the self surround the ego on all sides and are therefore supraordinate to it. The self, like the unconscious, is an a priori existent out of which the ego evolves.["Transformation Symbolism in the Mass," CW 11, par. 391.]
Identification with the self can manifest in two ways: the assimilation of the ego by the self, in which case the ego falls under the control of the unconscious; or the assimilation of the self to the ego, where the ego becomes over-accentuated. In both cases the result is inflation, with disturbances in adaptation.
In the first case, reality has to be protected against an archaic . . . dream-state; in the second, room must be made for the dream at the expense of the world of consciousness.

In the first case, mobilization of all the virtues is indicated; in the second, the presumption of the ego can only be damped down by moral defeat.[”The Self,” CW 9ii, par. 47.]

An involuntary reaction due to an active complex.
On the one hand, emotion is the alchemical fire whose warmth brings everything into existence and whose heat burns all superfluities to ashes (omnes superfluitates comburit).
But on the other hand, emotion is the moment when steel meets flint and a spark is struck forth, for emotion is the chief source of consciousness.
There is no change from darkness to light or from inertia to movement without emotion. [”Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype,” CW 9i, par. 179.]

Carl Jung on “Enantiodromia.” Lexicon (2015-04-29 15:18)

Enantiodromia:
Literally, ”running counter to,” referring to the emergence of the unconscious opposite in the course of time.
This characteristic phenomenon practically always occurs when an extreme, one-sided tendency dominates conscious life; in time an equally powerful counter-position is built up, which first inhibits the conscious performance and subsequently breaks through the conscious control. [”Definitions,” ibid., par. 709.]

Enantiodromia is typically experienced in conjunction with symptoms associated with acute neurosis, and often foreshadows a rebirth of the personality.

The grand plan on which the unconscious life of the psyche is constructed is so inaccessible to our understanding that we can never know what evil may not be necessary in order to produce good by enantiodromia, and what good may very possibly lead to evil.[”The Phenomenology of the Spirit in Fairytales,” CW 9i, par. 397.]

Eros:
In Greek mythology, the personification of love, a cosmogonic force of nature; psychologically, the function of relationship.
Woman’s consciousness is characterized more by the connective quality of Eros than by the discrimination and cognition associated with Logos. In men, Eros . . . is usually less developed than Logos. In women, on the other hand, Eros is an expression of their true nature, while their Logos is often only a regrettable accident. [”The Syzygy: Anima and Animus,” CW 9ii, par. 29.]

Eros is a questionable fellow and will always remain so . . . . He belongs on one side to man’s primordial animal nature which will endure as long as man has an animal body. On the other side he is related to the highest forms of the spirit. But he thrives only when spirit and instinct are in right harmony.[”The Eros Theory,” CW 7, par. 32.]

Where love reigns, there is no will to power; and where the will to power is paramount, love is lacking. The one is but the shadow of the other: the man who adopts the standpoint of Eros finds his compensatory opposite in the will to power, and that of the man who puts the accent on power is Eros.[”The Problem of the Attitude-Type,” ibid., par. 78.]

An unconscious Eros always expresses itself as will to power. [”Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype,” CW 9i, par. 167.]

Carl Jung on “Extraversion.” Lexicon (2015-05-01 03:29)

Carl Jung on “Extraversion.” Lexicon

Extraversion:

A mode of psychological orientation where the movement of energy is toward the outer world.

Extraversion is characterized by interest in the external object, responsiveness, and a ready acceptance of external happenings, a desire to influence and be influenced by events, a need to join in and get ”with it,” the capacity to endure bustle and noise of every kind, and actually find them enjoyable, constant attention to the surrounding world, the cultivation of friends and acquaintances, none too carefully selected, and finally by the great importance attached to the figure one cuts.[”Psychological Typology,” CW 6, par. 972.]

Jung believed that introversion and extraversion were present in everyone, but that one attitude-type is invariably dominant. When external factors are the prime motivating force for judgments, perceptions, affects and actions, we have an extraverted attitude or type.

The extravert’s philosophy of life and his ethics are as a rule of a highly collective nature with a strong streak of altruism, and his conscience is in large measure dependent on public opinion.[Ibid.]

Jung believed that type differentiation begins very early in life, so that it might be described as innate.

The earliest sign of extraversion in a child is his quick adaptation to the environment, and the extraordinary attention he gives to objects and especially to the effect he has on them. Fear of objects is minimal; he lives and moves among them with confidence. . . and can therefore play with them freely and learn through them. He likes to carry his enterprises to the extreme and exposes himself to risks. Everything unknown is alluring.[”Psychological Types,” ibid., par. 896.]

In general, the extravert trusts what is received from the outside world and is not inclined to examine personal motivations.

He has no secrets he has not long since shared with others. Should something unmentionable nevertheless befall him, he prefers to forget it. Anything that might tarnish the parade of optimism and positivism is avoided. Whatever he thinks, intends, and does is displayed with conviction and warmth.[”Psychological Typology,” ibid., par. 973.]

Although everyone is affected by objective data, the extravert’s thoughts, decisions and behavior are determined by them. Personal views and the inner life take second place to outer conditions.

He lives in and through others; all self-communings give him the creeps. Dangers lurk there which are better drowned out by noise. If he should ever have a ”complex,” he finds refuge in the social whirl and allows himself to be assured several times a day that everything is in order. [Ibid., par. 974.]

The psychic life of the extreme extraverted type is enacted wholly in reaction to the environment, which determines the personal standpoint. If the mores change, he adjusts his views and behavior patterns to match. This is both a strength and a limitation.

Adjustment is not adaptation; adaptation . . . requires observance of laws more universal than the immediate conditions of time and place. The very adjustment of the normal extraverted type is his limitation. He owes his normality . . . to his ability to fit into existing conditions with comparative ease. His requirements are limited to the objectively possible, for instance to the career that holds out good prospects at this particular moment; he does what is needed of him, or what is expected of him, and refrains from all innovations that are not entirely self-evident or that in any way exceed the expectations of those around him[”General Description of the Types,” CW 6, par. 564.]

Extraversion is an asset in social situations and in relating to the external environment. But a too-extraverted attitude may result in sacrificing oneself in order to fulfil what one sees as objective demands-the needs of others, for instance, or the requirements of an expanding business.

This is the extravert’s danger: He gets sucked into objects and completely loses himself in them. The resultant functional disorders, nervous or physical, have a compensatory value, as they force him into an involuntary self-restraint. Should the symptoms be functional, their peculiar character may express his psychological situation in symbolic form; for instance, a singer whose fame has risen to dangerous heights that tempt him to expend too much energy suddenly finds he cannot sing high notes . . . . Or a man of modest beginnings who rapidly reaches a social position of great influence with wide prospects is suddenly afflicted with all the symptoms of mountain sickness.[Ibid., par. 565.]

The form of neurosis most likely to afflict the extravert is hysteria, which typically manifests as a pronounced identification with persons in the immediate environment.

The extravert's tendency to sacrifice inner reality to outer circumstances is not a problem as long as the extraversion is not too extreme. But to the extent that it becomes necessary to compensate the inclination to one-sidedness, there will arise a markedly self-centered tendency in the unconscious. All those needs or desires that are stifled or repressed by the conscious attitude come in the back door, in the form of infantile thoughts and emotions that center on oneself.
The more complete the conscious attitude of extraversion is, the more infantile and archaic the unconscious attitude will be. The egoism which characterizes the extravert's unconscious attitude goes far beyond mere childish selfishness; it verges on the ruthless and brutal. [Ibid., par. 572.]
The danger then is that the extravert, so habitually and apparently selflessly attuned to the outside world and the needs of others, may suddenly become quite indifferent.

Carl Jung's Stone Memorial to Emma Jung (2015-05-01 10:04)

Although Emma Jung was not buried at Bollingen, Jung beautifully carved a memorial stone to her memory.
Its symmetry and elegant classical lines reflect Emma's own aesthetic as seen at Küsnacht. In this place, it is not difficult to imagine a grieving Jung laboring over this work of art.
Note the sun and moon (male and female symbols) over what appears to be a Eucharistic host and paten.
The inscription in Latin reads:
Oh outstanding vessel of devotion and obedience!
To the ancestral spirits of my most beloved and faithful wife Emma Maria.
She completed her life and after her death she was lamented.
She went over to the secret of eternity in the year 1955.
Her age was 73.
Her husband C.G. .Jung has made and placed [this stone] in 1956.

Carl Jung's cubical stone (2015-05-01 10:13)

On Jung's 70th birthday in 1950, he set up a cubical stone by a tree at the side of the lake, and inscribed three sides – one with a quote from the alchemical treatise "The Philosopher's Stone":
"hic lapis exilis extat, pretio quoque vilis, spernitur a stultis, amatur plus ab edoctis" ("this stone is poor, and cheap in price; it is disdained by fools, but it is loved all the more by the wise"); one with a figure of Telesphorus – a sacred homunculus featured in the Red Book and reminiscent of the manikin he first created as a child; and on one side a memorial of gratitude for his 70th birthday.
A copper cover was added later for protection.
The side of the stone facing the lake reads:
I am an orphan, alone; yet I am found everywhere.
I am a youth and an old man simultaneously.
I have known neither father now mother, because like a fish I have to be lifted up from the depths.
Or because I drop from the sky like a white stone.
In woods and mountains I roam, but I am hidden in the human's innermost.
I am mortal for everyone, but remain untouched from the change of times.

Carl Jung's "Snake Stone." (2015-05-01 10:31)

As we were leaving, Mr. Hörni showed us one more carving, one of his favorites, the Snake Stone, which is now obscured behind some vines and weeds by the courtyard entrance—Jung made it a part of the foundation for the enclosed courtyard.
The snake was a central symbol for Jung, representing death and rebirth, as well as the life force (Kundalini), and healing (Aesclepius); it appears in the Red Book also as the dying and rising god he named "Atmavictu."
The inscription reads: Because it devoured a fish too large the snake suffocated.
In this way, both perished simultaneously, to testify that the (Christian) mass and the (alchemical) work are the same and not the same, namely their death an event coinciding and corresponding with my thoughts.
In memory of this event, I, C.G. J., placed this stone in the year 1933."
Mr. Hörni stated that Jung was greatly moved by finding this snake and fish, as it coincided with the time he was working on the symbols of fish/Christianity and snake/alchemy.
This awareness of "synchronicity" helped him to realize how much these symbols had always meant to him, both archetypally and also representing his own struggle to find a way to integrate the alchemical (or perhaps more broadly his desire to discover ancient wisdom of all kinds) and Christian sacraments and symbolism.
Much later, someone found a small stone fragment out by the road, on which (apparently) Jung had made a simpler carving and which now sits on the mantel over the fireplace in the room near the courtyard—the family believes it was a small gravestone he made to bury the actual dead snake and fish.

Carl Jung on "Fantasy." Lexicon (2015-05-02 03:22)

Carl Jung on “Fantasy.” Lexicon.
Fantasy:
A complex of ideas or imaginative activity expressing the flow of psychic energy.:
A fantasy needs to be understood both causally and purposively. Causally interpreted, it seems like a symptom of a physiological state, the outcome of antecedent events. Purposively interpreted, it seems like a symbol, seeking to characterize a definite goal with the help of the material at hand, or trace out a line of future psychological development. [”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 720.]
Jung distinguished between active and passive fantasies. The former, characteristic of the creative mentality, are evoked by an intuitive attitude directed toward the perception of unconscious contents; passive fantasies are spontaneous and autonomous manifestations of unconscious complexes.
Passive fantasy, therefore, is always in need of conscious criticism, lest it merely reinforce the standpoint of the unconscious opposite. Whereas active fantasy, as the product of a conscious attitude not opposed to the unconscious, and of unconscious processes not opposed but merely compensatory to consciousness, does not require criticism so much as understanding.[Ibid., par. 714.]
Jung developed the method of active imagination as a way of assimilating the meaning of fantasies. The important thing is not to interpret but to experience them.
Continual conscious realization of unconscious fantasies, together with active participation in the fantastic events, has . . . the effect firstly of extending the conscious horizon by the inclusion of numerous unconscious contents; secondly of gradually diminishing the dominant influence of the unconscious; and thirdly of bringing about a change of personality. [”The Technique of Differentiation,” CW 7, par. 358.]

Carl Jung on the ”Father Complex.” Lexicon (2015-05-02 15:05)

Father complex:
A group of feeling-toned ideas associated with the experience and image of father.

In men, a positive father-complex very often produces a certain credulity with regard to authority and a distinct willingness to bow down before all spiritual dogmas and values; while in women, it induces the liveliest spiritual aspirations and interests. In dreams, it is always the father-figure from whom the decisive convictions, prohibitions, and wise counsels emanate. [”The Phenomenology of the Spirit in Fairytales,” CW 9i, par. 396.]

Jung’s comments on the father complex were rarely more than asides in writing about something else. In general, the father complex in a man manifests in the persona (through identification) and as aspects of his shadow; in a woman, it manifests in the nature of the animus, colored by the projection of her father’s anima.

The father exerts his influence on the mind or spirit of his daughter-on her “Logos.” This he does by increasing her intellectuality, often to a pathological degree which in my later writings I have described as “animus possession.”[”The Origin of the Hero,” CW 5, par. 272.]

The father is the first carrier of the animus-image. He endows this virtual image with substance and form, for on account of his Logos he is the source of “spirit” for the daughter. Unfortunately this source is often sullied just where we would expect clean water. For the spirit that benefits a woman is not mere intellect, it is far more: it is an attitude, the spirit by which a man lives. Even a so-called “ideal” spirit is not always the best if it does not understand how to deal adequately with nature, that is, with animal man. . . . Hence every father is given the opportunity to corrupt, in one way or another, his daughter’s nature, and the educator, husband, or psychiatrist then has to face the music. For “what has been spoiled by the father”[A reference to Hexagram 18 in the I Ching (Richard Wilhelm edition, p. 80): ”Work ok on What Has Been Spoiled.”] can only be made good by a father.[”The Personification of the Opposites,” CW 14, par. 232.]

Carl Jung on ”Feeling” Lexicon (2015-05-03 04:35)

Feeling:
The psychological function that evaluates or judges what something or someone is worth.
A feeling is as indisputable a reality as the existence of an idea. [”The Psychology of the Transference,” CW 16, par. 531.]
The feeling function is the basis for “fight or flight” decisions. As a subjective process, it may be quite independent of external stimuli. In Jung’s view it is a rational function, like thinking, in that it is decisively influenced not by perception (as are the functions of sensation and intuition) but by reflection. A person whose overall attitude is oriented by the feeling function is called a feeling type.
In everyday usage, feeling is often confused with emotion. The latter, more appropriately called affect, is the result of an activated complex. Feeling not contaminated by affect can be quite cold.
Feeling is distinguished from affect by the fact that it produces no perceptible physical innervations, i.e., neither more nor less than an ordinary thinking process. [”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 725.]

Carl Jung on "Final" point of view. Lexicon (2015-05-03 06:27)

Final:
A point of view based on the potential result or purpose of psychic activity, complementary to a causal approach. (See also constructive, neurosis, reductive, and self-regulation of the psyche.)
Psychological data necessitate a twofold point of view, namely that of causality and that of finality. I use the word finality intentionally, in order to avoid confusion with the concept of teleology. [Teleology implies the anticipation of a particular end or goal; finality assumes purpose but an essentially unknown goal.] By finality I mean merely the immanent psychological striving for a goal. Instead of "striving for a goal" one could also say "sense of purpose." All psychological phenomena have some such sense of purpose inherent in them, even merely reactive phenomena like emotional reactions.[”General Aspects of Dream Psychology,” CW 8, par. 456.]

Jung also called the final point of view energic, contrasting it with mechanistic or reductive.
The mechanistic view is purely causal; it conceives an event as the effect of a cause, in the sense that unchanging substances change their relations to one another according to fixed laws. The energic point of view on the other hand is in essence final; the event is traced back from effect to cause on the assumption that some kind of energy underlies the changes in phenomena, that it maintains itself as a constant throughout these changes and finally leads to entropy, a condition of general equilibrium. The flow of energy has a definite direction (goal) in that it follows the gradient of potential in a way that cannot be reversed.[”On Psychic Energy,” ibid., pars. 2f.]
Jung believed that laws governing the physical conservation of energy applied equally to the psyche. Psychologically, this means that where there is an overabundance of energy in one place, some other psychic function has been deprived; conversely, when libido “disap-pears,” as it seems to do in a depression, it must appear in another form, for instance as a symptom.
Every time we come across a person who has a “bee in his bonnet,” or a morbid conviction, or some extreme attitude, we know that there is too much libido, and that the excess must have been taken from somewhere else where, consequently, there is too little. . . . Thus the symptoms of a neurosis must be regarded as exaggerated functions over-invested with libido. . . .The question has to be reversed in the case of those syndromes characterized mainly by lack of libido, for instance apathetic states. Here we have to ask, where did the libido go? . . . The libido is there, but it is not visible and is inaccessible to the patient himself. . . . It is the task of psychoanalysis to search out that hidden place where the libido dwells.[”The Theory of Psychoanalysis,” CW 4, pars. 254f]
The energic or final point of view, coupled with the concept of compensation, led Jung to believe that an outbreak of neurosis is essentially an attempt by the psyche to cure itself.

Carl Jung on ”Function.” Lexicon (2015-05-03 12:30)

Carl Jung on ”Function.” Lexicon

Function:

A form of psychic activity, or manifestation of libido, that remains the same in principle under varying conditions. (See also auxiliary function, differentiation, inferior function, primary function and typology.)

Jung’s model of typology distinguishes four psychological functions: thinking, feeling, sensation and intuition.

Sensation establishes what is actually present, thinking enables us to recognize its meaning, feeling tells us its value, and intuition points to possibilities as to whence it came and whither it is going in a given situation.[”A Psychological Theory of Types,” CW 6, par. 958.]

Though all the functions exist in every psyche, one function is invariably more consciously developed than the others, giving rise to a one-sidedness that often leads to neurosis.

The more [a man] identifies with one function, the more he invests it with libido, and the more he withdraws libido from the other functions. They can tolerate being deprived of libido for even quite long periods, but in the end they will react. Being drained of libido, they gradually sink below the threshold of consciousness, lose their associative connection with it, and finally lapse into the unconscious. This is a regressive development, a reversion to the infantile and finally to the archaic level. . . . [which] brings about a dissociation of the personality.[”The Type Problem in Aesthetics,” ibid., pars. 502f.]

Carl Jung on the "Hero." Lexicon. (2015-05-04 05:17)

Hero:
An archetypal motif based on overcoming obstacles and achieving certain goals.
The hero's main feat is to overcome the monster of darkness: it is the long-hoped-for and expected triumph of consciousness over the unconscious.["The Psychology of the Child Archetype," CW 9i, par. 284.]
The hero myth is an unconscious drama seen only in projection, like the happenings in Plato's parable of the cave.["The Dual Mother," CW 5, par. 612.]
The hero symbolizes a man's unconscious self, and this manifests itself empirically as the sum total of all archetypes and therefore includes the archetype of the father and of the wise old man. To that extent the hero is his own father and his own begetter [Ibid., par. 516.]
Mythologically, the hero's goal is to find the treasure, the princess, the ring, the golden egg, elixir of life, etc. Psychologically these are metaphors for one's true feelings and unique potential. In the process of individuation, the heroic task is to assimilate unconscious contents as opposed to being overwhelmed by them. The potential result is the release of energy that has been tied up with unconscious complexes.
In myths the hero is the one who conquers the dragon, not the one who is devoured by it. And yet both have to deal with the same dragon. Also, he is no hero who never met the dragon, or who, if he once saw it, declared afterwards that he saw nothing. Equally, only one who has risked the fight with the dragon and is not overcome by it wins the hoard, the "treasure hard to attain." He alone has a genuine claim to self-confidence, for he has faced the dark ground of his self and thereby has gained himself. . . . He has acquired the right to believe that he will be able to overcome all future threats by the same means.["The Conjunction," CW 14, par. 756.]

The hero's journey is a round as illustrated in the diagram. [Adapted from Joseph Campbell, Hero with a Thousand Faces, Bollingen Series XVII (Princeton University press, 1949), p. 245.]

Hero

In myth and legend, the hero typically travels by ship, fights a sea monster, is swallowed, struggles against being bitten or crushed to death, and having arrived inside the belly of the whale, like Jonah, seeks the vital organ and cuts it off, thereby winning release. Eventually he must return to his beginnings and bear witness.

In terms of a man's individuation, the whale-dragon is the mother or the mother-bound anima. The vital organ that must be severed is the umbilical cord.

The hero is the ideal masculine type: leaving the mother, the source of life, behind him, he is driven by an unconscious desire to find her again, to return to her womb. Every obstacle that rises in his path and hampers his ascent wears the shadowy features of the Terrible Mother, who saps his strength with the poison of secret doubt and retrospective longing.["The Dual Mother," CW 5, par. 611.]

In a woman's psychology, the hero's journey is lived out through the worldly exploits of the animus, or else in a male partner, through projection.

Usually characterized psychologically by identification with the anima. (See also mother complex.) Jung acknowledged the potential neurotic effects of homosexuality, but he did not see it as an illness in itself.
In view of the recognized frequency of this phenomenon, its interpretation as a pathological perversion is very dubious. The psychological findings show that it is rather a matter of incomplete detachment from the hermaphroditic archetype, coupled with a distinct resistance to identify with the role of a one-sided sexual being. Such a disposition should not be adjudged negative in all circumstances, in so far as it preserves the archetype of the Original Man, which a one-sided sexual being has, up to a point, lost.["Concerning the Archetypes and the Anima Concept," CW 9i, par. 146.]

Carl Jung on ”Hysteria” Lexicon (2015-05-06 06:52)

Hysteria:
A state of mind marked by an exaggerated rapport with persons in the immediate environment and an adjustment to surrounding conditions that amounts to imitation.
Hysteria is, in my view, by far the most frequent neurosis of the extraverted type. . . . A constant tendency to make himself interesting and produce an impression is a basic feature of the hysteric. The corollary of this is his proverbial suggestibility, his proneness to another person's influence. Another unmistakable sign of the extraverted hysteric is his effusiveness, which occasionally carries him into the realm of fantasy, so that he is accused of the "hysterical lie."["General Description of the Types," CW 6, par. 566.]
Hysterical neurosis is usually accompanied by compensatory reactions from the unconscious.
[These] counteract the exaggerated extraversion by means of physical symptoms that force the libido to introvert. The reaction of the unconscious produces another class of symptoms having a more introverted character, one of the most typical being a morbid intensification of fantasy activity.[Ibid., par. 566.]

Carl Jung on “Identification.” Lexicon (2015-05-07 03:37)

Carl Jung on “Identification.” Lexicon
Identification

6710

A psychological process in which the personality is partially or totally dissimilated. (See also participation mystique and projection.)

Identity, denoting an unconscious conformity between subject and object, oneself and others, is the basis for identification, projection and introjection.

Identity is responsible for the naïve assumption that the psychology of one man is like that of another, that the same motives occur everywhere, that what is agreeable to me must obviously be pleasurable for others, that what I find immoral must also be immoral for them, and so on. It is also responsible for the almost universal desire to correct in others what most needs correcting in oneself.[”Definitions,” ibid., par. 742.]

Identification facilitates early adaptation to the outside world, but in later life becomes a hindrance to individual development.

For example, identification with the father means, in practice, adopting all the father’s ways of behaving, as though the son were the same as the father and not a separate individuality. Identification differs from imitation in that it is an unconscious imitation, whereas imitation is a conscious copying. . . . Identification can be beneficial so long as the individual cannot go his own way. But when a better possibility presents itself, identification shows its morbid character by becoming just as great a hindrance as it was an unconscious help and support before. It now has a dissociative effect, splitting the individual into two mutually estranged personalities.[Ibid., par. 738.]

Identification with a complex (experienced as possession) is a frequent source of neurosis, but it is also possible to identify with a particular idea or belief.

The ego keeps its integrity only if it does not identify with one of the opposites, and if it understands how to hold the balance between them. This is possible only if it remains conscious of both at once. However, the necessary insight is made exceedingly difficult not by one’s social and political leaders alone, but also by one’s religious mentors. They all want decision in favour of one thing, and therefore the utter identification of the individual with a necessarily one-sided ”truth.” Even if it were a question of some great truth, identification with it would still be a catastrophe, as it arrests all further spiritual development.[”On the Nature of the Psyche,” CW 8, par. 425.]

One-sidedness is usually due to identifying with a particular conscious attitude. This can result in losing touch with the compensating powers of the unconscious.

In a case like this the unconscious usually responds with violent emotions, irritability, lack of control, arrogance, feelings of inferiority, moods, depressions, outbursts of rage, etc., coupled with lack of self-criticism and the misjudgments, mistakes, and delusions which this entails.[”The Philosophical Tree,” CW 13, par. 454.]

Carl Jung on “Imago.” Lexicon.
Imago:
A term used to differentiate the objective reality of a person or a thing from the subjective perception of its importance.
The image we form of a human object is, to a very large extent, subjectively conditioned. In practical psychology, therefore, we would do well to make a rigorous distinction between the image or imago of a man and his real existence.
Because of its extremely subjective origin, the imago is frequently more an image of a subjective functional complex than of the object itself.

In the analytical treatment of unconscious products it is essential that the imago should not be assumed to be identical with the object; it is better to regard it as an image of the subjective relation to the object. [”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 812.]
Imagos are the consequence of personal experience combined with archetypal images in the collective unconscious. Like everything else unconscious, they are experienced in projection.
The more limited a man’s field of consciousness is, the more numerous the psychic contents (imagos) which meet him as quasi-external apparitions, either in the form of spirits, or as magical potencies projected upon living people (magicians, witches, etc.)[”The Function of the Unconscious,” CW 7, par. 295.]

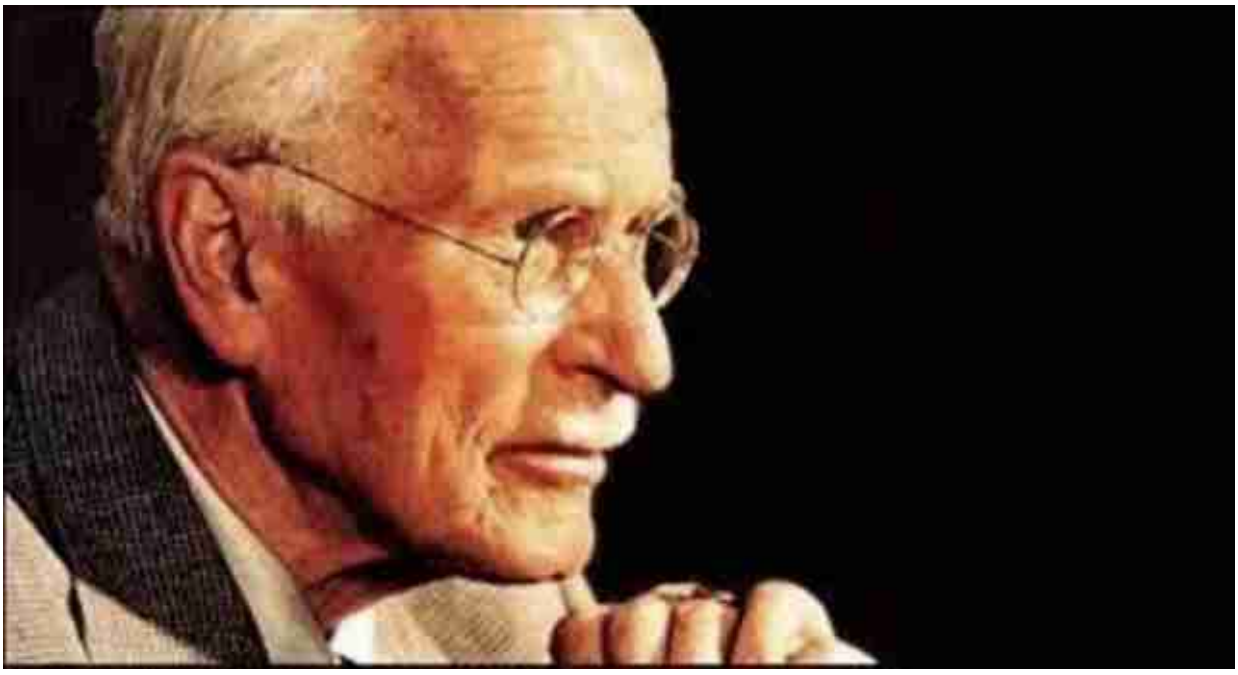
Carl Jung on “Incest.” Lexicon (2015-05-08 05:09)



Incest:
Psychologically, the regressive longing for the security of childhood and early youth.
Jung interpreted incest images in dreams and fantasies not concretely but symbolically, as indicating the need for a new adaptation more in accord with the instincts. (This differed so radically from the psychoanalytic view that it led to his break with Freud.)
So long as the child is in that state of unconscious identity with the mother, he is still one with the animal psyche and is just as unconscious as it. The development of consciousness inevitably leads not only to separation from the mother, but to separation from the parents and the whole family circle and thus to a relative degree of detachment from the unconscious and the world of instinct. Yet the longing for this lost world continues and, when difficult adaptations are demanded, is forever tempting one to make evasions and retreats, to regress to the infantile past, which then starts throwing up the incestuous symbolism. [”Symbols of the Mother and of Rebirth,” CW 5, par. 351.]
Whenever [the] drive for wholeness appears, it begins by disguising itself under the symbolism of incest, for, unless he seeks it in himself, a man’s nearest feminine counterpart is to be found in his mother, sister, or daughter. [”The Psychology of the Transference,” CW 16, par. 471.]

Unique and unlike anyone else, distinguished from what is collective. (See also individuality.)
A distinction must be made between individuality and the individual. The individual is determined on the one hand by the principle of uniqueness and distinctiveness, and on the other by the society to which he belongs. He is an indispensable link in the social structure. ["The Structure of the Unconscious," CW 7, par. 519.]
The individual is precisely that which can never be merged with the collective and is never identical with it.[Ibid., par. 485.]
The larger a community is, and the more the sum total of collective factors peculiar to every large community rests on conservative prejudices detrimental to individuality, the more will the individual be morally and spiritually crushed, and, as a result, the one source of moral and spiritual progress for society is choked up.["The Assimilation of the Unconscious," ibid., par. 240.]
The individual standpoint is not antagonistic to collective norms, only differently oriented.
The individual way can never be directly opposed to the collective norm, because the opposite of the collective norm could only be another, but contrary, norm. But the individual way can, by definition, never be a norm. [”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 761.]

Jung believed that the survival of the individual within a group depended not only on psychological self-understanding, but also on the personal experience of a higher truth.
The individual will never find the real justification for his existence and his own spiritual and moral autonomy anywhere except in an extramundane principle capable of relativizing the overpowering influence of external factors. . . . For this he needs the evidence of inner, transcendent experience which alone can protect him from the otherwise inevitable submersion in the mass.[”The Undiscovered Self,” CW 10, par. 511.]
Resistance to the organized mass can be effected only by the man who is as well organized in his individuality as the mass itself. [Ibid., par. 540 (italics in original).]

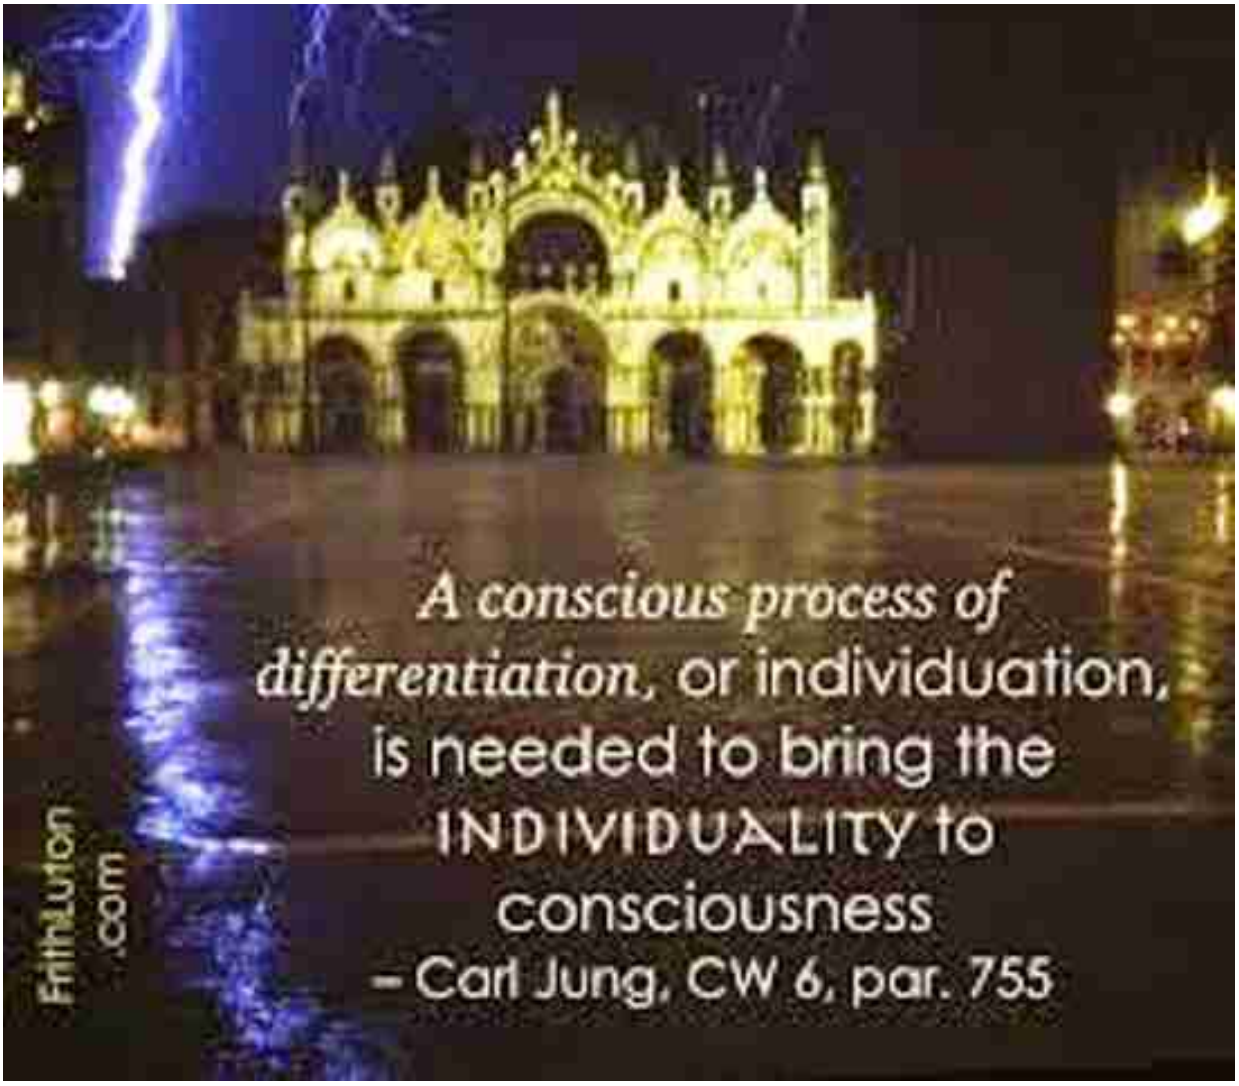
Carl Jung on “Individuality.” Lexicon (2015-05-09 05:17)



Individuality:
The qualities or characteristics that distinguish one person from another. (See also personality.)

By individuality I mean the peculiarity and singularity of the individual in every psychological respect. Everything that is not collective is individual, everything in fact that pertains only to one individual and not to a larger group of individuals.[”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 756.]

The psychological individual, or his individuality, has an a priori unconscious existence, but exists consciously only so far as a consciousness of his peculiar nature is present . . . . A conscious process of differentiation, or individuation, is needed to bring the individuality to consciousness, i.e., to raise it out of the state of identity with the object.[Ibid., par. 755.]

In the undifferentiated psyche, individuality is subjectively identified with the persona but is actually possessed by an inner, unrecognized aspect of oneself. In such cases, one’s individuality is commonly experienced in another person, through projection. If and when this situation becomes intolerable to the psyche, appropriate images appear in an attempt at compensation.

This . . . frequently gives rise in dreams to the symbol of psychic pregnancy, a symbol that goes back to the primordial image of the hero’s birth. The child that is to be born signifies the individuality, which, though present, is not yet conscious.[Ibid., par. 806.]

Carl Jung: ”All kinds of things lead me far away from my scientific endeavor...” (2015-05-09 05:42)

All kinds of things lead me far away from my scientific endeavor, which I thought I had subscribed to firmly I wanted to serve humanity through it, and now, my soul, you lead me to these new things.

Yes, it is the in-between world, the pathless, the manifold-dazzling.
I forgot that I had reached a new world, which had been alien to me previously I see neither way nor path.
What I believed about the soul has to become true here, namely that she knows her own way better, and that no intention can prescribe her a better one.
I feel that a large chunk of science has been broken off I suppose it must be like this, for the sake of the soul and her life.
I find the thought that this must occur only for me agonizing, and that perhaps no one will gain insight from my work.
But my soul demands this achievement. I should be able to do this just for myself without hope-for the sake of God.
This is truly a hard way
But what else did those anchorites of the first centuries of Christianity do?

And were they the worst or least capable of those living at the end?
Hardly; since they came to the most relentless conclusions with regard to the psychological necessity of their time. They left wife and child, wealth, glory and science-and turned toward the desert-for God's sake. So be it Carl Jung, The Black Book, Liber Novus, Footnote 44, Page 267

Carl Jung on “Individuation” Lexicon. (2015-05-10 04:44)

Carl Jung on “Individuation” Lexicon.
Individuation:
A process of psychological differentiation, having for its goal the development of the individual personality.
In general, it is the process by which individual beings are formed and differentiated; in particular, it is the development of the psychological individual as a being distinct from the general, collective psychology.[Ibid., par. 757.]
The aim of individuation is nothing less than to divest the self of the false wrappings of the persona on the one hand, and of the suggestive power of primordial images on the other.[”The Function of the Unconscious,” CW 7, par. 269.]
Individuation is a process informed by the archetypal ideal of wholeness, which in turn depends on a vital relationship between ego and unconscious. The aim is not to overcome one’s personal psychology, to become perfect, but to become familiar with it. Thus individuation involves an increasing awareness of one’s unique psychological reality, including personal strengths and limitations, and at the same time a deeper appreciation of humanity in general.
As the individual is not just a single, separate being, but by his very existence presupposes a collective relationship, it follows that the process of individuation must lead to more intense and broader collective relationships and not to isolation.[”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 758.]
Individuation does not shut one out from the world, but gathers the world to itself.[”On the Nature of the Psyche,” CW 8, par. 432.]
Individuation has two principle aspects: in the first place it is an internal and subjective process of integration, and in the second it is an equally indispensable process of objective relationship. Neither can exist without the other, although sometimes the one and sometimes the other predominates.[”The Psychology of the Transference,” CW 16, par. 448.]

Individuation and a life lived by collective values are nevertheless two divergent destinies. In Jung's view they are related to one another by guilt. Whoever embarks on the personal path becomes to some extent estranged from collective values, but does not thereby lose those aspects of the psyche which are inherently collective. To atone for this "desertion," the individual is obliged to create something of worth for the benefit of society.

Individuation cuts one off from personal conformity and hence from collectivity. That is the guilt which the individuant leaves behind him for the world, that is the guilt he must endeavor to redeem. He must offer a ransom in place of himself, that is, he must bring forth values which are an equivalent substitute for his absence in the collective personal sphere. Without this production of values, final individuation is immoral and-more than that-suicidal. . . . The individuant has no a priori claim to any kind of esteem. He has to be content with whatever esteem flows to him from outside by virtue of the values he creates. Not only has society a right, it also has a duty to condemn the individuant if he fails to create equivalent values.["Adaptation, Individuation, Collectivity," CW 18, pars. 1095f.]

Individuation differs from individualism in that the former deviates from collective norms but retains respect for them, while the latter eschews them entirely.

A real conflict with the collective norm arises only when an individual way is raised to a norm, which is the actual aim of extreme individualism. Naturally this aim is pathological and inimical to life. It has, accordingly, nothing to do with individuation, which, though it may strike out on an individual bypath, precisely on that account needs the norm for its orientation to society and for the vitally necessary relationship of the individual to society. Individuation, therefore, leads to a natural esteem for the collective norm. ["Definitions," CW 6, par. 761.]

The process of individuation, consciously pursued, leads to the realization of the self as a psychic reality greater than the ego. Thus individuation is essentially different from the process of simply becoming conscious.

The goal of the individuation process is the synthesis of the self. ["The Psychology of the Child Archetype," CW 9i, par. 278.]

Again and again I note that the individuation process is confused with the coming of the ego into consciousness and that the ego is in consequence identified with the self, which naturally produces a hopeless conceptual muddle. Individuation is then nothing but ego-centredness and autoeroticism. But the self comprises infinitely more than a mere ego, as the symbolism has shown from of old. It is as much one's self, and all other selves, as the ego.["On the Nature of the Psyche," CW 8, par. 432.]

In Jung's view, no one is ever completely individuated. While the goal is wholeness and a healthy working relationship with the self, the true value of individuation lies in what happens along the way.

The goal is important only as an idea; the essential thing is the opus which leads to the goal: that is the goal of a lifetime.["The Psychology of the Transference," CW 16, par. 400.]

Carl Jung on "Inferior Function." Lexicon. (2015-05-11 04:33)

Inferior function:
The least differentiated of the four psychological functions.
The inferior function is practically identical with the dark side of the human personality.["Concerning Rebirth," CW 9i, par. 222.]
In Jung's model of typology, the inferior or fourth function is opposite to the superior or primary function. Whether it operates in an introverted or extraverted way, it behaves like an autonomous complex; its activation is marked by affect and it resists integration.
The inferior function secretly and mischievously influences the superior function most of all, just as the latter represses the former most strongly.["The Phenomenology of the Spirit in Fairytales," ibid., par. 431.]
Positive as well as negative occurrences can constellate the inferior counter-function. When this happens, sensitiveness appears. Sensi-tiveness is a sure sign of of the presence of inferiority. This provides the psychological basis for discord and misunderstanding, not only as between two people, but also in ourselves. The essence of the inferior function is autonomy: it is independent, it attacks, it fascinates and so spins us about that we are no longer masters of ourselves and can no longer rightly distinguish between ourselves and others[”The Problem of the Attitude-Type,” CW 7, par. 85.]

The inferior function is always of the same nature, rational or irrational, as the primary function: when thinking is most developed, the other rational function, feeling, is inferior; if sensation is dominant, then intuition, the other irrational function, is the fourth function, and so on. This accords with general experience: the thinker is tripped up by feeling values; the practical sensation type gets into a rut, blind to the possibilities seen by intuition; the feeling type is deaf to logical thinking; and the intuitive, at home in the inner world, runs afoul of concrete reality.

One may be aware of the perceptions or judgments associated with the inferior function, but these are generally over-ridden by the superior function. Thinking types, for example, do not give their feelings much weight. Sensation types have intuitions, but they are not motivated by them. Similarly, feeling types brush away disturbing thoughts and intuitives ignore what is right in front of them.

Although the inferior function may be conscious as a phenomenon its true significance nevertheless remains unrecognized. It behaves like many repressed or insufficiently appreciated contents, which are partly conscious and partly unconscious . . . . Thus in normal cases the inferior function remains conscious, at least in its effects; but in a neurosis it sinks wholly or in part into the unconscious. [”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 764.]

To the extent that a person functions too one-sidedly, the inferior function becomes correspondingly primitive and troublesome. The overly dominant primary function takes energy away from the inferior function, which falls into the unconscious. There it is prone to be activated in an unnatural way, giving rise to infantile desires and other symptoms of imbalance. This is the situation in neurosis.

In order to extricate the inferior function from the unconscious by analysis, the unconscious fantasy formations that have now been activated must be brought to the surface. The conscious realization of these fantasies brings the inferior function to consciousness and makes further development possible.[Ibid., par. 764.]

When it becomes desirable or necessary to develop the inferior function, this can only happen gradually.

I have frequently observed how an analyst, confronted with a terrific thinking type, for instance, will do his utmost to develop the feeling function directly out of the unconscious. Such an attempt is foredoomed to failure, because it involves too great a violation of the conscious standpoint. Should the violation nevertheless be successful, a really compulsive dependence of the patient on the analyst ensues, a transference that can only be brutally terminated, because, having been left without a standpoint, the patient has made his standpoint the analyst. . . . [Therefore] in order to cushion the impact of the unconscious, an irrational type needs a stronger development of the rational auxiliary function present in consciousness [and vice versa].[”General Description of the Types,” ibid., par. 670.]

Attempts to assimilate the inferior function are usually accompanied by a deterioration in the primary function. The thinking type can’t write an essay, the sensation type gets lost and forgets appointments, the intuitive loses touch with possibilities, and the feeling type can’t decide what something’s worth.

And yet it is necessary for the development of character that we should allow the other side, the inferior function, to find expression. We cannot in the long run allow one part of our personality to be cared for symbiotically by another; for the moment when we might have need of the other function may come at any time and find us unprepared. [”The Problem of the Attitude-Type,” CW 7, par. 86.]

Carl Jung on ”Inflation.” Lexicon (2015-05-12 17:11)

Inflation:
A state of mind characterized by an exaggerated sense of self-importance, often compensated by feelings of inferiority. (See also mana-personality and negative inflation. Inflation, whether positive or negative, is a symptom of psychological possession, indicating the need to assimilate unconscious complexes or disidentify from the self.)

An inflated consciousness is always egocentric and conscious of nothing but its own existence. It is incapable of learning from the past, incapable of understanding contemporary events, and incapable of drawing right conclusions about the future. It is hypnotized by itself and therefore cannot be argued with. It inevitably dooms itself to calamities that must strike it dead. Paradoxically enough, inflation is a regression of consciousness into unconsciousness. This always happens when consciousness takes too many unconscious contents upon itself and loses the faculty of discrimination, the sine qua non of all consciousness.[”Epilogue,” CW 12, par. 563.]
[Inflation] should not be interpreted as . . . conscious self-aggrandizement. Such is far from being the rule. In general we are not directly conscious of this condition at all, but can at best infer its existence indirectly from the symptoms. These include the reactions of our immediate environment. Inflation magnifies the blind spot in the eye.[”The Self,” CW 9ii, par. 44.]

Carl Jung on “Instinct.” Lexicon (2015-05-12 17:18)

Carl Jung on “Instinct.” Lexicon
Instinct:
An involuntary drive toward certain activities.
All psychic processes whose energies are not under conscious control are instinctive.[”Definitions,””CW 6, par. 765.]
Instincts in their original strength can render social adaptation almost impossible.[”The Transcendent Function,” CW 8, par. 161.]
Instinct is not an isolated thing, nor can it be isolated in practice. It always brings in its train archetypal contents of a spiritual nature, which are at once its foundation and its limitation. In other words, an instinct is always and inevitably coupled with something like a philosophy of life, however archaic, unclear, and hazy this may be. Instinct stimulates thought, and if a man does not think of his own free will, then you get compulsive thinking, for the two poles of the psyche, the physiological and the mental, are indissolubly connected. [”Psychotherapy and a Philosophy of Life,” CW 16, par. 185.]
Psychic processes which ordinarily are consciously controlled can become instinctive when imbued with unconscious energy. This is liable to occur when the level of consciousness is low, due to fatigue, intoxication, depression, etc. Conversely, instincts can be modified according to the extent that they are civilized and under con-scious control, a process Jung called psychization.

An instinct which has undergone too much psychization can take its revenge in the form of an autonomous complex. This is one of the chief causes of neurosis.[”Psychological Factors in Human Behaviour,” CW 8, par. 255.]

Too much of the animal distorts the civilized man, too much civilization makes sick animals.[”The Eros Theory,” CW 7, par. 32.]

Jung identified five prominent groups of instinctive factors: creativity, reflection, activity, sexuality and hunger. Hunger is a primary instinct of self-preservation, perhaps the most fundamental of all drives. Sexuality is a close second, particularly prone to psychization, which makes it possible to divert its purely biological energy into other channels. The urge to activity manifests in travel, love of change, restlessness and play. Under reflection, Jung included the religious urge and the search for meaning. Creativity was for Jung in a class by itself. His descriptions of it refer specifically to the impulse to create art.

Though we cannot classify it with a high degree of accuracy, the creative instinct is something that deserves special mention. I do not know if ”instinct” is the correct word. We use the term ”creative instinct” because this factor behaves at least dynamically, like an instinct. Like instinct it is compulsive, but it is not common, and it is not a fixed and invariably inherited organization. Therefore I prefer to designate the creative impulse as a psychic factor similar in nature to instinct, having indeed a very close connection with the instincts, but without being identical with any one of them. Its connections with sexuality are a much discussed problem and, furthermore, it has much in common with the drive to activity and the reflective instinct. But it can also suppress them, or make them serve it to the point of the self-destruction of the individual. Creation is as much destruction as construction.[”Psychological Factors in Human Behaviour,” CW 8, par. 245.]

Jung also believed that true creativity could only be enhanced by the analytic process.

Creative power is mightier than its possessor. If it is not so, then it is a feeble thing, and given favourable conditions will nourish an endearing talent, but no more. If, on the other hand, it is a neurosis, it often takes only a word or a look for the illusion to go up in smoke. . . . Disease has never yet fostered creative work; on the contrary, it is the most formidable obstacle to creation. No breaking down of repressions can ever destroy true creativeness, just as no analysis can ever exhaust the unconscious.[”Analytical Psychology and Education,” CW 17, par. 206.]

Instinct and archetype are a pair of opposites, inextricably linked and therefore often difficult to tell apart.

Psychic processes seem to be balances of energy flowing between spirit and instinct, though the question of whether a process is to be described as spiritual or as instinctual remains shrouded in darkness. Such evaluation or interpretation depends entirely upon the standpoint or state of the conscious mind.”[On the Nature of the Psyche,” CW 8, par. 407.]

When consciousness become overspiritualized, straying too far from its instinctual foundation, self-regulating processes within the psyche become active in an attempt to correct the balance. This is often signaled in dreams by animal symbols, particularly snakes.

The snake is the representative of the world of instinct, especially of those vital processes which are psychologically the least accessible of all. Snake dreams always indicate a discrepancy between the attitude of the conscious mind and instinct, the snake being a personification of the threatening aspect of that conflict.[”The Sacrifice,” CW 5, par. 615.]

Carl Jung on “Introjection.” Lexicon (2015-05-13 04:51)

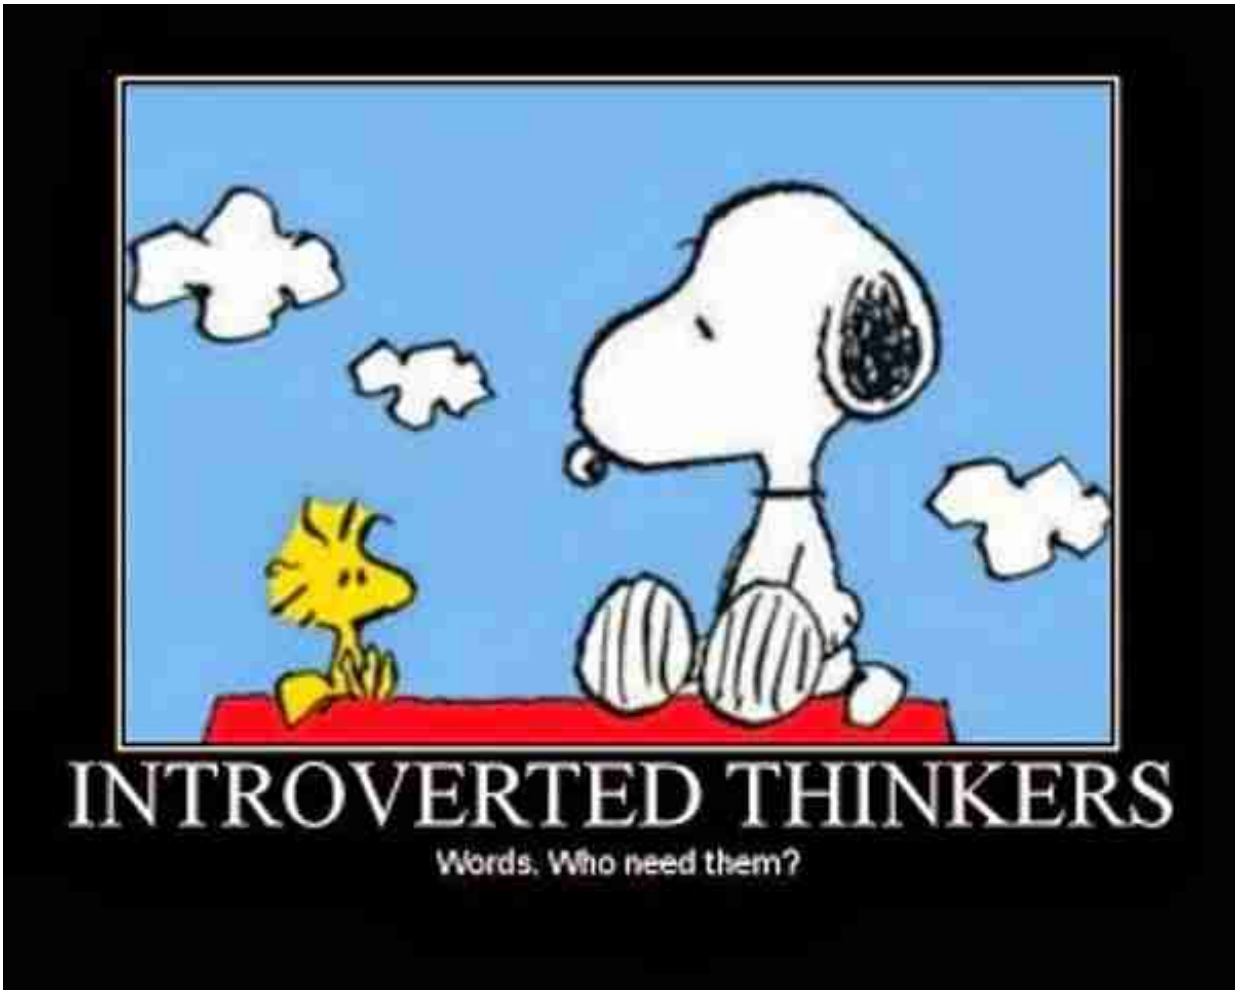
Carl Jung on “Introjection.” Lexicon
Introjection:
A process of assimilation of object to subject, the opposite of projection.
Introjection is a process of extraversion, since assimilation to the object requires empathy and an investment of the object with libido. A passive and an active introjection may be distinguished: transference phenomena in the treatment of the neuroses belong to the former category, and, in general, all cases where the object exercises a compelling influence on the subject, while empathy as a process of adaptation belongs to the latter category.[”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 768.]

Carl Jung on ”Introversion.” (2015-05-14 05:09)



In a large gathering he feels lonely and lost.
The more crowded it is, the greater becomes his resistance.
He is not in the least ”with it” and has no love of enthusiastic get-togethers. He is not a good mixer.
What he does, he does in his own way, barricading himself against influences from outside. . . .
Under normal conditions he is pessimistic and worried, because the world and human beings are not in the least good but crush him. . . .
His own world is a safe harbour, a carefully tended and walled-in garden, closed to the public and hidden from prying eyes.
His own company is the best. Carl Jung, CW 6, pars. 976f.

Carl Jung on ”Introversion.” (2015-05-14 05:16)

Introversion:
A mode of psychological orientation where the movement of energy is toward the inner world. (Compare extraversion.)
Everyone whose attitude is introverted thinks, feels, and acts in a way that clearly demonstrates that the subject is the prime motivating factor and that the object is of secondary importance. [Ibid., par. 769.]
Always he has to prove that everything he does rests on his own decisions and convictions, and never because he is influenced by anyone, or desires to please or conciliate some person or opinion.[”Psychological Types,” CW 6, par. 893.]

An introverted consciousness can be well aware of external conditions, but is not motivated by them. The extreme introvert responds primarily to internal impressions.

In a large gathering he feels lonely and lost. The more crowded it is, the greater becomes his resistance. He is not in the least ”with it” and has no love of enthusiastic get-togethers. He is not a good mixer. What he does, he does in his own way, barricading himself against influences from outside. . . . Under normal conditions he is pessimistic and worried, because the world and human beings are not in the least good but crush him. . . .His own world is a safe harbour, a carefully tended and walled-in garden, closed to the public and hidden from prying eyes. His own company is the best.[”Psychological Typology,” ibid., pars. 976f.]

Signs of introversion in a child are a reflective, thoughtful manner and resistance to outside influences.

The child wants his own way, and under no circumstances will he submit to an alien rule he cannot understand. When he asks questions, it is not from curiosity or a desire to create a sensation, but because he wants names, meanings, explanations to give him subjective protection against the object.[”Psychological Types,” ibid., par. 897.]

The introverted attitude tends to devalue things and other persons, to deny their importance. Hence, by way of compensation, extreme introversion leads to an unconscious reinforcement of the object’s influence. This makes itself felt as a tie, with concomitant emotional reactions, to outer circumstances or another person.

The individual’s freedom of mind is fettered by the ignominy of his financial dependence, his freedom of action trembles in the face of public opinion, his moral superiority collapses in a morass of inferior relationships, and his desire to dominate ends in a pitiful craving to be loved. It is now the unconscious that takes care of the relation to the object, and it does so in a way that is calculated to bring the illusion of power and the fantasy of superiority to utter ruin.[”General Description of the Types,” ibid., par. 626.]

A person in this situation can be worn out from fruitless attempts to impose his or her will.

These efforts are constantly being frustrated by the overwhelming impressions received from the object. It continually imposes itself on him against his will, it arouses in him the most disagreeable and intractable affects and persecutes him at every step. A tremendous inner struggle is needed all the time in order to ”keep going.” The typical form his neurosis takes is psychasthenia, a malady characterized on the one hand by extreme sensitivity and on the other by great proneness to exhaustion and chronic fatigue.[Ibid.]

In less extreme cases, introverts are simply more conservative than not, preferring the familiar surroundings of home and intimate times with a few close friends; they husband their energy and would rather stay put than go from place to place. Their best work is done on their own resources, on their own initiative and in their own way.

His retreat into himself is not a final renunciation of the world, but a search for quietude, where alone it is possible for him to make his contribution to the life of the community.[”Psychological Typology,” ibid., par. 979.]

Carl Jung on ”Intuition.” Lexicon (2015-05-15 04:46)

Intuition:
The psychic function that perceives possibilities inherent in the present. (Compare sensation.)
Intuition gives outlook and insight; it revels in the garden of magical possibilities as if they were real.[”The Psychology of the Transference,” CW 16, par. 492.]
In Jung’s model of typology, intuition, like sensation, is an irrational function because its apprehension of the world is based on the perception of given facts. Unlike sensation, however, it perceives via the unconscious and is not dependent on concrete reality.
In intuition a content presents itself whole and complete, without our being able to explain or discover how this content came into existence. Intuition is a kind of instinctive apprehension, no matter of what contents. . . . Intuitive knowledge possesses an intrinsic certainty and conviction.[”Definitions” CW 6, par. 770.]
Intuition may receive information from within (for instance, as a flash of insight of unknown origin), or be stimulated by what is going on in someone else.
The first is a perception of unconscious psychic data originating in the subject, the second is a perception of data dependent on subliminal perceptions of the object and on the feelings and thoughts they evoke.[Ibid., par. 771.]
http://www.nyaap.org/jung-lexicon/i/

Carl Jung on "Irrational." Lexicon. (2015-05-15 16:45)

Irrational:
Not grounded in reason. (Compare rational.)
Jung pointed out that elementary existential facts fall into this category-for instance, that the earth has a moon, that chlorine is an element or that water freezes at a certain temperature and reaches its greatest density at four degrees centigrade-as does chance. They are irrational not because they are illogical, but because they are beyond reason.
In Jung's model of typology, the psychological functions of intuition and sensation are described as irrational.
Both intuition and sensation are functions that find fulfilment in the absolute perception of the flux of events. Hence, by their very nature, they will react to every possible occurrence and be attuned to the absolutely contingent, and must therefore lack all rational direction. For this reason I call them irrational functions, as opposed to thinking and feeling, which find fulfilment only when they are in complete harmony with the laws of reason.[Ibid., pars. 776f.]
Merely because [irrational types] subordinate judgment to perception, it would be quite wrong to regard them as "unreasonable." It wouldbe truer to say that they are in the highest degree empirical. They base themselves entirely on experience. ["General Description of the Types," ibid., par. 616.]

Carl Jung on ”Kore.” Lexicon (2015-05-16 00:16)

Carl Jung on “Kore.” Lexicon
Kore:

6732

In Greek mythology, a term for the personification of feminine innocence (e.g., Persephone); psychologically, in man or wom-an, it refers to an archetypal image of potential renewal.

The phenomenology of the Kore is essentially bipolar (as is that of any archetype), associated with the mother-maiden dyad. When observed in the products of a woman's unconscious, it is an image of the supraordinate personality or self. In a man, the Kore is an aspect of the anima and partakes in all the symbolism attached to his inner personality.

As a matter of practical observation, the Kore often appears in woman as an unknown young girl . . . . The maiden's helplessness exposes her to all sorts of dangers, for instance of being devoured by reptiles or ritually slaughtered like a beast of sacrifice. Often there are bloody, cruel, and even obscene orgies to which the innocent child falls victim. Sometimes it is a true nekyia, a descent into Hades and a quest for the "treasure hard to attain," occasionally connected with orgiastic sexual rites or offerings of menstrual blood to the moon. Oddly enough, the various tortures and obscenities are carried out by an "Earth Mother." . . . The maiden who crops up in case histories differs not inconsiderably from the vaguely flower-like Kore in that the modern figure is more sharply delineated and not nearly so "unconscious."["The Psychological Aspects of the Kore," CW 9i, par. 311.]

Demeter and Kore, mother and daughter, extend the feminine consciousness both upwards and downwards. They add an "older and younger," "stronger and weaker" dimension to it and widen out the narrowly limited conscious mind bound in space and time, giving it intimations of a greater and more comprehensive personality which has a share in the eternal course of things. . . . We could therefore say that every mother contains her daughter in herself and every daughter her mother, and that every woman extends backwards into her mother and forwards into her daughter. . . . The conscious experience of these ties produces the feeling that her life is spread out over generations-the first step towards the immediate experience and conviction of being outside time, which brings with it a feeling of immortality.[Ibid., par. 316.]

http://www.nyaap.org/jung-lexicon/k/

Carl Jung on “Libido.” Lexicon. (2015-05-17 04:51)

Libido:
Psychic energy in general.
Libido can never be apprehended except in a definite form; that is to say, it is identical with fantasy-images. And we can only release it from the grip of the unconscious by bringing up the corresponding fantasy-images.[”The Technique of Differentiation,” CW 7, par. 345.]
Jung specifically distanced his concept of libido from that of Freud, for whom it had a predominantly sexual meaning.
All psychological phenomena can be considered as manifestations of energy, in the same way that all physical phenomena have been understood as energic manifestations ever since Robert Mayer discovered the law of the conservation of energy. Subjectively and psychologically, this energy is conceived as desire. I call it libido, using the word in its original sense, which is by no means only sexual.[”Psychoanalysis and Neurosis,” CW 4, par. 567.]
[Libido] denotes a desire or impulse which is unchecked by any kind of authority, moral or otherwise. Libido is appetite in its natural state. From the genetic point of view it is bodily needs like hunger, thirst, sleep, and sex, and emotional states or affects, which constitute the essence of libido.[”The Concept of Libido,” CW 5, par. 194.]
In line with his belief that the psyche is a self-regulating system, Jung associated libido with intentionality. It ”knows” where it ought to go for the overall health of the psyche.
The libido has, as it were, a natural penchant: it is like water, which must have a gradient if it is to flow.[”Symbols of the Mother and of Rebirth,” ibid., par. 337.]
Where there is a lack of libido (depression), it has backed up (re-gressed) in order to stir up unconscious contents, the aim being to compensate the attitudes of consciousness. What little energy is left resists being applied in a consciously chosen direction.
It does not lie in our power to transfer ”disposable” energy at will to a rationally chosen object. The same is true in general of the apparently disposable energy which is disengaged when we have destroyed its unserviceable forms through the corrosive of reductive analysis. [It] can at best be applied voluntarily for only a short time. But in most cases it refuses to seize hold, for any length of time, of the possibilities rationally presented to it. Psychic energy is a very fastidious thing which insists on fulfilment of its own conditions. However much energy may be present, we cannot make it serviceable until we have succeeded in finding the right gradient.["The Problem of the Attitude-Type," CW 7, par. 76]

The analytic task in such a situation is to discover the natural gradient of the person's energy.
What is it, at this moment and in this individual, that represents the natural urge of life? That is the question.["The Structure of the Unconscious," ibid., par. 488.]

The principle of logic and structure, traditionally associated with spirit, the father world and the God-image.
There is no consciousness without discrimination of opposites. This is the paternal principle, the Logos, which eternally struggles to extricate itself from the primal warmth and primal darkness of the maternal womb; in a word, from unconsciousness.["Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype," CW 9i, par. 178.]
In Jung's earlier writings, he intuitively equated masculine consciousness with the concept of Logos and feminine consciousness with that of Eros. Either one could be dominant in a particular man or woman, due to the contrasexual complexes.
By Logos I meant discrimination, judgment, insight, and by Eros I meant the capacity to relate. I regarded both concepts as intuitive ideas which cannot be defined accurately or exhaustively. From the scientific point of view this is regrettable, but from a practical one it has its value, since the two concepts mark out a field of experience which it is equally difficult to define.

As we can hardly ever make a psychological proposition without immediately having to reverse it, instances to the contrary leap to the eye at once: men who care nothing for discrimination, judgment, and insight, and women who display an almost excessively masculine proficiency in this respect. . . . Wherever this exists, we find a forcible intrusion of the unconscious, a corresponding exclusion of the consciousness specific to either sex, predominance of the shadow and of contrasexuality.[”The Personification of the Opposites,” CW 14, pars. 224f.]
In his later writing on alchemy, Jung described Logos and Eros as psychologically equivalent to solar and lunar consciousness, arche-typal ideas analogous to the Eastern concepts of yang and yin-different qualities of energy. This did not change his view that Eros was more ”specific” to feminine consciousness and Logos to masculine. Hence he attributed Eros in a man to the influence of the anima, and Logos in a woman to that of the animus.
In a man it is the lunar anima, in a woman the solar animus, that influences consciousness in the highest degree. Even if a man is often unaware of his own anima-possession, he has, understandably enough, all the more vivid an impression of the animus-possession of his wife, and vice versa. [Ibid., par. 225.]

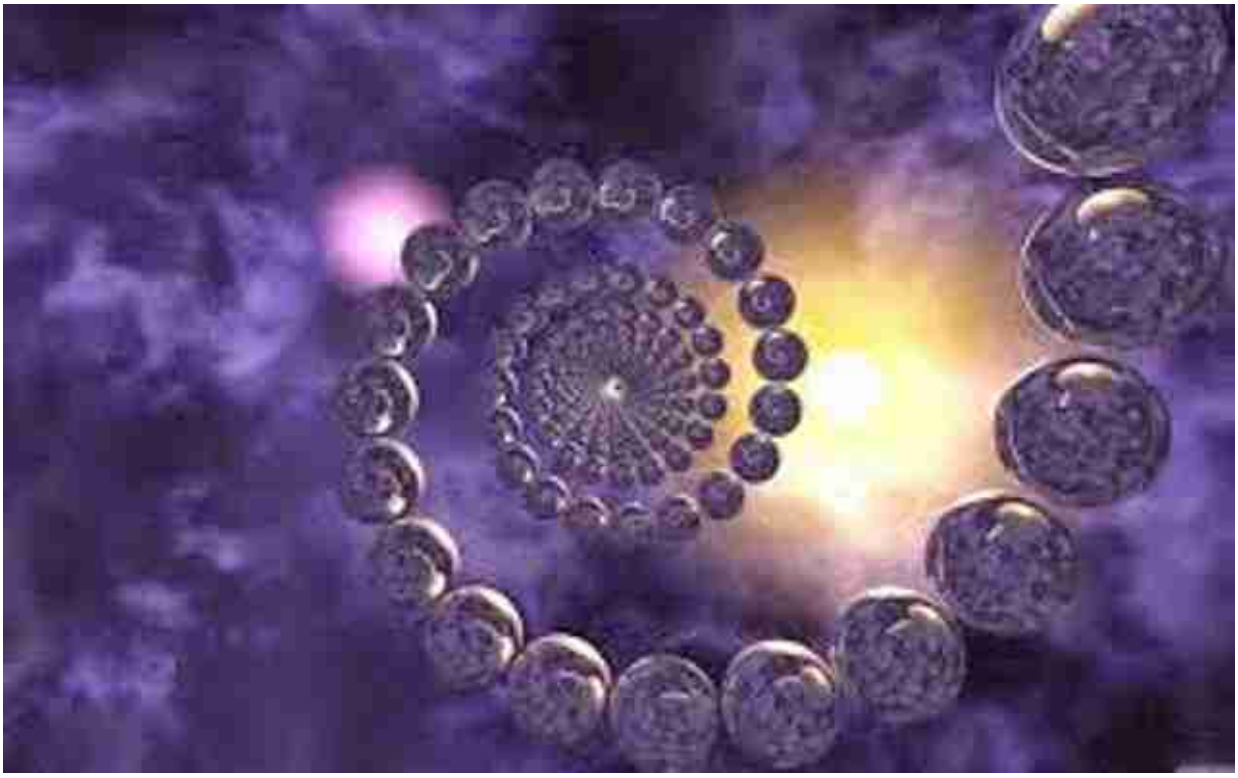
Carl Jung on “Loss of Soul.” Lexicon (2015-05-18 17:29)



Loss of soul:
A concept borrowed from anthropology, referring psychologically to a state of general malaise.
The peculiar condition covered by this term is accounted for in the mind of the primitive by the supposition that a soul has gone off, just like a dog that runs away from his master overnight. It is then the task of the medicine man to fetch the fugitive back. . . . Some-thing similar can happen to civilized man, only he does not describe it as ”loss of soul” but as an ”abaissement du niveau mental.”[”Concerning Rebirth,” CW 9i, par. 213.]

Carl Jung on "Mana Personality." Lexicon (2015-05-19 04:43)

Mana-personality:
A personified archetypal image of a supernatural force.
The mana-personality is a dominant of the collective unconscious, the well-known archetype of the mighty man in the form of hero, chief, magician, medicine-man, saint, the ruler of men and spirits, the friend of God.["The Mana-Personality," CW 7, par. 377.]
Historically, the mana-personality evolves into the hero and the godlike being, whose earthly form is the priest. How very much the doctor is still mana is the whole plaint of the analyst![Ibid., par. 389.]
Mana is a Melanesian word referring to a bewitching or numinous quality in gods and sacred objects. A mana-personality embodies this magical power. In individual psychology, Jung used it to describe the inflationary effect of assimilating autonomous unconscious contents, particularly those associated with anima and animus.
The ego has appropriated something that does not belong to it. But how has it appropriated the mana?
If it was really the ego that conquered the anima, then the mana does indeed belong to it, and it would be correct to conclude that one has become important.
But why does not this importance, the mana, work upon others?
. . . It does not work because one has not in fact become important, but has merely become adulterated with an archetype, another unconscious figure.
Hence we must conclude that the ego never conquered the anima at all and therefore has not acquired the mana. All that has happened is a new adulteration. [Ibid., par. 380.]

Carl Jung on "Meditation." Lexicon (2015-05-19 14:48)

Meditation:
A technique of focused introspection.
Jung distinguished between meditation practiced in the East or in traditional Western religious exercises, and its use as a tool for self-understanding, particularly in the realization of projections.
If the ancient art of meditation is practised at all today, it is practised only in religious or philosophical circles, where a theme is subjectively chosen by the meditant or prescribed by an instructor, as in the Ignatian Exercitia or in certain theosophical exercises that developed under Indian influence.
These methods are of value only for increasing concentration and consolidating consciousness, but have no significance as regards affecting a synthesis of the personality. On the contrary, their purpose is to shield consciousness from the unconscious and to suppress it.["The Conjunction," CW 14, par. 708.]
When meditation is concerned with the objective products of the unconscious that reach consciousness spontaneously, it unites the conscious with contents that proceed not from a conscious causal chain but from an essentially unconscious process. . . .
Part of the unconscious contents is projected, but the projection as such is not recognized. Meditation or critical introspection and objective investigation of the object are needed in order to establish the existence of projections.
If the individual is to take stock of himself it is essential that his projections should be recognized, because they falsify the nature of the object and besides this contain items which belong to his own personality and should be integrated with it.[Ibid., par. 710.]

Carl Jung on “Mother Complex.” Lexicon. (2015-05-20 04:31)

Mother complex:
A group of feeling-toned ideas associated with the experience and image of mother.
The mother complex is a potentially active component of everyone's psyche, informed first of all by experience of the personal mother, then by significant contact with other women and by collective assumptions. The constellation of a mother complex has differing effects according to whether it appears in a son or a daughter.
Typical effects on the son are homosexuality and Don Juanism, and sometimes also impotence [though here the father complex also plays a part]. In homosexuality, the son's entire heterosexuality is tied to the mother in an unconscious form; in Don Juanism, he unconsciously seeks his mother in every woman he meets.["Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype," CW 9i, par. 162.]
A man's mother complex is influenced by the contrasexual complex, the anima. To the extent that a man establishes a good relationship with his inner woman (instead of being possessed by her), even a negative mother complex may have positive effects.
[He] may have a finely differentiated Eros instead of, or in addition to, homosexuality. . . . This gives him a great capacity for friendship, which often creates ties of astonishing tenderness between men and may even rescue friendship between the sexes from the limbo of the impossible. . . .In the same way, what in its negative aspect is Don Juanism can appear positively as bold and resolute manliness; ambitious striving after the highest goals; opposition to all stupidity, narrow-mindedness, injustice, and laziness; willingness to make sacrifices for what is regarded as right, sometimes bordering on heroism; perseverance, inflexibility and toughness of will; a curiosity that does not shrink even from the riddles of the universe; and finally, a revolutionary spirit which strives to put a new face upon the world.[Ibid., pars 164f.]
In the daughter, the effect of the mother complex ranges from stimulation of the feminine instinct to its inhibition. In the first case, the preponderance of instinct makes the woman unconscious of her own personality.
The exaggeration of the feminine side means an intensification of all female instincts, above all the maternal instinct. The negative aspect is seen in the woman whose only goal is childbirth. To her the husband is . . . first and foremost the instrument of procreation, and she regards him merely as an object to be looked after, along with children, poor relations, cats, dogs, and household furniture.[Ibid., par. 167.]
In the second case, the feminine instinct is inhibited or wiped out altogether.
As a substitute, an overdeveloped Eros results, and this almost invariably leads to an unconscious incestuous relationship with the father. The intensified Eros places an abnormal emphasis on the personality of others. Jealousy of the mother and the desire to outdo her become the leitmotifs of subsequent undertakings.[Ibid., par. 168.]
Alternatively, the inhibition of the feminine instinct may lead a woman to identify with her mother. She is then unconscious of both her own maternal instinct and her Eros, which are then projected onto the mother.
As a sort of superwoman (admired involuntarily by the daughter), the mother lives out for her beforehand all that the girl might have lived for herself. She is content to cling to her mother in selfless devotion, while at the same time unconsciously striving, almost against her will, to tyrannize over her, naturally under the mask of complete loyalty and devotion. The daughter leads a shadow-existence, often visibly sucked dry by her mother, and she prolongs her mother's life by a sort of continuous blood transfusion.[Ibid., par. 169.]
Because of their apparent "emptiness," these women are good hooks for men's projections. As devoted and self-sacrificing wives, they often project their own unconscious gifts onto their husbands.
And then we have the spectacle of a totally insignificant man who seemed to have no chance whatsoever suddenly soaring as if on a magic carpet to the highest summits of achievement.[Ibid., par. 182.]
In Jung's view, these three extreme types are linked together by many intermediate stages, the most important being where there is an overwhelming resistance to the mother and all she stands for.
It is the supreme example of the negative mother-complex. The motto of this type is: Anything, so long as it is not like Mother! . . . All instinctive processes meet with unexpected difficulties; either sexuality does not function properly, or the children are unwanted, or maternal duties seem unbearable, or the demands of marital life are responded to with impatience and irritation.[Ibid., par. 170.]
Such a woman often excels in Logos activities, where her mother has no place. If she can overcome her merely reactive attitude toward reality, she may later in life come to a deeper appreciation of her femininity.
Thanks to her lucidity, objectivity, and masculinity, a woman of this type is frequently found in important positions in which her tardily discovered maternal quality, guided by a cool intelligence, exerts a most beneficial influence. This rare combination of womanliness and masculine understanding proves valuable in the realm of intimate relationships as well as in practical matters.[Ibid., par. 186.]

At the core of any mother complex is the mother archetype, which means that behind emotional associations with the personal mother, both in men and in women, there is a collective image of nourishment and security on the one hand (the positive mother), and devouring possessiveness on the other (the negative mother).

Carl Jung on "Myth." Lexicon (2015-05-21 05:01)

Myth:
An involuntary collective statement based on an unconscious psychic experience.
The primitive mentality does not invent myths, it experiences them. Myths are original revelations of the preconscious psyche . . . . Many of these unconscious processes may be indirectly occasioned by consciousness, but never by conscious choice. Others appear to arise spontaneously, that is to say, from no discernible or demonstrable conscious cause.["The Psychology of the Child Archetype," par. 261.]
http://www.nyaap.org/jung-lexicon/m/

Carl Jung on "Neurosis." Lexicon (2015-05-22 04:32)

Neurosis:
A psychological crisis due to a state of disunity with oneself, or, more formally, a mild dissociation of the personality due to the activation of complexes. (See also adaptation, conflict and self-regulation of the psyche.)
Any incompatibility of character can cause dissociation, and too great a split between the thinking and the feeling function, for instance, is already a slight neurosis. When you are not quite at one with yourself . . . you are approaching a neurotic condition.["The Tavistock Lectures," CW 18, par. 383.]
Every neurosis is characterized by dissociation and conflict, contains complexes, and shows traces of regression and abaissement.["Analytical Psychology and Education," CW 17, par. 204.]
Jung's view was that an outbreak of neurosis is purposeful, an opportunity to become conscious of who we are as opposed to who we think we are. By working through the symptoms that invariably accompany neurosis-anxiety, fear, depression, guilt and particularly conflict-we become aware of our limitations and discover our true strengths.
In many cases we have to say, "Thank heaven he could make up his mind to be neurotic." Neurosis is really an attempt at self-cure. . . . It is an attempt of the self-regulating psychic system to restore the balance, in no way different from the function of dreams-only rather more forceful and drastic.["The Tavistock Lectures," CW 18, par. 389.]
I myself have known more than one person who owed his entire usefulness and reason for existence to a neurosis, which prevented all the worst follies in his life and forced him to a mode of living that developed his valuable potentialities. These might have been stifled had not the neurosis, with iron grip, held him to the place where he belonged. ["The Problem of the Attitude-Type," CW 7, par. 68.]
In any breakdown in conscious functioning, energy regresses and unconscious contents are activated in an attempt to compensate the one-sidedness of consciousness.
Neuroses, like all illnesses, are symptoms of maladjustment. Be-cause of some obstacle-a constitutional weakness or defect, wrong education, bad experiences, an unsuitable attitude, etc.-one shrinks from the difficulties which life brings and thus finds oneself back in the world of the infant. The unconscious compensates this regression by producing symbols which, when understood objectively, that is, by means of comparative research, reactivate general ideas that underlie all such natural systems of thought. In this way a change of attitude is brought about which bridges the dissociation between man as he is and man as he ought to be. ["The Philosophical Tree," CW 13, par. 473.]
Jung called his attitude toward neurosis energic or final since it was based on the potential progression of energy rather than causal or mechanistic reasons for its regression. The two views are not incompatible but rather complementary: the mechanistic approach looks to the past for the cause of psychic discomfort in the present; Jung focused on the present with an eye to future possibilities.

I no longer seek the cause of a neurosis in the past, but in the present. I ask, what is the necessary task which the patient will not accomplish?["Psychoanalysis and Neurosis," CW4, par. 570.]

In psychic disturbances it is by no means sufficient in all cases merely to bring the supposed or real causes to consciousness. The treatment involves the integration of contents that have become dissociated from consciousness.["The Philosophical Tree," CW 13, par. 464.]

Jung did not dispute Freudian theory that Oedipal fixations can manifest as neurosis in later life. He acknowledged that certain periods in life, and particularly infancy, often have a permanent and determining influence on the personality. But he found this to be an insufficient explanation for those cases in which there was no trace of neurosis until the time of the breakdown.

Freud's sexual theory of neurosis is grounded on a true and factual principle. But it makes the mistake of being one-sided and exclusive; also it commits the imprudence of trying to lay hold of unconfinable Eros with the crude terminology of sex. In this respect Freud is a typical representative of the materialistic epoch, whose hope it was to solve the world riddle in a test-tube.["The Eros Theory," CW 7, par. 33.]

If the fixation were indeed real [i.e., the primary cause] we should expect to find its influence constant; in other words, a neurosis lasting throughout life. This is obviously not the case. The psychological determination of a neurosis is only partly due to an early infantile predisposition; it must be due to some cause in the present as well. And if we carefully examine the kind of infantile fantasies and occurrences to which the neurotic is attached, we shall be obliged to agree that there is nothing in them that is specifically neurotic. Normal individuals have pretty much the same inner and outer experiences, and may be attached to them to an astonishing degree without developing a neurosis.["Psychoanalysis and Neurosis," CW4, par. 564.]

What then determines why one person becomes neurotic while another, in similar circumstances, does not? Jung's answer is that the individual psyche knows both its limits and its potential. If the former are being exceeded, or the latter not realized, a breakdown occurs. The psyche itself acts to correct the situation.

There are vast masses of the population who, despite their notorious unconsciousness, never get anywhere near a neurosis. The few who are smitten by such a fate are really persons of the "higher" type who, for one reason or another, have remained too long on a primitive level. Their nature does not in the long run tolerate persistence in what is for them an unnatural torpor. As a result of their narrow conscious outlook and their cramped existence they save energy; bit by bit it accumulates in the unconscious and finally explodes in the form of a more or less acute neurosis.["The Function of the Unconscious," CW 7, par. 291.]

Jung's view of neurosis differs radically from the classical reductive approach, but it does not substantially change what happens in analysis. Activated fantasies still have to be brought to light, because the energy needed for life is attached to them. The object, however, is not to reveal a supposed root cause of the neurosis but to establish a connection between consciousness and the unconscious that will result in the renewed progression of energy.

Carl Jung on "Suicide." (2015-05-22 21:00)

Carl Jung's to "Mrs. N.", a 47 year old woman concerned about the impact of her suicide attempt at age 21. This statement is contained in a letter dated 13 October 1951.

"It isn't possible to kill part of your "self" unless you kill yourself first. If you ruin your conscious personality, the so-called ego-personality, you deprive the self of its real goal, namely to become real itself. The goal of life is the realization of the self. If you kill yourself you abolish that will of the self to become real, but it may arrest your personal development inasmuch it is not explained. You ought to realise that suicide is murder, since after suicide there remains a corpse exactly as with any ordinary murder. Only it is yourself that has been killed." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 2, Page 25. Carl Jung in a Letter wrote dated 10 July, 1946, to a correspondent regarding suicide.

"The idea of suicide, understandable as it is, does not seem commendable to me. We live in order to gain the greatest possible amount of spiritual development and self-awareness. As long as life is possible, even if only in a minimal degree, you should hang onto it, in order to scoop it up for the purpose of conscious development. To interrupt life before its time is to bring to a standstill an experiment which we have not set up. We have found ourselves in the midst of it and must carry it through to the end." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, 1973, Page 434.

(25 July, 1946) Carl Jung in a letter to Eleanor Bertine concerning Kristine Mann's death dated 25 July 1946.

"It is really a question whether a person affected by such a terrible illness should or may end her life. It is my attitude in such cases not to interfere. I would let things happen as they were so, because I'm convinced that if anybody has it in himself to commit suicide, then practically the whole of his being is going that way. I have seen cases where it would have been something short of criminal to hinder the people because according to all rules it was in accordance with the tendency of their unconscious and thus the basic thing. So I think nothing is really gained by interfering with such an issue. It is presumably to be left to the free choice of the individual. Anything that seems to be wrong to us can be right under certain circumstances over which we have no control and then end of which we do not understand. If Kristine Mann had committed suicide under the stress of unbearable pain, I should have thought that this was the right thing. As it was not the case, I think it was in her stars to undergo such a cruel agony for reasons that escape out understanding. Our life is not made entirely by ourselves. The main bulk of it is brought into existence out of sources that are hidden to us. Even complexes can start a century or more before a man is born. There is something like karma." Carl (Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 435-436.

Carl Jung to a terminally ill person 19 Nov. 1955.

"The reason for such an "unreasonable" attitude with me is that I am not at all sure what will happen to me after death. I have good reasons to assume that things are not finished with death. Life seems to be an interlude in a long story." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 279.

Letter from Carl Jung to Alice Lewisohn Crowley suggesting Suicide:

My Dear Mrs. Crowley,

I begin to feel my age and whenever I get a bit too tired I also feel my heart and that is decidedly disagreeable and makes me cross with the whole world, which is damnable anyhow. I went through a period of black depression during the first 4 days. Only yesterday I began to feel human again. And then your situation in Europe came back to me with a bang!

I beg you to consider your life. If they are going to send you to Poland, you only can suicide yourself. Please forgive this crudeness! It is my anxiety for your life which makes me say such things. Remember, I warned you before America went to war. It is urgent that you do something and quick! Europe is in a desperate situation.

I am sorry and I am helpless.

Yours affectionately, C.G. Jung

Carl Jung "Night Sea Journey." Lexicon (2015-05-24 04:03)

Night sea journey:
An archetypal motif in mythology, psychologically associated with depression and the loss of energy characteristic of neurosis.
The night sea journey is a kind of descensus ad inferos–a descent into Hades and a journey to the land of ghosts somewhere beyond this world, beyond consciousness, hence an immersion in the unconscious.["The Psychology of the Transference," CW 16, par. 455.]
Mythologically, the night sea journey motif usually involves being swallowed by a dragon or sea monster. It is also represented by imprisonment or crucifixion, dismemberment or abduction, experiences traditionally weathered by sun-gods and heroes: Gilgamesh, Osiris, Christ, Dante, Odysseus, Aeneas. In the language of the mystics it is the dark night of the soul.

Jung interpreted such legends symbolically, as illustrations of the regressive movement of energy in an outbreak of neurosis and its potential progression.

The hero is the symbolical exponent of the movement of libido. Entry into the dragon is the regressive direction, and the journey to the East (the "night sea journey") with its attendant events symbolizes the effort to adapt to the conditions of the psychic inner world. The complete swallowing up and disappearance of the hero in the belly of the dragon represents the complete withdrawal of interest from the outer world. The overcoming of the monster from within is the achievement of adaptation to the conditions of the inner world, and the emergence ("slipping out") of the hero from the monster's belly with the help of a bird, which happens at the moment of sunrise, symbolizes the recommencement of progression.["On Psychic Energy," CW 8, par. 68.]

All the night sea journey myths derive from the perceived behavior of the sun, which, in Jung's lyrical image, "sails over the sea like an immortal god who every evening is immersed in the maternal waters and is born anew in the morning."Symbols of the Mother and of Rebirth,"CW 5, par. 306.] The sun going down, analogous to the loss of energy in a depression, is the necessary prelude to rebirth. Cleansed in the healing waters (the unconscious), the sun (ego-consciousness) lives again.

Nigredo:
An alchemical term, corresponding psychologically to the mental disorientation that typically arises in the process of assimilating unconscious contents, particularly aspects of the shadow.
Self-knowledge is an adventure that carries us unexpectedly far and deep. Even a moderately comprehensive knowledge of the shadow can cause a good deal of confusion and mental darkness, since it gives rise to personality problems which one had never remotely imagined before.
For this reason alone we can understand why the alchemists called their nigredo melancholia, “a black blacker than black,” night, an affliction of the soul, confusion, etc., or, more pointedly, the “black raven.”
For us the raven seems only a funny allegory, but for the medieval adept it was . . . a well-known allegory of the devil.[”The Conjunction,” CW 14, par. 741.]

Numinous:
Descriptive of persons, things or situations having a deep emotional resonance, psychologically associated with experiences of the self.
Numinous, like numinosity, comes from Latin numinosum, referring to a dynamic agency or effect independent of the conscious will.
Religious teaching as well as the consensus gentium always and everywhere explain this experience as being due to a cause external to the individual. The numinosum is either a quality belonging to a visible object or the influence of an invisible presence that causes a peculiar alteration of consciousness.["Psychology and Religion," CW 11, par. 6.]

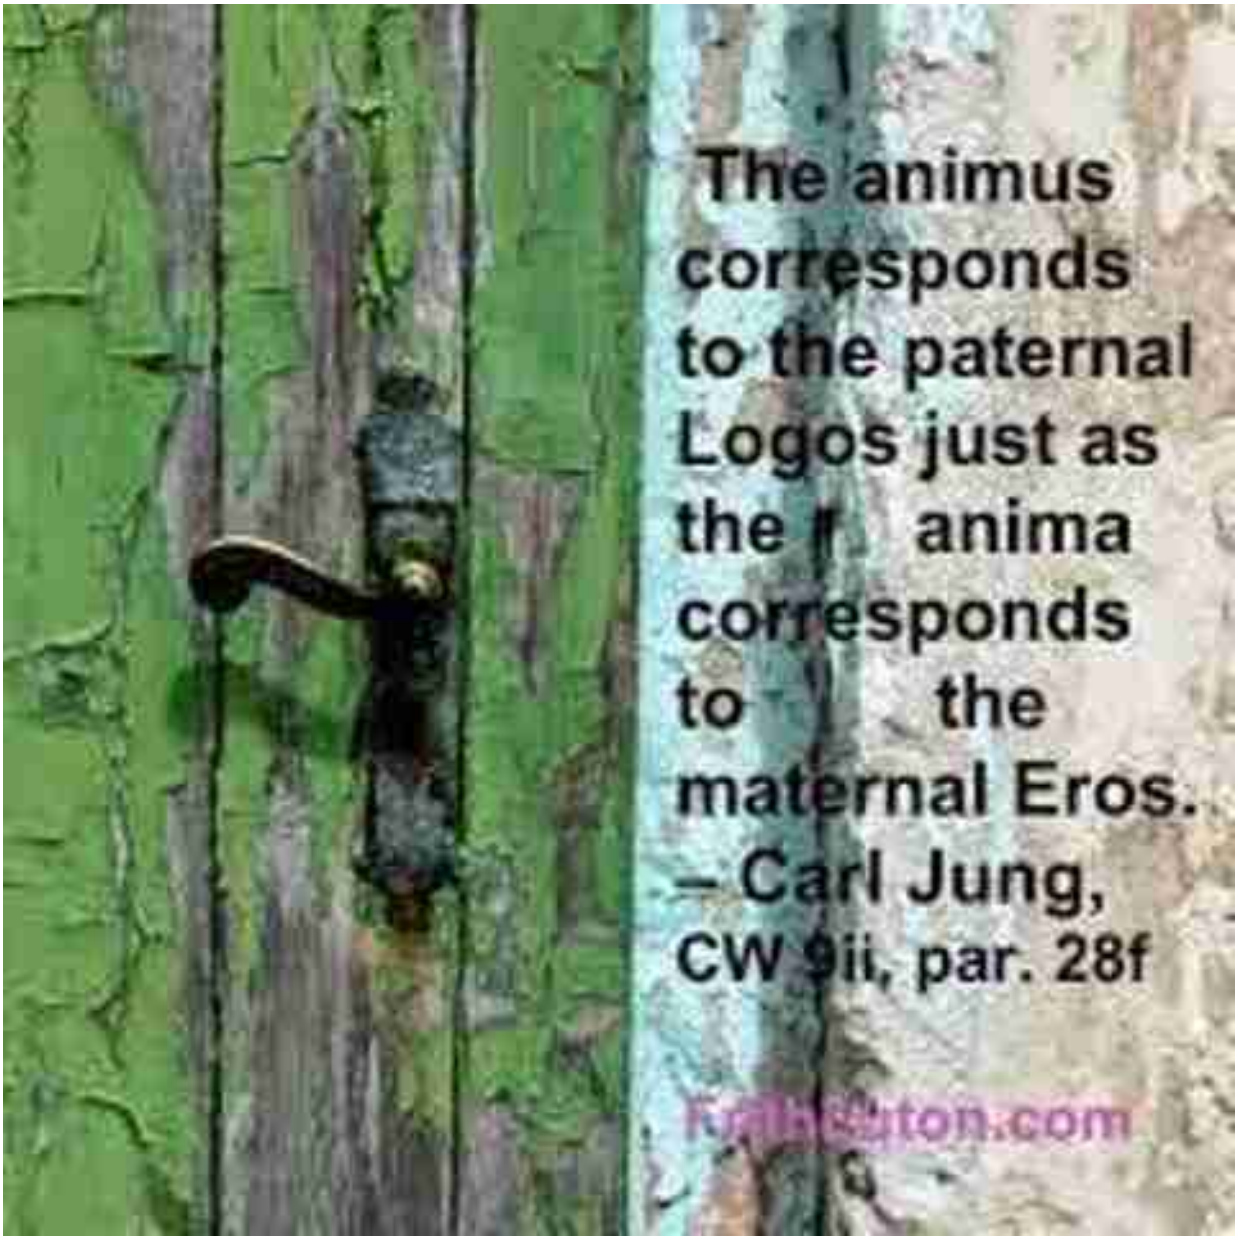
Carl Jung: ”The animus corresponds to the paternal Logos just as the anima corresponds to the maternal Eros.” (2015-05-27 05:34)



The animus corresponds to the paternal Logos just as the anima corresponds to the maternal Eros.
But I do not wish or intend to give these two intuitive concepts too specific a definition.
I use Eros and Logos merely as conceptual aids to describe the fact that woman’s consciousness is characterized more by the connective quality of Eros than by the discrimination and cognition associated with Logos.
In men, Eros, the function of relationship, is usually less developed than Logos.
In women, on the other hand, Eros is an expression of their true nature, while their Logos is often only a regrettable accident.
It gives rise to misunderstandings and annoying interpretations in the family circle and among friends.
This is because it consists of opinions instead of reflections, and by opinions I mean a priori assumptions that lay claim to absolute truth.
Such assumptions, as everyone knows, can be extremely irritating.

6754

As the animus is partial to argument, he can best be seen at work in disputes where both parties know they are right. Men can argue in a very womanish way, too, when they are anima-possessed and have thus been transformed into the animus of their own anima.
With them the question becomes one of personal vanity and touchiness (as if they were females); with women it is a question of power, whether of truth or justice or some other ”ism”—for the dressmaker and hairdresser have already taken care of their vanity.
The ”Father” (i.e., the sum of conventional opinions) always plays a great role in female argumentation.
No matter how friendly and obliging a woman’s Eros may be, no logic on earth can shake her if she is ridden by the animus.
Often the man has the feeling—and he is not altogether wrong—that only seduction or a beating or rape would have the necessary power of persuasion.
He is unaware that this highly dramatic situation would instantly come to a banal and unexciting end if he were to quit the field and let a second woman carry on the battle (his wife, for instance, if she herself is not the fiery war horse).
This sound idea seldom or never occurs to him, because no man can converse with an animus for five minutes without becoming the victim of his own anima.
Anyone who still had enough sense of humour to listen objectively to the ensuing dialogue would be staggered by the vast number of commonplaces, misapplied truisms, cliches from newspapers and novels, shop-soiled platitudes of every description interspersed with vulgar abuse and brain-splitting lack of logic.
It is a dialogue which, irrespective of its participants, is repeated millions and millions of times in all the languages of the world and always remains essentially the same. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Pages 14-15.

Carl Jung on "Objectivation." Lexicon (2015-05-27 11:10)

Objectivation:
A process of differentiating the ego from both other persons and contents of the unconscious. (See also active imagination.)

Its goal is to detach consciousness from the object so that the individual no longer places the guarantee of his happiness, or of his life even, in factors outside himself, whether they be persons, ideas, or circumstances, but comes to realize that everything depends on whether he holds the treasure or not. If the possession of that gold is realized, then the centre of gravity is in the individual and no longer in an object on which he depends.["The Tavistock Lectures," CW 18, par. 377.]

Jung pointed out that the "treasure" has traditionally been projected onto sacred figures, but that many modern individuals no longer find satisfaction in such historical symbols. They therefore need to find an individual method to "give shape" to the personal complexes and archetypal images.

For they have to take on form, they have to live their characteristic life, otherwise the individual is severed from the basic function of the psyche [compensation], and then he is neurotic, he is disorientated and in conflict with himself. But if he is able to objectify the impersonal images and relate to them, he is in touch with that vital psychological function which from the dawn of consciousness has been taken care of by religion.[Ibid., par. 378.]

Carl Jung on "Opposites." Lexicon. (2015-05-28 04:33)

Opposites: Psychologically, the ego and the unconscious. (See also compensation, conflict, progression and transcendent function.)

There is no consciousness without discrimination of opposites.[”Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype,” CW 9i, par. 178.]

There is no form of human tragedy that does not in some measure proceed from [the] conflict between the ego and the unconscious.[”Analytical Psychology and Weltanschauung,” CW 8, par. 706.]

Whatever attitude exists in the conscious mind, and whichever psychological function is dominant, the opposite is in the unconscious. This situation seldom precipitates a crisis in the first half of life. But for older people who reach an impasse, characterized by a one-sided conscious attitude and the blockage of energy, it is necessary to bring to light psychic contents that have been repressed.

The repressed content must be made conscious so as to produce a tension of opposites, without which no forward movement is possible. The conscious mind is on top, the shadow underneath, and just as high always longs for low and hot for cold, so all consciousness, perhaps without being aware of it, seeks its unconscious opposite, lacking which it is doomed to stagnation, congestion, and ossification. Life is born only of the spark of opposites.[”The Problem of the Attitude-Type,” CW 7, par. 78.]

This in turn activates the process of compensation, which leads to an irrational “third,” the transcendent function.

Out of [the] collision of opposites the unconscious psyche always creates a third thing of an irrational nature, which the conscious mind neither expects nor understands. It presents itself in a form that is neither a straight “yes” nor a straight “no.”[”The Psychology of the Child Archetype,” CW 9i, par. 285.”The Psychology of the Child Archetype,” CW 9i, par. 285.]

Jung explained the potential renewal of the personality in terms of the principle of entropy in physics, according to which transformations of energy in a relatively closed system take place, and are only possible, as a result of differences in intensity.

Psychologically, we can see this process at work in the development of a lasting and relatively unchanging attitude. After violent oscillations at the beginning the opposites equalize one another, and gradually a new attitude develops, the final stability of which is the greater in proportion to the magnitude of the initial differences. The greater the tension between the pairs of opposites, the greater will be the energy that comes from them . . . [and] the less chance is there of subsequent disturbances which might arise from friction with material not previously constellated.[”On Psychic Energy,” CW 8, par. 49.]

Some degree of tension between consciousness and the unconsciousness is both unavoidable and necessary. The aim of analysis is therefore not to eliminate the tension but rather to understand the role it plays in the self-regulation of the psyche. Moreover, the assimilation of unconscious contents results in the ego becoming responsible for what was previously unconscious. There is thus no question of anyone ever being completely at peace.

The united personality will never quite lose the painful sense of innate discord. Complete redemption from the sufferings of this world is and must remain an illusion. Christ’s earthly life likewise ended, not in complacent bliss, but on the cross.[”The Psychology of the Transference,” CW 16, par. 400.]

Jung further believed that anyone who attempts to deal with the problem of the opposites on a personal level is making a significant contribution toward world peace.

The psychological rule says that when an inner situation is not made conscious, it happens outside, as fate. That is to say, when the individual remains undivided and does not become conscious of his inner opposite, the world must perforce act out the conflict and be torn into opposing halves.[”Christ, A Symbol of the Self,” CW 9ii, par. 126.]

Carl Jung on "Orientation." Lexicon. (2015-05-29 04:42)

Orientation:
A term used to indicate the general principle governing a personal attitude or viewpoint.
One's psychological orientation determines how one sees and interprets reality. In Jung's model of typology, a thinking attitude is oriented by the principle of logic; a sensation attitude is oriented by the direct perception of concrete facts; intuition orients itself to future possibilities; and feeling is governed by subjective worth.
Each of these attitudes may operate in an introverted or extraverted way.

Carl Jung on "Parental Complex." Lexicon. (2015-05-29 15:09)

Parental complex:
A group of emotionally charged images and ideas associated with the parents. (See also incest.)
Jung believed that the numinosity surrounding the personal parents, apparent in their more or less magical influence, was to a large extent due to an archetypal image of the primordial parents resident in every psyche.
The importance that modern psychology attaches to the "parental complex" is a direct continuation of primitive man's experience of the dangerous power of the ancestral spirits. Even the error of judgment which leads him unthinkingly to assume that the spirits are realities of the external world is carried on in our assumption (which is only partially correct) that the real parents are responsible for the parental complex. In the old trauma theory of Freudian psychoanalysis, and in other quarters as well, this assumption even passed for a scientific explanation. (It was in order to avoid this confusion that I advocated the term "parental imago.")["The Function of the Unconscious," CW 7, par. 293.]
The imago of the parents is composed of both the image created in the individual psyche from the experience of the personal parents and collective elements already present.

The image is unconsciously projected, and when the parents die, the projected image goes on working as though it were a spirit existing on its own. The primitive then speaks of parental spirits who return by night (revenants), while the modern man calls it a father or mother complex.[Ibid., par. 294.]
So long as a positive or negative resemblance to the parents is the deciding factor in a love choice, the release from the parental imago, and hence from childhood, is not complete.["Mind and Earth," CW 10, par. 74].

Carl Jung on "Participation Mystique." Lexicon (2015-05-30 04:57)

Participation mystique:
A term derived from anthropology and the study of primitive psychology, denoting a mystical connection, or identity, between subject and object. (See also archaic, identification and projection.)
[Participation mystique] consists in the fact that the subject cannot clearly distinguish himself from the object but is bound to it by a direct relationship which amounts to partial identity. . . . Among civilized peoples it usually occurs between persons, seldom between a person and a thing. In the first case it is a transference relationship . . . . In the second case there is a similar influence on the part of the thing, or else an identification with a thing or the idea of a thing.["Definitions," CW 6, par. 781.]
[Identity] is a characteristic of the primitive mentality and the real foundation of participation mystique, which is nothing but a relic of the original non-differentiation of subject and object, and hence of the primordial unconscious state. It is also a characteristic of the mental state of early infancy, and, finally, of the unconscious of the civilized adult.[Ibid., par. 741.]

Carl Jung on the "Persona." Lexicon. (2015-05-30 07:59)

Persona:
The "I," usually ideal aspects of ourselves, that we present to the outside world.
The persona is . . . a functional complex that comes into existence for reasons of adaptation or personal convenience.[Ibid., par. 801.]
The persona is that which in reality one is not, but which oneself as well as others think one is.["Concerning Rebirth," CW 9i, par. 221.]
Originally the word persona meant a mask worn by actors to indicate the role they played. On this level, it is both a protective covering and an asset in mixing with other people. Civilized society depends on interactions between people through the persona.
There are indeed people who lack a developed persona . . . blundering from one social solecism to the next, perfectly harmless and innocent, soulful bores or appealing children, or, if they are women, spectral Cassandras dreaded for their tactlessness, eternally misunderstood, never knowing what they are about, always taking forgiveness for granted, blind to the world, hopeless dreamers. From them we can see how a neglected persona works.["Anima and Animus," CW 7, par. 318.]
Before the persona has been differentiated from the ego, the persona is experienced as individuality. In fact, as a social identity on the one hand and an ideal image on the other, there is little individual about it.
It is, as its name implies, only a mask of the collective psyche, a mask that feigns individuality, making others and oneself believe that one is individual, whereas one is simply acting a role through which the collective psyche speaks. When we analyse the persona we strip off the mask, and discover that what seemed to be individual is at bottom collective; in other words, that the persona was only a mask of the collective psyche. Fundamentally the persona is nothing real: it is a compromise between individual and society as to what a man should appear to be. He takes a name, earns a title, exercises a function, he is this or that. In a certain sense all this is real, yet in relation to the essential individuality of the person concerned it is only a secondary reality, a compromise formation, in making which others often have a greater share than he. ["The Persona as a Segment of the Collective Psyche," ibid., pars. 245f.]

A psychological understanding of the persona as a function of relationship to the outside world makes it possible to assume and drop one at will. But by rewarding a particular persona, the outside world invites identification with it. Money, respect and power come to those who can perform single-mindedly and well in a social role. From being a useful convenience, therefore, the persona may become a trap and a source of neurosis.

A man cannot get rid of himself in favour of an artificial personality without punishment. Even the attempt to do so brings on, in all ordinary cases, unconscious reactions in the form of bad moods, affects, phobias, obsessive ideas, backsliding vices, etc. The social "strong man" is in his private life often a mere child where his own states of feeling are concerned.["Anima and Animus," ibid., par. 307.]

The demands of propriety and good manners are an added inducement to assume a becoming mask. What goes on behind the mask is then called "private life." This painfully familiar division of consciousness into two figures, often preposterously different, is an incisive psychological operation that is bound to have repercussions on the unconscious.[Ibid., par. 305.]

Among the consequences of identifying with a persona are: we lose sight of who we are without a protective covering; our reactions are predetermined by collective expectations (we do and think and feel what our persona "should" do, think and feel); those close to us complain of our emotional distance; and we cannot imagine life without it.

To the extent that ego-consciousness is identified with the persona, the neglected inner life (personified in the shadow and anima or animus) is activated in compensation. The consequences, experienced in symptoms characteristic of neurosis, can stimulate the process of individuation.

There is, after all, something individual in the peculiar choice and delineation of the persona, and . . . despite the exclusive identity of the ego-consciousness with the persona the unconscious self, one's real individuality, is always present and makes itself felt indirectly if not directly. Although the ego-consciousness is at first identical with the persona-that compromise role in which we parade before the community-yet the unconscious self can never be repressed to the point of extinction. Its influence is chiefly manifest in the special nature of the contrasting and compensating contents of the unconscious. The purely personal attitude of the conscious mind evokes reactions on the part of the unconscious, and these, together with personal repressions, contain the seeds of individual development.["The Persona as a Segment of the Collective Psyche," ibid., par. 247.]

Carl Jung on "Personality." Lexicon. (2015-06-01 02:11)

Personality:
Aspects of the soul as it functions in the world. (See also individuality.)
For the development of personality, differentiation from collective values, particularly those embodied in and adhered to by the persona, is essential.
A change from one milieu to another brings about a striking alteration of personality, and on each occasion a clearly defined character emerges that is noticeably different from the previous one. . . .
The social character is oriented on the one hand by the expectations and demands of society, and on the other by the social aims and aspirations of the individual. The domestic character is, as a rule, moulded by emotional demands and an easy-going acquiescence for the sake of comfort and convenience; when it frequently happens that men who in public life are extremely energetic, spirited, obstinate, wilful and ruthless appear good-natured, mild, compliant, even weak, when at home and in the bosom of the family. Which is the true character, the real personality? . . .
. . . . In my view the answer to the above question should be that such a man has no real character at all: he is not individual but collective, the plaything of circumstance and general expectations. Were he individual, he would have the same character despite the variation of attitude. He would not be identical with the attitude of the moment, and he neither would nor could prevent his individuality from expressing itself just as clearly in one state as in another.["Definitions," CW 6, pars. 798f.]

Carl Jung on "Personification." Lexicon. (2015-06-02 01:47)

Personification:
The tendency of psychic contents or complexes to take on a distinct personality, separate from the ego.
Every autonomous or even relatively autonomous complex has the peculiarity of appearing as a personality, i.e., of being personified.
This can be observed most readily in the so-called spiritualistic manifestations of automatic writing and the like.
The sentences produced are always personal statements and are propounded in the first person singular, as though behind every utterance there stood an actual personality.
A naïve intelligence at once thinks of spirits.["Anima and Animus," CW 7, par. 312.]
The ego may also deliberately personify unconscious contents or the affects that arise from them, using the method of active imagination, in order to facilitate communication between consciousness and the unconscious.

Carl Jung on "Possession." Lexicon. (2015-06-03 08:57)

Possession:
A term used to describe the identification of consciousness with an unconscious content or complex. The most common forms of possession are by the shadow and the contrasexual complexes, anima/animus.

A man who is possessed by his shadow is always standing in his own light and falling into his own traps. Whenever possible, he prefers to make an unfavorable impression on others. . . .
Possession caused by the anima or animus presents a different picture. . . .
In the state of possession both figures lose their charm and their values; they retain them only when they are turned away from the world, in the introverted state, when they serve as bridges to the unconscious. Turned towards the world, the anima is fickle, capricious, moody, uncontrolled and emotional, sometimes gifted with daemonic intuitions, ruthless, malicious, untruthful, bitchy, double-faced, and mystical. The animus is obstinate, harping on principles, laying down the law, dogmatic, world-reforming, theoretic, word-mongering, argumentative, and domineering. Both alike have bad taste: the anima surrounds herself with inferior people, and the animus lets himself be taken in by second-rate thinking.[”Concerning Rebirth,” CW 9i, pars. 222f.]

Carl Jung and Liber Novus Image 159. (2015-06-04 00:54)

Why did I behave as if that serpent were my soul?
Only; it seems, because my soul was a serpent.
This knowledge gave my soul a new face, and I decided henceforth to enchant her myself and subject her to my power.

Serpents are wise, and I wanted my serpent soul to communicate her wisdom to me.
Never before had life been so doubtful, a night of aimless tension, being one in being directed against one another.
Nothing moved, neither God nor the devil.
So I approached the serpent that lay in the sun, as if she were unthinking.
Her eyes were not visible, since they blinked in the shimmering sunshine, and I spoke to her. [Image 159]. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 319.
Footnote 296:
Image legend: "9 January 1927 my friend Hermann Sigg died age 52."
Jung described this as "A luminous flower in the center, with stars rotating about it. Around the flower, walls with eight gates. The whole conceived as a transparent window."
This mandala was based on a dream noted on January 2, I927 (see above, p. 2I7).
From the 'town map,' the relation between the dream and the painting is clear (see Appendix A).
He anonymously reproduced this in 1930 in "Commentary to the 'Secret of the Golden Flower,' " from which this description is taken.
He reproduced it again in 1952, and added the following commentary:
"The rose in the center is depicted as a ruby, its outer ring being conceived as a wheel or a wall with gates (so that nothing can come out from inside or go in from outside).
The mandala was a spontaneous product from the analysis of a male patient."
After narrating the dream, Jung added:
"The dreamer went on: 'I tried to paint this dream.
But as so often happens, it came out rather different. The magnolia turned into a sort of rose made of ruby-colored glass.
It shone like a four-rayed star.
The square represents the wall of the park and at the same time a street leading rpund the park in a square. From it there radiate eight main streets, and from each of these eight side-streets, which meet in a shining red central point, rather like the Etoile in Paris. The acquaintance mentioned in the dream lived in a house at the corner of one of these stars.'
The mandala thus combines the classic motifs of flower, star, circle, precinct (temenos), and plan of city divided into quarters with citadel.'
The whole thing seemed like a window opening on to eternity;' wrote the dreamer" ("Concerning mandala symbolism," CW 9, I, §654-55).
In 1955/56 he used this same expression to denote the illustration of the self (Mysterium Coniunctionis, CW I4,§763).
On October 7, I932, Jung showed this mandala in a seminar, and commented on it the next day.
In this account, he states that the painting of the mandala preceded the dream: "You remember possibly the picture that I showed you last evening, the central stone and the little jewels round it.
It is perhaps interesting if I tell you about the dream in connection with it.
I was the perpetrator of that mandala at a time when I had not the slightest idea what a mandala was, and in my extreme modesty I thought, I am the jewel in the center and those little lights are surely very nice people who believe that they are also jewels, but smaller ones ... I thought very well of myself that I was able to express myself like that: my marvelous center here and I am right in my heart."
He added that at first he did not recognize that the park was the same as the mandala which he had painted, and commented:
"Now Liverpool is the center of life-liver is the center of life-and I am not the center, I am the fool who lives in a dark place somewhere, I am one of those little side lights.
In that way my Western prejudice that I was the center of the mandala was corrected-that I am everything, the whole show, the king, the god" (The Psychology Of Kundalini Yoga, p. 100).
In Memories, Jung added some further details (pp. 223-24). Liber Novus, Footnote 296, Page 319.

Carl Jung on "Primary Function." Lexicon. (2015-06-05 05:04)

Primary function:
The psychological function that is most differentiated. (Compare inferior function.)

In Jung's model of typology, the primary or superior function is the one we automatically use because it comes most naturally.

Experience shows that it is practically impossible, owing to adverse circumstances in general, for anyone to develop all his psychological functions simultaneously. The demands of society compel a man to apply himself first and foremost to the differentiation of the function with which he is best equipped by nature, or which will secure him the greatest social success. Very frequently, indeed as a general rule, a man identifies more or less completely with the most favored and hence the most developed function. It is this that gives rise to the various psychological types.["Definitions," CW 6, par. 763.]

In deciding which of the four functions-thinking, feeling, sensation or intuition-is primary, one must closely observe which function is more or less completely under conscious control, and which functions have a haphazard or random character. The superior function (which can manifest in either an introverted or an extraverted way) is always more highly developed than the others, which possess infantile and primitive traits.

The superior function is always an expression of the conscious personality, of its aims, will, and general performance, whereas the less differentiated functions fall into the category of things that simply "happen" to one.["General Description of the Types," ibid., par. 575.]

The hanging of the victims on crosses was a religious custom in Middle America. (2015-06-05 16:21)

The hanging of the victims on crosses was a religious custom in Middle America.

Equally significant is the Palenque Cross (pi. xlm).
At the top is a bird, on either side two human figures facing the cross, one of them holding out a child for either sacrifice or baptism.
The ancient Aztecs are said to have invoked the favour of Cinteotl, ”the daughter of heaven and goddess of the grain,” by nailing a youth or maiden to the cross every spring and shooting the victim with arrows.
The name of the cross signifies ”Tree of our life or flesh.”

Paracelsus and the ”Lumen Naturae.” (2015-06-06 11:26)

Paracelsus says of the lumen naturae:
”Look at Adam and Moses and others.
They sought in themselves what was in man and have revealed it and all kabbalistic arts and they knew nothing alien to man neither from the Devil nor from the spirits, but derived their knowledge from the Light of Nature.
This they nurtured in themselves … it comes from nature which contains its manner of activity within itself. It is active during sleep and hence things must be used when dormant and not awake—sleep is waking for such arts—for things have a spirit which is active for them in sleep.
Now it is true that Satan in his wisdom is a Kabbalist and a powerful one.
So, too, are these innate spirits in man . . . for it is the Light of Nature which is at work during sleep and is the invisible body and was nevertheless born like the visible and natural body.
But there is more to be known than the mere flesh, for from this very innate spirit comes that which is visible . . . the Light of Nature which is man’s mentor dwells in this innate spirit.”
Paracelsus also says that though men die, the mentor goes on teaching (Astronomia magna, ed. Sudhoff, XII, p, 23; ”De podagricis,” ed. Huser, I, p. 566).

Carl Jung and the Shadow also displays good qualities (2015-06-06 17:55)

If it has been believed hitherto that the human shadow was the source of all evil, it can now be ascertained on closer investigation that the unconscious man, that is, his shadow, does not consist only of morally reprehensible tendencies, but also displays a number of good qualities, such as normal instincts, appropriate reactions, realistic insights, creative impulses, etc. Carl Jung, CW 9ii, Par 423.

Carl Jung on the ”Black Anima.” (2015-06-07 04:40)

The Latin translation ”serpent” for ”witch” is connected with the widespread primitive idea that the spirits of the dead are snakes. This fits in with the offering of goat’s blood, since the sacrifice of black animals to the chthonic numina was quite customary. Carl Jung, CW 14, Par 78.
The Shulamite remains unchanged, as did the old Adam.
And yet Adam Kadmon is born, a non-Christian second Adam, just at the moment when the transformation is expected.
This extraordinary contradiction seems insoluble at first sight.
But it becomes understandable when we consider that the illumination or solificatio of the Shulamite is not the first transformation but the second, and takes place within.
The subject of transformation is not the empirical man, however much he may identify with the ”old Adam,” but Adam the Primordial Man, the archetype within us.
The black Shulamite herself represents the first transformation: it is the coming to consciousness of the black anima, the Primordial Man’s feminine aspect.
The second, or solificatio, is the conscious differentiation of the masculine aspect—a far more difficult task.
Every man feels identical with this, though in reality he is not.
There is too much blackness in the archetype for him to put it all down to his own account, and so many good and positive things that he cannot resist the temptation to identify with them.
It is therefore much easier to see the blackness in projected form: ”The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat” holds true even of the most enlightened psychology.

But the masculine aspect is as unfathomable as the feminine aspect.
It would certainly not be fitting for the empirical man, no matter how swollen his ego-feelings, to appropriate the whole range of Adam’s heights and depths.
Human being though he is, he has no cause to attribute to himself all the nobility and beauty a man can attain to, just as he would assuredly refuse to accept the guilt for the abjectness and baseness that make man lower than an animal—unless, of course, he were driven by insanity to act out the role of the archetype. Carl Jung, CW 14, Par 647.

Carl Jung on the “Imitation of Christ.” (2015-06-07 10:52)

Are we to understand the ”imitation of Christ” in the sense that we should copy his life and, if I may use the expression, ape his stigmata; or in the deeper sense that we are to live our own proper lives as truly as he lived his in its individual uniqueness?
It is no easy matter to live a life that is modelled on Christ’s, but it is unspeakably harder to live one’s own life as truly as Christ lived his.
Anyone who did this would run counter to the conditions of his own history, and though he might thus be fulfilling them, he would none the less be misjudged, derided, tortured, and crucified.
He would be a kind of crazy Bolshevist who deserved the cross.

We therefore prefer the historically sanctioned and sanctified imitation of Christ.
I would never disturb a monk in the practice of this identification, for he deserves our respect.
But neither I nor my patients are monks, and it is my duty as a physician to show my patients how they can live their lives without becoming neurotic.
Neurosis is an inner cleavage—the state of being at war with oneself.
Everything that accentuates this cleavage makes the patient worse, and everything that mitigates it tends to heal him.
What drives people to war with themselves is the suspicion or the knowledge that they consist of two persons in opposition to one another.
The conflict may be between the sensual and the spiritual man, or between the ego and the shadow.
It is what Faust means when he says: ”Two souls, alas, are housed within my breast.”
A neurosis is a splitting of personality. Carl Jung, CW 11, Par 522.

Carl Jung and "Projection." Lexicon (2015-06-08 16:29)

Projection:
An automatic process whereby contents of one's own unconscious are perceived to be in others. (See also archaic, identification and participation mystique.)
Just as we tend to assume that the world is as we see it, we naïvely suppose that people are as we imagine them to be. . . . All the contents of our unconscious are constantly being projected into our surroundings, and it is only by recognizing certain properties of the objects as projections or imagos that we are able to distinguish them from the real properties of the objects. . . . Cum grano salis, we always see our own unavowed mistakes in our opponent. Excellent examples of this are to be found in all personal quarrels. Unless we are possessed of an unusual degree of self-awareness we shall never see through our projections but must always succumb to them, because the mind in its natural state presupposes the existence of such projections. It is the natural and given thing for unconscious contents to be projected.["General Aspects of Dream Psychology," ibid., par. 507.]

Projection means the expulsion of a subjective content into an object; it is the opposite of introjection. Accordingly, it is a process of dissimilation, by which a subjective content becomes alienated from the subject and is, so to speak, embodied in the object. The subject gets rid of painful, incompatible contents by projecting them.["Definitions," CW 6, par. 783.]

Projection is not a conscious process. One meets with projections, one does not make them.

The general psychological reason for projection is always an activated unconscious that seeks expression.["The Tavistock Lectures," CW 18, par. 352.]

It is possible to project certain characteristics onto another person who does not possess them at all, but the one being projected upon may unconsciously encourage it.

It frequently happens that the object offers a hook to the projection, and even lures it out. This is generally the case when the object himself (or herself) is not conscious of the quality in question: in that way it works directly upon the unconscious of the projicient. For all projections provoke counter-projections when the object is unconscious of the quality projected upon it by the subject.["General Aspects of Dream Psychology," CW 8, par. 519.]

Through projection one can create a series of imaginary relationships that often have little or nothing to do with the outside world.

The effect of projection is to isolate the subject from his environment, since instead of a real relation to it there is now only an illusory one. Projections change the world into the replica of one's own unknown face. In the last analysis, therefore, they lead to an autoerotic or autistic condition in which one dreams a world whose reality remains forever unattainable.["The Shadow," CW 9ii, par. 17.]

Projection also has positive effects. In everyday life it facilitates interpersonal relations. In addition, when we assume that some quality or characteristic is present in another, and then, through experience, find that this is not so, we can learn something about ourselves. This involves withdrawing or dissolving projections.

So long as the libido can use these projections as agreeable and convenient bridges to the world, they will alleviate life in a positive way. But as soon as the libido wants to strike out on another path, and for this purpose begins running back along the previous bridges of projection, they will work as the greatest hindrances it is possible to imagine, for they effectively prevent any real detachment from the former object.["General Aspects of Dream Psychology," CW 8, par. 507.]

The need to withdraw projections is generally signaled by frustrated expectations in relationships, accompanied by strong affect. But Jung believed that until there is an obvious discordance between what we imagine to be true and the reality we are presented with, there is no need to speak of projections, let alone withdraw them.

Projection . . . is properly so called only when the need to dissolve the identity with the object has already arisen. This need arises when the identity becomes a disturbing factor, i.e., when the absence of the projected content is a hindrance to adaptation and its withdrawal into the subject has become desirable. From this moment the previous partial identity acquires the character of projection. The term projection therefore signifies a state of identity that has become noticeable.["Definitions," CW 6, par. 783.]

Jung distinguished between passive projection and active projection. Passive projection is completely automatic and unintentional, like falling in love. The less we know about another person, the easier it is to passively project unconscious aspects of ourselves onto them.

Active projection is better known as empathy-we feel ourselves into the other's shoes. Empathy that extends to the point where we lose our own standpoint becomes identification.

The projection of the personal shadow generally falls on persons of the same sex. On a collective level, it gives rise to war, scapegoating and confrontations between political parties. Projection that takes place in the context of a therapeutic relationship is called transference or countertransference, depending on whether the analysand or the analyst is the one projecting.

In terms of the contrasexual complexes, anima and animus, projection is both a common cause of animosity and a singular source of vitality.

When animus and anima meet, the animus draws his sword of power and the anima ejects her poison of illusion and seduction. The outcome need not always be negative, since the two are equally likely to fall in love.["The Syzygy: Anima and Animus," CW 9ii, par. 30.]

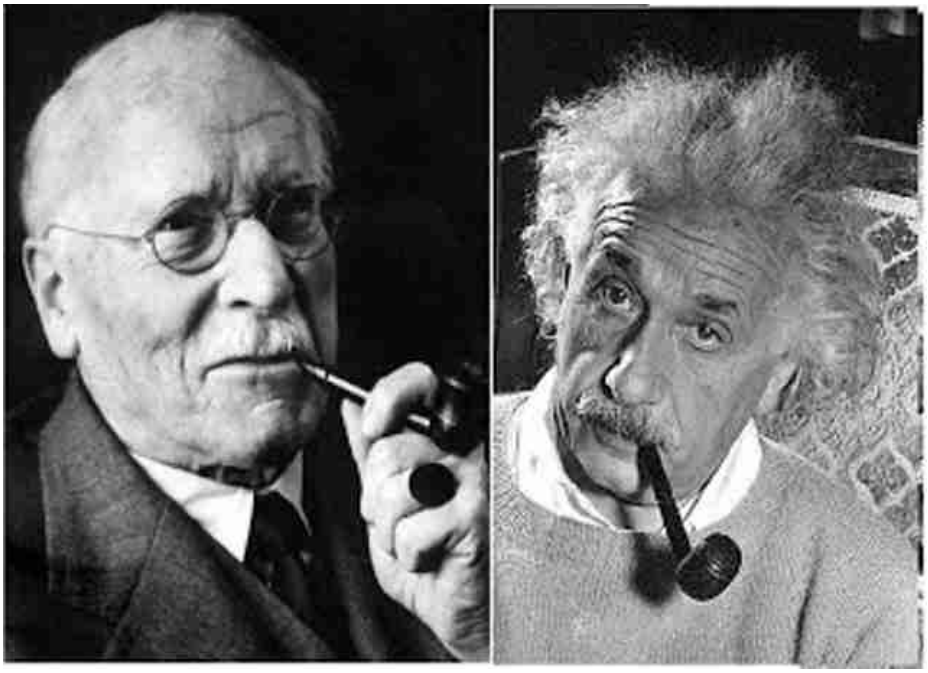
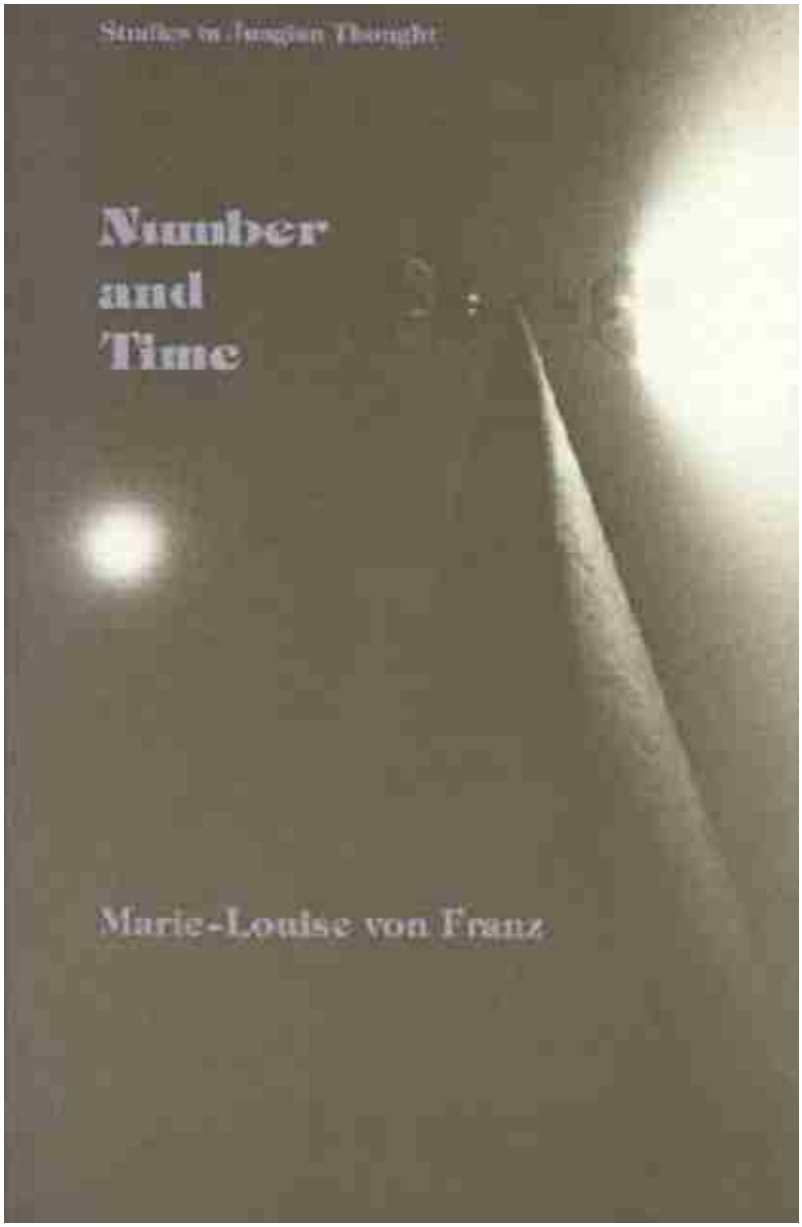
Carl Jung and "Physics." (2015-06-09 15:41)



When he was just starting to work on the theory of relativity, Einstein came often to my house and I bombed with questions about the new theory.
I'm not good at math and imagine the problem that the poor guy had to explain relativity.
He didn't know how to explain it.
Faced with the difficulty of it, I felt insignificant, I wanted to sink into the ground.
Until one day he asked me something and psychology was my revenge.
"The expertise " Jung adds" is a big disadvantage; the intensification is such that you can't explain.
I have since had many opportunities to observe that nowadays the conversation is impossible between the infinitely graduates.
Everyone is so advanced in the field of your enthusiasm and feel so comfortable there that barely, and hardly care, talk about everything else.
Would be exposed as a crab out of the shell. Carl Jung on meeting Albert Einstein



”C. G. Jung’s work in his later years suggested that the seemingly divergent sciences of psychology and modern physics might, in fact, be approaching a unified world model in which the dualism of matter and psyche would be resolved.

Jung believed that the natural integers are the archetypal patterns that regulate the unitary realm of psyche and matter, and that number serves as a special instrument for man's becoming conscious of this unity." Number and Time by Marie Louise Von Franz

This photograph of Jung and Erwin Schrödinger was taken in a garden near the Round Table at the 1946 conference. The conference theme that year was "Spirit and Nature." Jung lectured on "The Spirit of Psychology"and Schrödinger spoke on "The Spirit of Natural Science."
A theoretical physicist, Schrödinger won the Nobel Prize in 1933 for his discovery of the Schrödinger wave equation.

Max Knoll, a professor of physics from Princeton University, lectured at Eranos between 1951 and 1965 on the history of science.
This photograph of Knoll was taken at the 1951 conference. In 1934 Knoll and Ernst Ruska, his student, invented the electron microscope. Knoll died in 1969, seventeen years before his co-inventor, Ruska, would be awarded the Nobel Prize in physics for their invention of the electron microscope.

Jung at Bollingen. On lighting lanterns, water-pumping, wood-cutting, fire making, and cooking (2015-06-10 09:01)

Jung at Bollingen. Of lighting lanterns, water-pumping, wood-cutting, fire making, and cooking, Jung said, ”These simple acts make man simple.” Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 72.
The feeling of repose and renewal that I had in this tower was intense from the start.
It represented for me the maternal hearth. . . in which I could become what I was, what I am and will be. . . .
At Bollingen I am in the midst of my true life, I am most deeply myself.
Here I am, as it were, the ”age-old son of the mother”. . . personality No.2, who . . . exists outside time. . . .
I have done without electricity, and tend the fireplace and stove myself.
Evenings, I light the old lamps.
There is no running water, and I pump the water from the well.
I chop the wood and cook the food.
These simple acts make man simple; and how difficult it is to be simple!
In Bollingen, silence surrounds me almost audibly, and I live ”in modest harmony with nature.”
Thoughts rise to the surface which reach back into the centuries, and accordingly anticipate a remote future. . . .
There I . . . see life in the round, as something forever coming into being and passing on. Carl Jung, Memories Dreams and Reflections, Pages 255-256.

”Jung was a mountain of a man - big enough to encompass every kind of person imaginable” (2015-06-10 09:36)

Jung at Bailey Island, Maine, 1936.
"Jung was a mountain of a man—big enough to encompass every kind of person imaginable."

Analyst and author Jane Wheelwright was a patient of Jung’s in the 1930s.
“Jung was a mountain of a man - big enough to encompass every kind of person imaginable.
All kinds of people big and small found through him their uniqueness.
He touched all kinds of people who came his way.
Sometimes it was through what he inadvertently said - more often than not something he would not remember.
Sometimes it was what he did.
Mostly it was what he was: a comprehensive, large, all-embracing, complete man. He spanned in himself everything from greatness and power to all-too-human failings.
He could be irritable and sometimes downright demanding.
Explosions of rage were not uncommon.
He even could be duped at times by unscrupulous and ambitious people.
Sometimes he seemed to reduce to human ordinariness. At other times he seemed to expand - to literally physically expand - to overpowering size.
I remember once experiencing him like this.
I must have betrayed my feeling that he was beyond my reach because he said out of the blue, ”Do I have horns on my head?”
Jung was able to constellate the unconscious of countless numbers and kinds of people.
It was an extraordinary gift that he had. . . . I believe he was at his best as an analyst.” Jane Wheelwright, J.E.T., Page 97.

The Dream that inspired Dr. Jung to write his last great work. (2015-06-10 10:02)

Christ and the Wise Virgins Stone portal, Germany.
At eighty-three, Jung had a dream in which he addressed a multitude of ordinary people who listened with rapt attention and understanding.
This prompted him to agree to the publication of his last book, Man and His Symbols. Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 206.

Man and His Symbols, Jung's last work, had a typical birth.
The highly successful Freeman interview prompted a publisher's request for a book of Jung's "more important and basic ideas," this time "for the people in the market place."

No, said eighty-three year-old Jung.
He had never tried to popularize his work; anyway he was ”old and rather tired.”
Then he had a dream, which he told to John Freeman.
Jung dreamed that, instead of sitting in his study and talking to the great doctors and psychiatrists who used to call on him from all over the world, he was standing in a public place and addressing a multitude of people who were listening to him with rapt attention and understanding what he said. Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 206.

Sheila Moon on Carl Jung (2015-06-11 05:29)

In each of my hours with Dr. Jung I was aware of his sense of urgency about man’s religious task, of his intense concern that each of us must be related to ourselves and to God not only inwardly but in the world, if we and the world are not to be destroyed.
”We fear our serpent,” he said, ”as we also fear the numinosum - so we run from it. . . . All we have to give the world and God is ourselves as we are. But this is the hardest of all tasks. Most of us want others to do it for us, to carry us along.”. . .
Over and again he stressed his belief that ”unless we live these things we profess, we are useless.”
My last sight of him was in 1955 in Ascona.
I had photographed him with Mrs. Jung, seated at a table in the warm sunlight outside their hotel by the lake.
Very Swiss, very solid, very genuine, very warm, they sat side by side, smiling, as we drove away. Shiela Moon, J.E.T., Page 178.

Carl Jung's Dream that inspired "Answer to Job." (2015-06-11 11:16)

The problem of evil had occupied Jung since his childhood, raising, as it does, fundamental questions about the ideas of God we live with in the form of images, concepts, and metaphors and their consequent effect on the meaning and conduct of human existence.
Patients and public had put these questions to him for years.
In Aion he began tackling the issue of "the dark side of God" but found it needed a more direct focus.
The fateful Answer to Job was foreshadowed by a long dream ending in a scene which demonstrated underlying attitudes of the dreamer:
"It was a high, circular room with a gallery running along the wall, from which four bridges led to a basin-shaped center.
The basin rested upon a huge column and formed the sultan's round seat. . . .The whole was a gigantic mandala...
I suddenly saw that from the center a steep flight of stairs ascended to a spot high up on the wall. . . . At the top of the stairs was a small door, and my father said, "Now I will lead you into the highest presence."
Then he knelt down and touched his forehead to the floor.
I imitated him, likewise kneeling, with great emotion. For some reason I could not bring my forehead quite down to the floor - there was perhaps a millimeter to spare. . . .
I . . . ought really to have touched my forehead to the floor, so that my submission would be complete.
But something prevented me from doing so entirely, and kept me just a millimeter away.
Something in me was saying, "All very well, but not entirely."
Something in me was defiant and determined not to be a dumb fish: and if there were not something of the sort in free men, no Book of Job would have been written several hundred years before the birth of Christ.
Man always has some mental reservation, even in the face of divine decrees.
Otherwise, where would be his freedom?
And what would be the use of that freedom if it could not threaten Him who threatens it?" Carl Jung, Memories Dreams and Reflections, P. 218-220.

Elizabeth Howes on Emma Jung (2015-06-12 04:03)

I found Mrs. Jung the most integrated person in Zurich. . . .
I found myself deeply moved by a woman who had so obviously found herself and her own authenticity in the midst of so many collective pressures.
She was the wife of Carl Jung, which was certainly not an easy task.
And she maintained - or rather, achieved- an individuality separate from his.
She became a scholar in later years which culminated in her excellent book, The Legend of the Holy Grail.
Also she became a wise and sensitive analyst, pointing simply and directly to what needed to be looked at.
She was a joy to work with... .
Mrs. Jung's quiet, penetrating, active and participating attitude helped one always to know that one was working in a religious process where the unconscious was revealing – in even the slightest way - powers greater than the ego.
But always I remember how she stressed the role of the ego in the development of consciousness.
Mrs. Jung said to me, "There are egos and egos and egos. The problem is to find the right one."
To me, as I saw her, she had found hers and had related it to the deeper archetypal powers making for wholeness.

Carl Jung on the Death of Emma and Bollingen house. (2015-06-12 16:06)

After my wife's death. . . I felt an inner obligation to become what I myself am.
To put it in the language of the Bollingen house, I suddenly realized that the small central section which crouched so low, so hidden was myself!
I could no longer hide myself behind the "maternal" and the "spiritual" towers. So, in that same year, I added an upper story to this section, which represents myself, or my ego personality.
Earlier,I would not have been able to do this; I would have regarded it as presumptuous self-emphasis.
Now it signified an extension of consciousness achieved in old age.
With that the building was complete. Carl Jung, MDR, Page 225.
Dear Aniela... .
I have finished painting the ceiling in Bollingen and done more work on my inscription and - last but not least - rebricked the rivulets to prevent seepage and cooked some good meals and found and bought an excellent wine.
All this has rested me and cured me of various vexations.
But I won't speak of that.
Thank heavens I have no idea how great is the disorder or order of my correspondence.
My memory has the most astonishing holes in it, so that I often catch myself forgetting not only what I have done but more especially what I have not done. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 351.
Solitude is for me a fount of healing which makes my life worth living.
Talking is often a torment for me, and I need many days of silence to recover from the futility of words.
I have got my marching orders and only look back when there's nothing else to do.
This journey is a great adventure in itself, but not one that can be talked about at great length.
What you think of as a few days of spiritual communion would be unendurable for me with anyone, even my closest friends.
The rest is silence! This realization becomes clearer every day as the need to communicate dwindles.

In his eighties, Jung needed solitude as a "fount of healing," and silence to overcome the "torment" of talking.

Carl Jung on “Synchronicity.” (2015-06-13 05:38)

Carl Jung on “Synchronicity.”
”Certain phenomena of synchronicity seem to be bound up with the archetypes.” Synchronistic events nearly always occur during, or because of heightened emotion.
It’s as if the threshold of consciousness is lowered, which then allows the unconscious and its contents to show themselves in conscious life.
These spheres of heightened emotion occur within archetypal situations such as death, mortal danger, catastrophes, mental or physical illness, or relationship crises, which demonstrate innate ”patterns of behavior that are universal in character, arousing the same feelings in everyone.”
Similarly, close-bonded archetypal relationships such as those between mother and child or between lovers often produce synchronistic telepathic communication.
For lung, the archetypes are ”an imprint which presupposes an imprinter”; ”the archetype is only the name of Tao, not Tao itself.”
And ”just as the physicist regards the atom as a model I regard archetypal ideas as sketches for the purpose of visualizing the unknown background.”
We . . . have to expect a factor in the psyche that is not subject to the laws of time and space, as it is on the contrary capable of suppressing them to a certain extent.
In other words: this factor is expected to manifest the qualities of time- and spacelessness, i.e., ”eternity” and ”ubiquity.”
Psychological experience knows of such a factor; it is what I call the archetype, which is ubiquitous in time and space, of course relatively speaking.
It is a structural element of the psyche we find everywhere and at all times; and it is that in which all individual psyches are identical with each other, and where they function as if they were the one undivided Psyche the ancients called anima mundi or the psyche tou kosmou [cosmic psyche].
This is no metaphysical speculation but an observable fact, and therefore the key to innumerable mythologies, that is to the manifestations of unconscious fantasy. . . .

It may be, from a psychological point of view, a mere similarity and not a unity in essence. . .
But here parapsychology comes in, with its psi-phenomena that unmistakably show an essential identity of two separate events, as for instance the act of prevision and the objective precognized fact.
These experiences show that the factor in question is one and the same inside and outside the psyche.
. . . In our ordinary minds we are in the worlds of time and space and within the individual psyche.
In the state of the archetype we are in the collective psyche, in a world system whose space-time categories are relatively or absolutely abolished.
This is about as far as we can go safely.
I see no way beyond, since we are not capable of functioning in a four-dimensional system at will; it only can happen to us.
Our intellectual means reach only as far as archetypal experiences, but within that sphere we are not the motors, we are the moved objects.
Experiment in the ordinary sense therefore becomes impossible. . . .
There is no regularity between archetype and synchronistic event. . . .
I think you are correct in assuming that synchronicity, though in practice a relatively rare phenomenon, is an all-pervading factor of principle in the universe, i.e., in the Unus Mundus, where there is no incommensurability between so-called matter and co-called psyche.
Here one gets into deep waters, at least I myself must confess that I am far from having sounded these abysmal depths.
In this connection I always come upon the enigma of the natural number.
I have a distinct feeling that Number is a key to the mystery, since it is just as much discovered as it is invented.
It is quantity as well as meaning.
For the latter I refer to the arithmetical qualities of the fundamental archetype of the self. . . and its historically and empirically well documented variants of the Four. . . .
It seems that I am too old to solve such riddles, but I do hope that a young mind will take up the challenge. It would be worth while. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 398-400.

“Thank God, I’m Jung, and not a Jungian.” (2015-06-13 11:06)

[“Thank God, I’m Jung, and not a Jungian.” is a popular quotation of Dr. Jung’s but is often not used within the context in which it was stated as provided below.]
There was indeed plenty of theory with which to diagnose and label the patients, but terms and theory never appealed to Jung except as a temporary aid.
Speaking of the terms he himself gave to various aspects of the human psyche, he wrote, in his last long book, Mysterium Coniunctionis:
If such concepts provisionally serve to put the empirical material in order, they will have fulfilled their purpose. [Carl Jung, CW 14, Footnote 66, Page 108.]
He used to deplore the tendency of too many of his pupils to make dogma of such concepts and once in exasperation remarked:
“Thank God, I’m Jung, and not a Jungian.” Carl Jung, Jung: A Biography [Hannah], Page 78.

Carl Jung and Bollingen (2015-06-14 04:47)

I observe myself in the stillness of Bollingen, with the experience of almost eight decades now, and I have to admit that I have found no plain answer to myself.
I am in doubt about myself as much as ever, the more so the more I try to say something definite.
It is even as though through familiarity with oneself one became still more alienated! Carl Jung, Jung Briefe, Page 386.
In 1955 his tall figure was slightly bent and even gave an impression of fragility.
Yet most people overlooked this, because it paled beside the massive strength, the powerfulness that radiated from him; no one who ever met him could escape its aura.
It was not the powerfulness of an authoritarian Jung was too good-natured for that, too kindly, too outgoing even in old age and his humor too infectious.
Nor was it the powerfulness one associates with erudition or with a highly differentiated and richly endowed intellect. . . .
What was so palpably impressive about him sprang from the superiority of a man who had engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the creative daemon and mastered him, but on whom the struggle had left its mark.
This kind of powerfulness is profoundly human, does not arouse fear, is not crushing, does not embarrass or make you feel small, but changes you; it compels veneration and awe. Aniela Jaffe, Last Years, Page 100.

Carl Jung and some Late Life Thoughts. (2015-06-14 11:51)

Eastern philosophy fills a psychic lacuna in us but without answering the problem posed by Christianity.
Since I am neither an Indian nor a Chinese, I shall probably have to rest content with my European presuppositions, otherwise I would be in danger of losing my roots for a second time. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 238.
I tried to find the best truth and the clearest light I could attain to, and since I have reached my highest point I can't transcend any more, I am guarding my light and my treasure, convinced that nobody would gain and I myself would be badly, even hopelessly injured, if I should lose it. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 597.
Up until the last moment Jung still seemed to be searching. Perhaps his was the road of the Magician who, unlike the Saint, did not yearn for fusion or for the peace of God, but preferred the eternal highway with all its unhappiness. But I cannot be certain of that. Michael Serrano, Two Friendships, Page 112.

Carl Jung an Alchemical Stages (2015-06-14 12:07)

The third and highest degree of conjunction was the union of the whole man with the unus mundus . . .
the potential world of the first day of creation, when nothing was yet ”in actu,” i.e. divided into two and many but was still one. . .
the eternal Ground of all empirical being. . . .
The third degree of conjunction is universal: it is relation or identity of the personal with the supra-personal atman, and of the individual Tao with the universal Tao. . . .
He [the alchemist Dorn] expressly meant not a fusion of the individual with his environment, or even his adaptation Undoubtedly the idea of the unus mundus is founded on the assumption that the multiplicity of the empirical world rests on an underlying unity. . .
everything different and divided belongs to one and the same world. . . .
All that is not encompassed by our knowledge, so that we are not in a position to make any statements about its total nature. . . .
But this much we do know beyond all doubt, that empirical reality has a transcendental background.
. . . The common background of microphysics and depth psychology is as much physical as psychic and therefore neither, but rather a third thing, a neutral nature which can at most be grasped in hints since in essence it is transcendental.
. . . The transcendental psychophysical background corresponds to a ”potential world.”. . .
The third and highest conjunction. . .
would consist, psychologically, in a synthesis of the conscious with the unconscious.
The result of this conjunction or equation is theoretically inconceivable, since a known quantity is combined with an unknown one; but in practice as many far reaching changes of consciousness result from it as atomic physics has produced in classical physics. . . .
Not unnaturally, we are at a loss to see how a psychic experience of this kind - for such it evidently was - can be formulated as a rational concept.
Undoubtedly it was meant as the essence of perfection and universality, and, as such, it characterized an experience of similar proportions.
We could compare this only with the ineffable mystery of the unio mystica, or Tao, or the content of Samadhi, or the experience of satori in Zen, which would bring us to the realm of the ineffable and of extreme subjectivity where all the criteria of reason fail.
Remarkably enough this experience is an empirical one in so far as there are unanimous testimonies from the East and West alike, both from the present and from the distant past, which confirm its unsurpassable subjective significance. . . .

It is and remains a secret of the world of psychic experience and can be understood only as a numinous event.
Carl Jung, CW 14, Pages 767-771.

The union of Tantric deities can embody unio mystica at the levels of the synthesis of opposites: the conscious and unconscious, the personal with the supra-personal.

Carl Jung on "Tao." (2015-06-14 12:17)

The truth is one and the same everywhere and I must say that Taoism is one of the most perfect formulations of it I ever became acquainted with. Carl Jung, Letters Volume 1, Pages 559-560.

Only in this spiritual centre is there any possibility of salvation. The concept of the centre was called by the Chinese Tao, which the Jesuits in their day translated as Deus. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 470-471.
Taoist meditation is mainly concerned with the curious transformations of Yang and Yin. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 43.

Confucianism was the recognised state religion in China, it subordinates the interests of the individual to those of the state, whereas Taoism is essentially a religion for the individual. Carl Jung, ETH, Page 142.
The central idea of Taoism is no moral question, but is the Tao, the indefinable essence of the right way, and this is also the mystery of alchemy. Carl Jung, ETH, Page 142.

Carl Jung: “Not being a prophet, it is impossible for me to predict where the world is going to.” (2015-06-14 12:26)

To Albert Oppenheimer
Dear Herr Oppenheimer 10 October 1933
Not being a prophet, it is impossible for me to predict where the world is going to.
But I know from my own experience of very many individuals of our time that a very definite instinctive tendency is at work to bring them back to consciousness of themselves.
The catastrophe of the World War is no doubt responsible for this.
What happens to the individual also happens to nations after a time, by a process of natural summation.
The economic crisis operates as a contributory causative factor.
Nations will become more and more entrenched in their idiosyncrasies and we may expect an increase in nationalism everywhere.
Contrary to the rational expectation of worldwide understanding, the individuality of each nation is going to be built up for a long time to come.
Economic hardship makes people egoistic as well as increasing mistrust between them.
It is clear that civilization, if not exactly threatened, is being held up in its advance.
This is to be welcomed in that our advance has been much too rapid for the real man, which is why we have become lopsidedly intellectualistic and rationalistic and have quite forgotten that there are other factors which cannot be influenced by a one track rational intellect.

Hence we see on all sides a mystic emotionality flaring up, which had been declared extinguished ever since the Middle Ages.
It fares with nations as with the individual: if he grows too high in the air his roots go down too deep, which means that however fast he progresses he will after a time be overtaken by his own shadow, where he will find plenty of work to do on himself at home.
In the individual one calls it a conflict, in the nation it's a civil war or revolution.
I think the continuing divisions and upheavals will gradually lead to a state of balance which will form the basis for a reconstruction.
But I think the phase of disintegration will last at least several decades more.
I see no special social or political gain for our generation but an all the greater spiritual one.
This, of course, is not identical with what used to be called the march of civilization.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 128-129.

Carl Jung two days before his death. (2015-06-15 06:58)

For two days before he died he was away in some far country and he saw wonderful and beautiful things, .I am sure of that.
He smiled often and was happy. . . he told me of the wonderful dream he had had; he said: ”Now I know the truth but there is a small piece not filled in and when I know that I shall be dead.”
Also after that he had a wonderful dream which he told me in the night.
He saw a huge round block of stone sitting on a high plateau and at the foot of the stone was engraved these words: ”And this shall be a sign unto you of Wholeness and Oneness.” Ruth Bailey, Two Friendships, Page 104.

The Death of Carl Jung and "Synchronicity." (2015-06-15 07:10)

At 4 P.M. on June 6, 1961, Jung died very peacefully, surrounded by his family. Not surprisingly, synchronicity accompanied his death. Laurens van der Post, on a voyage from Africa to Europe, reported a dream at the time he died of Jung waving goodbye.
Barbara Hannah told how, minutes before his death, she discovered the relatively fresh battery in her car had completely run down.
Nature joined in a couple of hours later with a freak storm over Kusnacht in which lightning struck and scarred the tree where Jung used to sit in the garden. Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 215.

Carl Jung on ”Man’s Real Task.” (2015-06-15 10:44)

In each aeon there are at least a few individuals who understand what man’s real task consists of, and keep its tradition for future generations and a time when insight has reached a deeper and more general level.
First the way of a few will be changed and in a few generations there will be more. . .
whoever is capable of such insight, no matter how isolated he is, should be aware of the law of synchronicity.
As the old Chinese saying goes: ”The right man sitting in his house and thinking the right thought will be heard a hundred miles away.” Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 525.

Carl Jung's Self-Confidence shaken. (2015-06-15 14:31)

To you, dear friend. . . for this dawning decade 1960-70, in whose lap the black and white cards of our uncertain fate await us.
The past decade dealt me heavy blows – the death of dear friends and the even more painful loss of my wife, the end of my scientific activity and the burdens of old age, but also all sorts of honors and above all your friendship, which I value the more highly because it appears that men cannot stand me in the long run.
Since I do not deem myself God-almighty enough to have made them other than they are, I must put it down entirely to my own account and lengthen my shadow accordingly.
Your understanding and your interest have done much to restore my self-confidence, severely shaken by my incessant struggle with difficult contemporaries.
It is indeed no trifling thing to be granted the happy proof that somehow one is "possible" and has achieved something whose meaning someone else, apart from myself, is able to see.
Being well-known not to say "famous" means little when one realizes that those who mouth my name have fundamentally no idea of what it's all about.
The gratification of knowing that one is essentially posthumous is short-lived. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 516.

Carl Jung: We have become participants of the divine life... (2015-06-16 05:11)

We have become participants of the divine life and we have to assume a new responsibility. . . .
Man's relationship to God probably has to undergo a certain important change:
Instead of the propitiating praise to an unpredictable king or the child's prayer to a loving father, the responsible living and fulfilling of the divine love in us will be our form of worship of, and commerce with, God.
His goodness means grace and light and his dark side the terrible temptation of power.
Man has already received so much knowledge that he can destroy his own planet.
Let us hope that God's good spirit will guide him in his decisions, because it will depend on man's decision whether God's creation will continue.
Nothing shows more drastically than this possibility how much of divine power has come within reach of man. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 316.

Jung, who had visions of destruction before World War I and II, spoke repeatedly of man's power to "destroy his own planet."

The last time Mary Crile visited Dr. Jung. (2015-06-16 08:37)

Artist Mary Crile visited Jung in that period.
The last time I saw Jung face to face. . .
I found him much aged but there was the same kindly twinkle behind those penetrating eyes of his.
When he said, "Pull up your chair, for I am getting deaf and old and stupid," I could not help smiling as I reminded him that he had made exactly the same remark to me, just eleven years earlier.
He replied with a chuckle "Well, it doesn't seem to get any better.". . .
When I asked him what he was writing he said, "My biography. . . .
It is purgatory. Frau Jaffe is writing it but I must check it all because no one knows someone else's life.
I have done the first twenty years because one can be more objective there."
He paused and then added thoughtfully, "I don't know the meaning of .life."
As he said this I felt that, even for Jung, who more than anyone else in our day saw life steadily and saw it whole, there still remained an unsolved mystery. Mary Crile,Wounded Healer of the Soul, Pages 194-195.

Oedipus Considers the Riddle Bronze by Glyn Warren Philpot, 1930.
As Jung engaged, the riddle of the meaning of life remained an enigma, an open mystery to be forever pondered. Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 195.

Carl Jung to his daughter Marianne after the death of Emma Jung (2015-06-16 13:59)

Dear Marianne,
Warmest thanks for your lovely letter which was a great joy.

6818

I am glad you weren't bored with me.
It was a joy to be together with you for a while. . . .
Mama's death has left a gap for me that cannot be filled.
So it is good if you have something you want to carry out and can turn to when the emptiness spreads about you too menacingly.
The stone I am working on gives me inner stability with its hardness and permanence and its meaning governs my thoughts. Carl Jung to his daughter, Letters Vol. II, Page 316.

Carl Jung on Toni Wolff (2015-06-16 14:41)

Tommy de Trafford, Toni Wolf, CG Jung Bad Ragaz 1937

Jung went on as if talking to himself,
"Somewhere there was once a Flower, a Stone, a Crystal, a Queen, a King, a Palace, a Lover and his Beloved, and this was long ago, on an Island Somewhere in the ocean five thousand years ago.. . . Such is Love, the Mystic Flower of the Soul.
This is the Center, the Self. . . ."
Jung spoke as if in a trance.
"Nobody understands what I mean" he said, "only a poet could begin to understand.". . .

”You are a poet,” I said, moved by what I had heard.
”And that woman, is she still alive?” I asked.
”She died eight years ago. . . . I am very old. Miguel Serrano, Two Friendships, Pages 60-61.

In 1958, Jung initiated efforts to have Toni Wolff's writings published. (2015-06-16 15:57)

Dear Dr. Brody. . . .

I feel the need to recommend the collected papers of Toni Wolff to your attention. . .
They are distinguished not only by their intellectual content but by the fact that the author had personally experienced the development of analytical psychology from the fateful year of 1912 right up to the recent past and was thus in a position to record her reactions and sympathetic interest from the first.
Her papers also have a documentary value.
Even those who did not know the author personally will glean from them an impression of the versatility and depth of her spiritual personality. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 424-425.

Carl Jung hearing of the death of Toni Wolff. (2015-06-16 16:13)

Outwardly he kept extremely calm, so that both his wife and his secretary told me they thought he had over-come the shock after a few days, but from my notes for April 1953, I see that he said himself that his pulse was still between eighty and 120; moreover this trouble continued for some time.
He had been helped, it is true, by seeing Toni in a dream. .. on Easter Eve, looking much taller and younger than she had been when she died, and exceedingly beautiful.
She was wearing a frock of all the colors of a bird of paradise, with the wonderful blue of the kingfisher as the most emphasized color.
He saw just her image, there was no action in the dream, and he was especially impressed by having dreamed it on the night of the resurrection. Barbara Hannah, “Jung,” Page 313.

Although Jung tried to get Toni Wolff’s scientific writings published after her death in 1953, as yet they remain unpublished.

Carl Jung: God needs man in to become conscious... (2015-06-17 05:28)

God needs man in to become conscious, just as he needs limitation in time and space. Let us therefore be for him limitation in time and space an earthly tabernacle. Carl Jung, Letters, Volume 1, Page 65.
Accordingly the capacity to nullify space and time must somehow inhere in the psyche, or, to put it another way, the psyche does not exist wholly in time and space.
It is very probable that only what we call consciousness is contained in space and time, and that the rest of the psyche. the unconscious, exists in a state of relative spacelessness and timelessness.
For the psyche this means a relative eternality and a relative non-separation from other psyches, or a oneness with them. Carl Jung, Letters Volume I, Page 256.

Carl Jung's "Fireside Chats" (2015-06-17 08:06)

Jung in his late seventies no longer taught at the C. G. Jung Institute, though Emma did.
But twice yearly he invited diploma candidates, like Peter Lynn, to his Kusnacht house for "fireside chats." Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 167.
He would stand by the fireplace, pipe in mouth, and ask for questions on anything and everything, encouraging us to engage him in dialogue.
My most vivid recollection of these extraordinary evenings is the experience of Jung as a giant whose head touched the clouds and whose feet were rooted in the very center of the earth.

Within the same sentence he would connect an earthy, peasant-type joke (laughing uproariously) with an obscure pre-Christian myth, both directly relevant to the question under discussion.
I used to come away from these gatherings with a great sense of awe, having glimpsed ultimate issues in a thoroughly human context. Peter Lynn, J.E.T., Page 41.

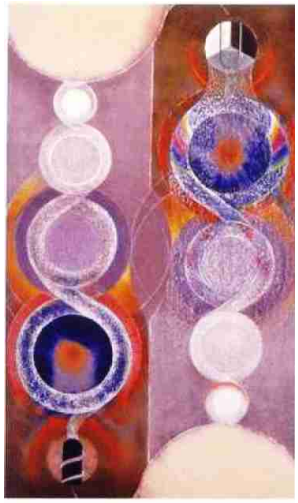
Dr. Jung and the impressions ordinary people made upon him (2015-06-17 08:41)

I always remember a letter I received one morning, from a woman who wanted to see me just once in her life. The letter made a very strong impression on me, I am not quite sure why. I invited her to come and she came.

She was very poor - poor intellectually too.
I don't believe she had ever finished primary school.
She kept house for her brother; they ran a little newsstand.
I asked her kindly if she really understood my books which she said she had read. And she replied in this extraordinary way "Your books are not books, Herr Professor. They are bread."
And the little traveling salesman of women's things who stopped me in the street and looked at me with immense eyes, saying "Are you really the man who writes those books? Are you truly the one who writes about these things no one knows? C.G. Jung Speaking, Page 402.

Carl Jung on "Causalism" (2015-06-17 09:24)



The causalism that underlies our scientific picture of the world breaks everything down into individual processes which it punctiliously tries to isolate from all other parallel processes.
This tendency is absolutely necessary if we are to gain a reliable knowledge of the world, but philosophically it has the disadvantage of breaking up, or obscuring, the universal interrelationship of events so that a recognition of the greater relationship, i.e. the unity of the world, becomes more and more difficult.
Everything that happens, however, happens in the same "one world" and is part of it. For this reason events must have an a priori aspect of unity. Carl Jung, CW 14, Para 662.

Dr. Jung discusses Psychology and Physics with famous Physicists (2015-06-17 10:56)

Dear Professor Pauli,
Best thanks for kindly sending me Jordan's paper.
I think this paper should be published, as it is concerned with the Actual changeover of the physicist's mode of observation tothe psychological field.
This paper was inevitable.
Having come to the conclusion that the observed is also a disturbance by the observer, the consistent investigator of the unknown interior of the atom could not help seeing that the nature of the observing process becomes perceptible in the disturbance caused by the observation.
To put it more simply, if you look long enough into a dark hole you perceive what is looking in.
This is also the principle of cognition in yoga, which derives all cognition from the absolute emptiness of consciousness. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 174-175.
Dear Professor Jung,
The epistemological situation with regard to the concepts ”conscious” and ”unconscious” seems to offer a pretty close analogy to the ”complementarity” situation in physics.
Every ”observation of the unconscious,” i.e., every conscious realization of unconscious contents, has an uncontrollable reactive effect on these same contents. . . . It is undeniable that the development of ”microphysics” has brought the way in which nature is described in this science very much closer to that of the new psychology. Wolfgang Pauli, Last Years, Page 166.
Dear Professor Nelson:
The comparison of modern psychology to modern physics is no idle talk. Both disciplines have, for all their diametrical opposition, one most important point in common, namely the fact that they both approach the hitherto ”transcendental” region of the Invisible and Intangible, the world of merely analogous thought. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 308.

Carl Jung: No Christian is meant to sleep in a safe pew... (2015-06-17 11:30)

No Christian is meant to sleep in a safe pew. . . . I have discovered in my private life that a true Christian is not bedded upon roses and he is not meant for peace and tranquility of mind but for war.
And again I am realizing profoundly that not everybody's nature is as bellicose as mine, although I have attained - Deo concedente - a certain state of peace within, paid for by a rather uncomfortable state of war without.
But even if a peaceful nature has reached a certain higher level of consciousness he cannot escape the raging conflict of opposites in his soul, as God wants to unite his opposites in man.
As soon as a more honest and complete consciousness beyond the collective has been established, man is no more an end in himself, but becomes an instrument of God, and this is really so and no joke about it. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 242.

Carl Jung: "We imitate Christ and hope he will deliver us from our own fate." (2015-06-17 14:12)

Christ. . . took himself with exemplary seriousness and lived his life to the bitter end, regardless of human convention and in opposition to his own lawful tradition, as the worst heretic in the eyes of the Jews and a madman in the eyes of his family.

But we?
We imitate Christ and hope he will deliver us from our own fate.
Like little Iambs we follow the shepherd, naturally to good pastures.
No talk at all of uniting our Above and Below!
On the contrary Christ and his cross deliver us from our conflict, which we simply leave alone. . . . Instead of bearing ourselves, i.e., our own cross, ourselves, we load Christ with our unresolved conflicts.
We ”place ourselves under his cross,” but by golly not under our own. . . . The cross of Christ was borne by himself and was his.
To put oneself under somebody else’s cross, which has already been carried by him, is certainly easier than to carry your own cross amid the mockery and contempt of the world.
That way you remain nicely ensconced in tradition and are praised as devout.
This is well-organized Pharisaism and highly un-Christian.
Whoever imitates Christ and has the cheek to want to take Christ’s cross on himself when he can’t even carry his own has in my view not yet learnt the ABC of the Christian message.
Have your congregation understood that they must close their eyes to the traditional teachings and go through the darkness of their own souls and set aside everything in order to become that which every individual bears in himself as his individual task, and that no one can take this burden from him?
We continually pray that ”this cup may pass from us” and not harm us.
Even Christ did so, but without success. . . . We might. . . discover, among other things, that in every feature Christ’s life is a prototype of individuation and hence cannot be imitated: one can only live one’s own life totally in the same way with all the consequences this entails. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 76-77.

Carl Jung: ”We are still looking back to the Pentecostal events...” (2015-06-18 05:11)

We are still looking back to the Pentecostal events in a dazed way instead of looking forward to the goal the spirit is leading us to.

6832

Therefore mankind is wholly unprepared for the things to come.
Man is compelled by divine forces to go forward to increasing consciousness and cognition, developing further and further away from his religious background because he does not understand it any more.
His religious leaders and teachers are still hypnotized by the beginning of a then-new aeon of consciousness instead of understanding them and their implications.
What was once called the ”Holy Ghost” is an impelling force, creating wider consciousness and responsibility and thus enriched cognition.
The real history of the world seems to be the progressive incarnation of the deity. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 436.

Carl Jung: ...even the enlightened person remains what he is... (2015-06-18 05:28)

The Christian Church has hitherto. . . [recognized] Christ as the one and only God-man.
But the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, the third Divine Person, in man, brings about a Christification of many, and the question then arises whether these many are all complete God-men. . . .
It is well to remind ourselves of St. Paul and his split consciousness: on one side he felt he was the apostle directly called and enlightened by God, and, on the other side, a sinful man who could not pluck out the ”thorn in the flesh” and rid himself of the Satanic angel who plagued him.
That is to say even the enlightened person remains what he is, and is never more than his own limited ego before the One who dwells within him, whose form has no knowable boundaries, who encompasses him on all sides, fathomless as the abysms of the earth and vast as the sky. Dr. Jung never does anything by halves. (2015-06-18 13:22)

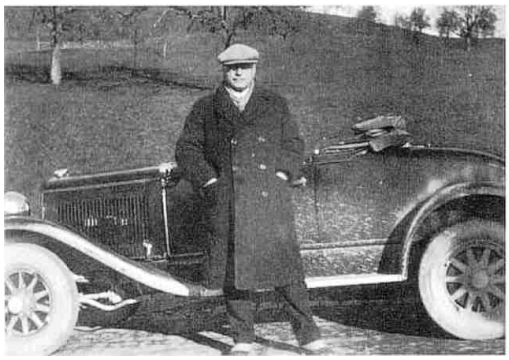
I had seen him often as a highly civilized modernist driving a red Chrysler through the twisting streets of Zurich; pondering the problems of the psyche in his sober book-lined study with its Oriental paintings and Christian stained glass. . .



before I came upon the primitive Jung, one rainy summer day, outside his favorite dwelling place [Bollingen] – a grey stronghold, of medieval outline, standing alone and apart, surrounded by hills and water - where, when his work as a doctor is over, he retires to become for a season the detached scholar and writer who turns experience into theory.
Ensconced there in the shelter of the round stone tower which he had built with his own hands, dressed in a — bright blue linen overall, with his powerful arms in a tub of water, I beheld Dr. Jung earnestly engaged in washing his blue jeans. . . .
Dr. Jung never does anything by halves.
When he walks up and down the floor of the Psychological Club, expounding a dream to his advanced students, every cell and fiber of his physical being seems to participate; every resource of his great learning. . . and his native wisdom is turned in a single living stream upon the question in hand.
This massive, peaceful man in blue was putting the same zest and interest into washing.
No part of Jung was left in Kusnacht giving consultations. Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant, C.G. Jung Speaking, Pages 50-51

Barbara Hannah's first visit to Bollingen (2015-06-18 13:51)

Toni paid back hospitality by asking Jung to invite me to Bollingen.
I was frankly terrified when I first arrived at the Tower.
It was very cold weather and Jung was cooking in his original round kitchen in a long Oriental robe which he often wore in cold weather.
He looked like a picture I had once seen of an old alchemist at work among his retorts.
He looked more whole than ever. . . . Toni, who was also staying there, just gave me some tea and told me to take a chair by the fire and watch Jung cook, then busied herself with fetching the things he asked for and her own jobs.
Jung was entirely engrossed in some absorbing cooking and in watching the fire. (He was a most unusually good cook and used in those days to cook the most complicated dishes.
I remember one sauce with no fewer than sixteen ingredients!)
I did not yet know him well enough to feel it as a companionable silence (which I learned later to enjoy more than anything), so after two or three hours I took an opportunity, when he did not seem quite so engrossed to murmur: "I am scared stiff."
Although only a faint amused smile indicated that he had even heard my remark, the ice was broken and I began to feel at home.
After a bit he gave me an aperitif. . . then I even got a small job or two to do, and finally we were ready to sit down at the round table.
The marvelous food and wine rapidly banished my fear, though I was fortunate enough still to say nothing, except for a few appreciative grunt-like murmurs while we were eating.
That was indeed fortunate because as I learned later Jung jung hated to talk while he was eating a really good meal. (He used to quote his mother, who said that chattering was disrespectful to good food.)
The only remark I remember him making during that first meal was: "Oh, well, you already know how to enjoy your food, that is one thing (emphasis on the one!)
I shall not have to teach you!" Barbara Hannah, "Jung", Page 199.

Carl Jung: ” Into this territory a man must venture if he wishes to meet woman half way.” (2015-06-20 04:31)

A human relationship leads into the world of the psyche, into that intermediate realm between sense and spirit, which contains something of both and yet forfeits nothing of its own unique character.
Into this territory a man must venture if he wishes to meet woman half way.
Circumstances have forced her to acquire a number of masculine traits, so that she shall not remain caught in an antiquated, purely instinctual femininity, lost and alone in the world of men.
So, too, man will be forced to develop his feminine side, to open his eyes to the psyche and to Eros, It is a task he can’ not avoid. Carl Jung, CW 10, Page 125.

Carl Jung on how to use Active Imagination. (2015-06-20 05:05)

The initial question to be directed. . . would be: ”Who or what has come alive? . . .
Who or what has entered my psychic life and created disturbances and wants to be heard?”
To this you should add: ”let it speak!”
Then switch off your noisy consciousness and listen quietly inwards and look at the images that appear before your inner eye, or hearken to the words which the muscles of your speech apparatus are trying to form.
Write down what then comes without criticism.
Images should be drawn or painted assiduously no matter whether you can do it or not.
Once you have got at least fragments of these contents, then you may meditate on them afterwards.
Don’t criticize anything away!
If any questions arise, put them to the unconscious again the next day.
Don’t be content with your own explanations no matter how intelligent they are. . . .
Treat any drawings the same way.
Meditate on them afterwards and every day go on developing what is unsatisfactory about them.
The important thing is to let the unconscious take the lead. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 28-29.
Our dreams propel us into a landscape of universal symbols, which can speak both to our deepest personal realities and to the collective archetypal world that underpins them. Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 86.

Carl Jung on be grounded in the rational. (2015-06-20 05:40)

It is under all conditions a most advisable thing to keep to the conscious and rational side, i.e., to maintain that side. One never should lose sight of it. It is the safeguard without which you would lose yourself on unknown seas. You would invite illness, indeed, if you should give up your conscious and rational orientation.
On the other hand, it is equally true that life is not only rational.
To a certain extent you have to keep your senses open to the non-rational aspects of existence. . . .
The unconscious itself is neither tricky nor evil - it is Nature, both beautiful and terrible. . . .
The best way of dealing with the unconscious is the creative way. . . Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 108-109.
Jung has said that the unconscious long identified as the oceanic in man, is Nature.
The seeker of himself often feels cast adrift, setting a course between light and dark but ultimately moved along by unseen currents deep within. Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 87.

Carl Jung on how the Unconscious expresses itself through Depression. (2015-06-20 07:44)

The unconscious can also express itself through a depression.
People so spoilt by success that they are no longer accustomed to struggle for it, must sometimes suffer disaster in order to wake up: otherwise life is too easy for them.
They are too comfortable and they have to pay for it somehow.
Many are plagued by chronic ailments or intermittent depressions because fate does not torment them in other ways.
Chronic illness or depression is then directly meaningful. They are mechanisms, to be sure, but so long as people are enslaved by these mechanisms they are saved from a more cruel fate.

6840

There are some patients the analyst must even treat emotionally, and he must not allow certain other patients to exploit him. He can talk very openly and sternly to these and even respond emotionally to them. Such people enslave others.
They must be shown that they have a desire to dominate: they must be told the truth.
People of this kind are subject to depression because they want to rule others but cannot manage to. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 15.

[Carl Jung on Foul Language as a therapeutic tool. (2015-06-20 14:01)

An American woman underwent a Freudian analysis without success.
She had used foul language to her analyst but he had failed to react and he disregarded her behaviour.
When she repeated some examples to me I told her in no uncertain terms that if she were ever to speak to me again like that, I would reply to her in the same fashion.
The patient pointed out that I had become emotional and that was not permissible for an analyst.
My answer was, ”But it is human and I have the right to be human too.”
This allowed her to emerge from her schizophrenia.
She had become disoriented through the unnatural behaviour of her first analyst; she was brought back to reality by the honesty of my reaction and was cured. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 15.

Carl Jung on ”Abortion.” (2015-06-21 07:27)

If the question of an abortion arises the whole situation with all its implications must be taken into account.
If the parents are married and healthy the child must be accepted, and the sacrifice of living a more modest life should be met if it is financially necessary.

If the parents are not married the question must be weighed very carefully: would it be favourable or not, damaging or useful? Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 16.

Carl Jung's "Thanks Offering" (2015-06-21 08:27)

In remembrance of his seventy-fifth birthday Jung chiseled a twenty-inch square stone with three alchemical inscriptions "as a thanks offering."
The stone stands outside the tower at Bollingen "and is like an explanation of it." Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 140.
Here stands the mean, uncomely stone,
'Tis very cheap in price!
The more it is despised by fools,
The more loved by the wise. Carl Jung, "Wehr," Page 377.

Carl Jung on “Archetypes.” (2015-06-21 15:35)

Archetypes:
When all the archetypal images are properly placed in a hierarchy, when that which must be below is below, and. that which must be above is above, our final condition can recapture our original blissful state.
Archetypes are images in the soul that represent the course of one’s life.
One part of the archetypal content is of material and the other of spiritual origin.
The more an archetype is amplified the more understandable it becomes.
It is hard to explain because the spiritual cannot be expressed in a few words. The archetype signifies that particular spiritual reality which cannot be attained unless life is lived in consciousness.
Archetypes are not matters of faith; we can know that they are there.
An archetype is composed of an instinctual factor and a spiritual image.
The approaches to it from the instinctual or the spiritual side are very different.
The libido cannot be freed, however, unless the archetypal images can be made conscious.
When fantasy pictures are brought into consciousness their intrinsic energy is liberated.
In this way the instincts become integrated and ordered.
When only the instinctual element of the archetypal content is active there is chaos (massa confusa).
Archetypes can change whilst the individual remains quite unconscious of their movements.
Conceivable they change spontaneously.
The archetypal content of dreams disappears and is replaced by a new one, even when the earlier form has not come into consciousness.
From the nature of a particular archetype it is possible to predict which will follow it.
It can be assumed that the flow of archetypes at a particular time characterize that historical period in a particular way.
The typical events of an era are determined by the succession and the quality of the corresponding archetypal images.
The succession of the archetypal motives is a collective development and has nothing to do with the individual.
We may imagine that the archetypes, being only the residual deposits of human experiences, would have represented animalistic life in an earlier period.
The archetypal primordial forms were already present, however, at the dawn of human consciousness; at its centre, everything was already there as an apriori possibility.

Even the first experiences of man were already fixed; we can only translate these patterns, these archetypes, into form we can understand.
Men have to realize the archetypes which are present at an unconscious level in creation.
All potentialities lie in the unconscious like ideas that have not yet been embodied nor experienced yet as reality.
The archetypes are present in the unconscious as potential abilities which, at a given moment, are realized and applied when brought into consciousness by a creative act.
As an analogy we can suppose that every inspiration produced out of the unconscious has a history.
A new situation occurs as a constellation produced by the archetype, a new inspiration emerges, and something else is discovered and becomes a part of reality.
A host of possibilities is still embedded in the archetypes, in the realm of the Mothers.
The abundance of possibilities eludes our comprehension.
The origin of the archetypes is a crucial question.
Where space and time are relative it is not possible to speak of developments in time.
Everything is present, altogether and all at once, in the constant presence of the pleroma.
I remember standing on a mountain top in inner Africa, seeing around me an endless expanse of brush and herds of animals grazing, all in a deep silence as it had been for thousands of years without anyone being aware of it.
”They” were present but not consciously seen; they were as nameless as in Paradise before Adam named them.
Name-giving is an act of creation.
Where space and time do not exist there is only oneness (monotes).
There is no differentiation; there is only pleroma.
Pleroma is always with us, under our feet and above our heads.
Man is the point that has become visible, stepping out from the pleroma, knowing what he is doing, and able to name the things about him.
Although the earth existed before there were any human beings, it could not be seen or known by anyone.
In China they say that the ancestor of the family, the one who stood at the beginning, is the Cosmos.
Out of him was everything created: in the time before time.
There is nothing to explain or distinguish in the oneness because sequence and causality do not exist.
The archetypes are the material of the God- Creator.
The constitute a primeval ocean charged with potentiality. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Pages 21-22.

Dr. Jung's Vision that is not in "Memories." (2015-06-22 06:05)

There was also a vision or experience - not mentioned in Memories - which he described to Emma Jung and myself very vividly, when I visited him in the hospital during his early convalescence. .
he told us then that as he was recovering from the very worst of his illness, he felt that his body had been dismembered and cut up into small pieces.
Then, over quite a long period, it was slowly collected and put together again with the greatest care. Barbara Hannah, "Hannah," Page 283.

Carl Jung on the “Archetype of the Shadow.” (2015-06-22 12:22)

The Archetype of the Shadow:
The Bible says, ”Whosoever shall say ”Racha” to his brother is guilty of hellfire.”
If we substitute ”shadow” for ”brother” and implicate the dark brother within, we open out this biblical word into new perspectives.
It also says, ”Reconcile yourself with him as long as he is on the road.”
”What ye have done to the least of your brethren ye have done unto me.”
The least of me is my inferior function which represents my shadow- side.
But what, if the inferior and neglected function expresses the will of God?
When sacrifice is demanded it frequently implies the acceptance of our shadow- side.
The the poles of the psyche are torn apart and there is no living centre in a person, he feels forsaken and dominated by demons.
His self is empty and he cannot draw the opposites together.
The best protection against abandonment to demons is a conscious relationship to a close, living human being.
In the case of a woman the relationship should be to a man.
We should not try to escape upward or downward from the world.
To want to be the best or the worst of men is megalomania.
It is devilish arrogance to want to destroy ourselves whenever we feel profoundly miserable.
That state of consciousness which will not let us admit to having a shadow pushes his surroundings into a position of inferiority.
All ”good people” suffer from irritability.
We must be charitable to our weaknesses.

An alchemical text says: ”The mind should learn compassionate love for the body.”
The unconscious shows us the face that we turn towards it.
It smiles if we are friendly to it; but if we neglect it, it makes faces at us.
We can only become real by accepting our sexuality and not denying it through saintliness.
We must descend into our own depths to have the visio Dei.
There are always people who want to bring light into the world because they are afraid to reach down into their own dirt.
But who can be humble who has not sinned?
This is why sin is so important; this is why it is said that God loves the sinner more than ninety-nine righteous men.
The meaning of sin is that it teaches humility; the Church says, felix culpa. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Pages 25-26.

Carl Jung on Questions to be asked during the Era of Aquarius. (2015-06-24 08:29)

The most serious question to ask, it seems to me, is what will Christianity have to say in the future?
What is the meaning of an attachment to the cross, what are the four functions? What does it mean to say ”He gave up the ghost” or, ”My God , why hast thou forsaken me?”
What does this mean for humanity?

What does it mean to say that man dies yet only the risen still live?
All these questions may become actual during the next two thousand years, in the era of Aquarius. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 43.

Carl Jung: ”It seems to me that we are at the end of an era. ” (2015-06-27 14:44)

It seems to me that we are at the end of an era.
The splitting of the atom and the nuclear bomb bring us a new view of matter.
As physical man cannot develop any further, it would seem that this particular evolution ends with man.
Like the caterpillar dissolves and turns into a butterfly, it is conceivable that the physical body of man could change into a more subtle body.
It might not be necessary for him to die to be clothed afresh and be transformed. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 63.

Carl Jung: Relating to Freud, Adler, and Rank (2015-06-28 09:59)

Carl Jung: Relating to Freud, Adler, and Rank

Dr. Evans: Dr. Jung, many of us who have read a great deal of your work are aware of the fact that in your early work you were in association with Dr. Sigmund Freud, and I know it would be of great interest to many of us to hear how you happened to hear of Dr. Freud and how you happened to become involved with some of his work and ideas.

Dr. Jung: Well, as a matter of fact, it was the year 1900, in December, soon after Freud's book about dream interpretation had come out, that I was asked by my chief, Professor Bleuler, to give a review of the book. I studied the book very attentively, and I did not understand many things in it, which were not clear to me at all; but from other parts I got the impression that this man really knew what he was talking about.
I thought "this is certainly a masterpiece—full of future."
I had no ideas then of my own; I was just beginning. It was just when I began my career as assistant in the psychiatric clinic. And then I began with experimental psychology or psychopathology. I applied the experimental association methods of Wundt, the same that had been applied in the psychiatric clinic in Munich, and I studied the results and had the idea that one should go once more over it. So I made use of the association tests, and I found out that the important thing in them has been missed, because it is not interesting to see that there is a reaction—a certain reaction—to a stimulus word. That is more or less uninteresting. But the interesting thing is why people could not react to certain stimulus words, or only react in an entirely inadequate way.

Then I began to study these places in the experiment where the attention, or the capability of this person apparently began to waver or to disappear, and I soon found out that it was a matter of intimate personal affairs people were thinking of, or which were in them, even if they momentarily did not think of them when they were unconscious with other words; that the inhibition came from the unconscious and hindered the expression in speech. Then, in examining all these cases as carefully as possible, I saw that it was a matter of what Freud called repressions. I also saw what he meant by symbolization.
Dr. Evans: In other words, from your word association studies, some of the things in The Interpretation of Dreams began to fall into place.
Dr. Jung: Yes! And then I wrote a book about psychology of dementia praecox, as it was called then— now it is schizophrenia—and I sent the book to Freud, writing to him about my association experiments and how they confirmed his theory thus far. That is how my friendship with Freud began.
Dr. Evans: There were other individuals who also became interested in Dr. Freud's work, and one of them was Dr. Alfred Adler. As you remember Dr. Adler, what in your estimation led him to become interested in Dr. Freud's work?
Dr. Jung: He belonged; he was one of the young doctors that belonged to his surroundings there. There were about twenty young doctors who followed Freud there, who were—who had a sort of little society. Adler was one who happened to be there, and he learned— he studied Freud's psychology in that circle.
Dr. Evans: Another individual, of course, who joined this group was Otto Rank, and he, unlike yourself, Dr. Adler, and Dr. Freud was not a physician; did not have the Doctor of Medicine degree. Was this regarded by your group at the time as something unusual, to have someone become interested in these ideas who was not by training a physician?
Dr. Jung: Oh no! I have met many people who represented different faculties who were interested in psychology. All people who had to do with human beings were naturally interested; theologians, lawyers, pedagogues; they all had to do with the human mind and these people were naturally interested.
Dr. Evans: Then your group, including Freud, did not feel that this was exclusively an area of interest for the physician? This was something that might appeal to many?
Dr. Jung: Oh my, yes! Mind you, every patient you have gets interested in psychology .Nearly everyone thinks he is meant to be an analyst, inevitably. Carl Jung, Conversations with Carl Jung, Page 11.

Jung's Appraisal of Freud's Structural Concepts: Id, Ego, and Super-Ego (2015-06-29 04:41)

Jung's Appraisal of Freud's Structural Concepts: Id, Ego, and Super-Ego
Dr. Evans: Going still further into the development of Dr. Freud's theory, which you acknowledge as a significant factor in the development of many of your own early ideas, Dr. Freud, of course, talked a great deal about the unconscious.
Dr. Jung: As soon as research comes to a question of the unconscious, things becomes necessarily blurred, because the unconscious is something which is really unconscious!
So you have no object—nothing.
You only can make inferences because you can't see it; and so you have to create a model of this possible structure of the unconscious.
Now Freud came to the concept of the unconscious chiefly on the basis of the same experience I have had in the association experiment; namely, that people reacted—they said things—they did things—without knowing that they had done it or had said it.
This is something you can observe in the association experiment; sometimes people cannot remember afterward what they did or what they said in a moment when a stimulus word hits the complex.
In the word association reproduction experiment, you go through the whole list of words.
You see that the memory fades when there is a complex reaction or block.
That is the simple fact upon which Freud based his idea of the unconscious.

There is no end of stories, you know, about how people can betray themselves by saying something they didn't mean to say at all; yet the unconscious meant them to say just that thing.
That is what we can see, time and again, when people make a mistake in speech or they say something which they didn't mean to say; they just make ridiculous mistakes.
For instance, when you want to express your sympathy at a funeral, you go to someone and you say, "I congratulate you";
that's pretty painful, you know, but that happens, and it is true.
This is something that goes parallel with Freud's whole idea of the psychopathology of everyday life.
In Paris there was Pierre Janet who worked out another side of the understanding of unconscious reactions.
Now, Freud refers very little to Pierre Janet, but I studied with him while in Paris and he very much helped form my ideas.
He was a first class observer, though he had no systematic, dynamic psychological theory; his is a sort of physiological theory of the unconscious phenomena.
There is a certain depotentation of the tension of consciousness; it sinks below the level of consciousness and thus becomes unconscious.
That is Freud's view too, but he says it sinks down because it is helped; it is repressed from above.
That was my first point of difference with Freud.
I think there have been cases in my observations where there was no repression from above; those contents that became unconscious had withdrawn all by themselves, and not because they were repressed.
On the contrary, they have a certain autonomy.
They have discovered the concept of autonomy in that these contents that disappear have the power to move independently from my will.
Either they appear when I want to say something definite; they interfere and speak themselves instead of helping me to say what I want to say; they make me do something which I don't want to do at all; or they withdraw in the moment that I want to use them.
They certainly disappear!
Dr. Evans: And this then is independent of any of the, you might say, pressures on the consciousness as Freud suggested?
Dr. Jung: Yes.
There can be such cases, sure enough, but besides them, there are also the cases that show that the unconscious contents acquire a certain independence.
All mental contents having a certain feeling tone that is emotional have the value of an emotional affect—have the tendency to become autonomous.
So, you see, anybody in an emotion will say and do things which he cannot vouch for.
He must excuse himself of a mistake; he was non compos mentis.
Dr. Evans: Dr. Freud suggested that the individual is bom under the influence of what he called the Id, which is unconscious and undeveloped, a collection of animal drives. It is not very easily understood where all these primitive drives—all these instincts—come from.
Dr. Jung: Nobody knows where instincts come from.
They are there and you find them.
It is a story that was played millions of years ago.
Their sexuality was invented, and I don't know how this happened; I wasn't there!
Feeding was invented very much longer ago than even sex, and how and why it was invented, I don't know.
So we don't know where the instinct comes from.
It is quite ridiculous, you know, to speculate about such an impossibility.
So the question is only—where do those cases come from where instinct does not function.
That is something within our reach, because we can study the cases where instinct does not function.

Dr. Evans: Could you give us some rather specific examples of what you mean by cases where instinct does not function?
Dr. Jung: Well, you see, instead of instinct, which is a habitual form of activity, take any other form of habitual activity.
Consider a thing that is absolutely controlling which fails to function; then it's worse, and suddenly we can't think of any other thing.
For instance, a man who writes fluently suddenly makes a ridiculous mistake; then his habit hasn't functioned.
Also, when you ask me something, I'm supposed to be able to react to you; but certainly if I am pushed beyond, or if you succeed in touching upon one of my complexes, you will see that I become absolutely perplexed.
Words fail me.
Dr. Evans: We haven't seen you very perplexed yet, Dr. Jung.
Dr. Jung: I am a good example of psychology, you know, a fellow who knows his stuff quite well—the professor asks him and he cannot say a word.
Dr. Evans: To continue, another part of Dr. Freud's theory, of course, that became very important, to which we have already alluded, was the idea of the conscious; that is, out of this unconscious, instinctual "structure," the Id, an Ego emerges. Freud suggested that this ego resulted from the organism's contact with reality, perhaps a product of frustration as reality is imposed on the individual. Do you accept this conception of the ego?
Dr. Jung: If man has an ego at all, that is your question.
Ah, that is again such a case as before; I wasn't there when it was invented.
However, in this case, you see, you can observe it to a certain extent with a child.
A child definitely begins in a state where there is no ego, and about the fourth year or before, the child develops a sense of ego—"I, myself."
There is, in the first place, a certain identity with the body.
For instance, when you ask primitives, they emphasize always the body.
When you ask—who has brought this thing here—the Negro will say "I brought it," no accent on the "I," simply "brought it."
Then if you say—why have YOU brought it—he will say, you know, ME, ME, Yes, I, MYSELF, this given object, this thing here.
So the identity with the body is one of the first things which makes an ego; it is the spatial separateness that induces, apparently, the concept of an ego.
Then, of course, there are lots of other things.
Later on there are mental differences and other personal differences of all sorts.
You see, the ego is continuously building up; it is not ever a finished product—it builds up.
You see, no year passes when you do not discover a new little aspect in which you are more ego than you have thought.
Dr. Evans: Dr. Jung, there has been much discussion about how certain experiences in the early years influence the formation of the ego.
For example, one of the most extreme views concerning such early influences was advanced by Otto Rank. He spoke of the birth trauma and suggested that the trauma of being born would not only leave a very powerful impact on the developing ego, but would have residual influence throughout the life of the individual.
Dr. Jung: I should say that it is very important for an ego that it is born; this is highly traumatic, you know, when you fall out of heaven.
Dr. Evans: However, do you take literally Dr. Otto Rank's position that the birth trauma has a profound psychological effect on the individual?

Dr. Jung: Of course it influences you.
If you believe in Schopenhauer's philosophy, you say, "it is a hellish trauma to be born."
Well, there is a Greek saying that "it is beautiful to die in youth, but the most beautiful of all things is not to be born."
Philosophy, you see.
Dr. Evans: But you don't take this as a literal psychic event?
Dr. Jung: Don't you see, this is an event that happens to everybody that exists—that each man once has been born.
Everybody who is born has undergone that trauma, so the word has lost its meaning.
It is a general fact, and you cannot say "it is a trauma"; it is just a fact, because you cannot observe a psychology that hasn't been born —only then you could say what the birth trauma is.
Until then, you cannot even speak of such a thing; it is just a lack of epistemology.
Dr. Evans: In his later writing, in addition to the ego, Freud introduced a term to describe a particular function of the ego. That term was the Super-Ego. Broadly speaking, the super-ego was to account for the "moral restrictive" function of the ego.
Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the super-ego, namely that codex of what you can do and what you cannot do.
Dr. Evans: Built-in prohibitions which Freud thought might be partly acquired and partly "built-in."
Dr. Jung: Yes.
However, Freud doesn't see the difference between the "built-in" and the acquired.
You see, he must have it almost entirely within himself; otherwise, there could be no balance in the individual.
And who in Hell would have invented the Decalogue? That is not invented by Moses, but that is the eternal truth in man himself, because he checks himself. Carl Jung Conversations Evans, Pages 14-16.

Carl Jung on the Anima and Animus (2015-06-29 09:00)

Dr. Evans: To be more specific, Dr. Jung, you have used the concepts, anima and animus, which you are now identifying in terms of sex, male or female. I wonder if you could elaborate perhaps even more specifically on these terms? Take the term ”anima” first. Is this again part of the inherited nature of the individual?
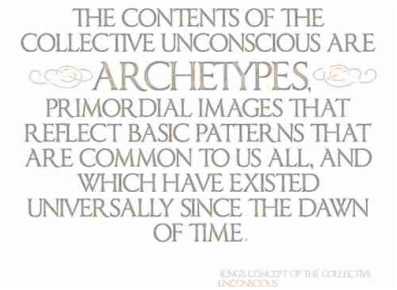
Dr. Jung: Well, this is a bit complicated, you know.
The anima is an archetypal form, expressing the fact that a man has a minority of feminine or female genes.
That is something that doesn’t appear or disappear in him, that is constantly present, and works as a female in a man.
As early as the 16th century, the Humanists had discovered that man had an anima, and that each man carried female within himself.
They said it; it is not a modem invention.
The same is the case with the animus.

It is a masculine image in a woman's mind which is sometimes quite conscious, sometimes not quite conscious; but it is called into life the moment that woman meets a man who says the right things.
Then because he says it, it is all true and he is the fellow, no matter what he is.
Those are particularly well-founded archetypes, those two.
And you can lay hands on their bases. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 16-18.

Carl Jung on: The Unconscious: Archetypes (2015-06-29 09:55)



Carl Jung on: The Unconscious: Archetypes
Dr. Evans: You mentioned earlier that Freud's Oedipal situation was an example of an archetype. At this time would you please elaborate on the concept, archetype?
Dr. Jung: Well, you know what a behavior pattern is, the way in which a weaver bird builds its nest.
That is an inherited form in him.
He will apply certain symbiotic phenomena, between insects and plants.
They are inherited patterns of behavior.
And so man has, of course, an inherited scheme of functioning.
You see, his liver, his heart, all his organs, and his brain will always function in a certain way, following its pattern.
You may have a great difficulty seeing it because you cannot compare it.
There are no other similar beings like man, that are articulate, that could give an account of their functioning. If that were the case, we could—I don't know what.
But because we have no means of comparison, we are necessarily unconscious about the whole conditions.
It is quite certain, however, that man is born with a certain functioning, a certain way of functioning, a certain pattern of behavior which is expressed in the form of archetypal images, or archetypal forms.
For instance, the way in which a man should behave is expressed by an archetype.
Therefore, you see, the primitives tell such stories. A great deal of education goes through story telling.
For instance, they call together the young men, and two older men act out before the eyes of the younger all the things they should not do.
Then they say, "Now that's exactly the thing you shall not do."
Another way is they tell them all of the things they should not do, like the Decalogue, "Thou shalt not," and that is always supported by mythological tales.
That, of course, gave me a motive to study the archetypes, because I began to see that the structure of what I then called the collective unconscious was really a sort of agglomeration of such typical images, each of which had a unique quality.
The archetypes are, at the same time, dynamic.
They are instinctual images that are not intellectually invented.

They are always there and they produce certain processes in the unconscious that one could best compare with myths.
That's the origin of mythology.
Mythology is a pronouncing of a series of images that formulate the life of archetypes.
So the statements of every religion, of many poets, etc., are statements about the inner mythological process, which is a necessity because man is not complete if he is not conscious of that aspect of things.
For instance, our ancestors have done so and so, and so shall you do.
Or such and such a hero has done so and so, and that is your model.
For instance, in the teachings of the Catholic church, there are several thousand saints.
They show us how to do— They have their legends— And that is Christian mythology.
In Greece, you know, there was Theseus and there was Heracles, models of fine men, of gentlemen, you know; and they teach us how to behave.
They are archetypes of behavior.
I became more and more respectful of archetypes, and that naturally led me on to a profound study of them.
And now, by Jove, there is an enormous factor, very important for our further development and for our well-being, that should be taken into account.
It was, of course, difficult to know where to begin, because it is such an enormously extended field.
And the next question I asked myself was, "Now, where in the world has anybody been busy with that problem?"
I found that nobody had except a peculiar spiritual movement that went together with the beginning of Christianity, namely, the Gnostics; and that was the first thing actually that I saw.
They were concerned with the problem of archetypes, and made a peculiar philosophy of it.
Everybody makes a peculiar philosophy of it when he comes across it naively, and doesn't know that those are structural elements of the unconscious psyche.
The Gnostics lived in the first, second and third centuries; and I wanted to know what was in between that time and today, when we suddenly are confronted by the problems of the collective unconscious which were the same two thousand years ago, though we are not prepared to admit that problem.
I was always looking for something in between, you know, something that would link that remote past with the present moment.
I found to my amazement that it was alchemy, that which is understood to be a history of chemistry.
It was, one could almost say, nothing less than that. It was a peculiar spiritual movement or a philosophical movement.
They called themselves philosophers, like Narcissism.
And then I read the whole accessible literature, Latin and Greek.
I studied it because it was enormously interesting.
It [Alchemy] is the mental work of 1,700 years, in which there is stored up all they could make out about the nature of the archetypes, in a peculiar way that's foolish.
It is not simple.
Most of the texts are no more published since the middle ages, the last editions dated in the middle or the end of the sixteenth century, all in Latin; some texts are in Greek, not a few very important ones.
That has given me no end of work, but the result was most satisfactory, because it showed me the development of our unconscious relation to the collective unconscious and the variations our consciousness has undergone; why the being's unconscious is concerned with these mythological images.

For instance, such phenomena as in Hitler, you know.
That is a psychical phenomenon, and we've got to understand these things.
To me, of course, it has been an enormous problem because it is a factor that has determined the fate of millions of European people, and of Americans.
Nobody can deny that he has been influenced by the war.
That was all Hitler's doing—and that's all psychology, our foolish psychology.
But you only come to an understanding of these things when you understand the background from which it springs.
It is just as though, as if a terrific epidemic of typhoid fever were breaking out, and you say, "That is typhoid fever—isn't that a marvelous disease!"
It can take on enormous dimensions and nobody knows anything about it. Nobody takes care of the water supply, nobody thinks of examining the meat or anything like that; but everyone simply states, "This is a phenomenon."—Yes, but one doesn't understand it.
Of course, I cannot tell you in detail about alchemy.
It is the basic of our modern way of conceiving things, and therefore, it is as if it were right under the threshold of consciousness.
This is a wonderful picture of how the development of archetypes, the movement of archetypes, looks when you look upon them with broader perspective.
Maybe from today you look back into the past and you see how the present moment has evolved out of the past.
It is just as if the alchemistic philosophy— That sounds very curious; we should give it an entirely different name.
Actually, it has a different name.
It [Alchemy] is also called Hermetic Philosophy, though, of course, that conveys just as little as the term alchemy.—It was the parallel development, as Narcissism was, to the conscious development of Christianity, of our Christian philosophy, of the whole psychology of the middle ages.
So you see, in our days we have such and such a view of the world, a particular philosophy, but in the unconscious we have a different one.
That we can see through the example of the alchemistic philosophy that behaves to the medieval consciousness exactly like the unconscious behaves to ourselves.
And we can construct or even predict the unconscious of our days when we know what it has been yesterday.
Or, for instance, to take a more concise archetype, like the archetype of the ford—the ford to a river.
Now that is a whole situation.
You have to cross a ford; you are in the water; and there is an ambush or a water animal, say a crocodile or something like that.
There is danger and something is going to happen.
The problem is how you escape.
Now this is a whole situation and it makes an archetype.
And that archetype has now a suggestive effect upon you.
For instance, you get into a situation; you don't know what the situation is; you suddenly are seized by an emotion or by a spell; and you behave in a certain way you have not foreseen at all—you do something quite strange to yourself.
Dr. Evans: Could this also be described as spontaneous?
Dr. Jung: Quite spontaneous.
And that is done through the archetype that is concerned.
Of course, we have a famous case in our Swiss history of the King Albrecht, who was murdered in the ford of the Royce not very far from Zurich.
His murderers were hiding behind him for the whole stretch from Zurich to the Royce, quite a long stretch, and after deliberating, still couldn't come together about whether they wanted to kill the king or not.

The moment the king rode into the ford, they thought, "Murder!"
They shouted, "Why do we let him abuse us?"
Then they killed him, because this was the moment they were seized; this was the right moment.
So you see, when you have lived in primitive circumstances, in the primeval forest among primitive populations, then you know that phenomenon.
You are seized with a certain spell and you do a thing that is unexpected.
Several times when I was in Africa, I went into such situations where I was amazed afterwards.
One day I was in the Sudan and it was really a very dangerous situation, which I didn't recognize at the moment at all.
But I was seized with a spell.
I did something which I wouldn't have expected and I couldn't have intended.
You see, the archetype is a force. It has an autonomy, and it can suddenly seize you. It is like a seizure.
So, for instance, falling in love at first sight, that is such a case.
You have a certain image in yourself, without knowing it, of the woman—of any woman.
You see that girl, or at least a good imitation of your type, and instantly you get the seizure; you are caught.
And after ward you may discover that ⍰ it was a hell of a mistake.
You see, a man is quite capable, or is intelligent enough to see that the woman of his choice was no choice; he has been captured!
He sees that she is no good at all, that she is a hell of a business, and he tells me so.
He says, "For God's sake, doctor, help me to get rid of that woman." He can't though, and he is like clay in her fingers.
That is the archetype.
It has all happened because of the archetype of the anima, though he thinks it is all his soul, you know.
It is like the girl—any girl.
When a man sings very high, for instance, sings a high C, she thinks he must have a very wonderful spiritual character, and she is badly disappointed when she marries that particular "letter."
Well, that's the archetype of the animus.
Dr. Evans: Now Dr. Jung, to be even a bit more specific, you have suggested that in our society, in all societies, there are symbols that in a sense direct or determine what a man does. Then you also suggest that somehow these symbols become "inborn" and, in part, "inbred."
Dr. Jung: They don't become; they are.
They are to begin with. You see, we are born into a pattern; we are a pattern.
We are a structure that is pre-established through the genes.
Dr. Evans: To recapitulate then, the archetype is just a higher order of an instinctual pattern, such as your earlier example of a bird building a nest.Is that how you intended to describe it?
Dr. Jung: It is a biological order of our mental functioning, as, for instance, our biological-physiological function follows a pattern.
The behavior of any bird or insect follows a pattern, and that is the same with us.
Man has a certain pattern that makes him specifically human, and no man is born without it.
We are only deeply unconscious of these facts because we live by all our senses and outside of ourselves.
If a man could look into himself, he could discover it.
When a man discovers it in our days, he thinks he is crazy—really crazy.
Dr. Evans: Now would you say the number of such archetypes are limited or predetermined, or can the number be increased?
Dr. Jung: Well, I don't know what I do know about it; it is so blurred.
You see, we have no means of comparison.
We know and we see that there is a behavior, say like incest; or there is a behavior of violence, a certain kind of violence; or there is a behavior of panic, of power, etc.

Those are areas, as it were, in which there are many variations.
It can be expressed in this way or that way, you know.
And they overlap, and often you cannot say where the one form begins or ends.
It is nothing concise, because the archetype in itself is completely unconscious and you only can see the effects of it.
You can see, for instance, when you know a person is possessed by an archetype; then you can divine and even prognosticate possible developments.
This is true because when you see that the man is caught by a certain type of woman in a certain very specific way, you know that he is caught by the anima.
Then the whole thing will have such and such complications and such and such developments because it is typical.
The way the anima is described is exceedingly typical.
I don't know if you know Rider Haggard's She, or L'Atlantide by Benoît—c'est la femme fatale.
Dr. Evans: To be more specific, Dr. Jung, you have used the concepts, anima and animus, which you are now identifying in terms of sex, male or female. I wonder if you could elaborate perhaps even more specifically on these terms? Take the term "anima" first. Is this again part of the inherited nature of the individual?
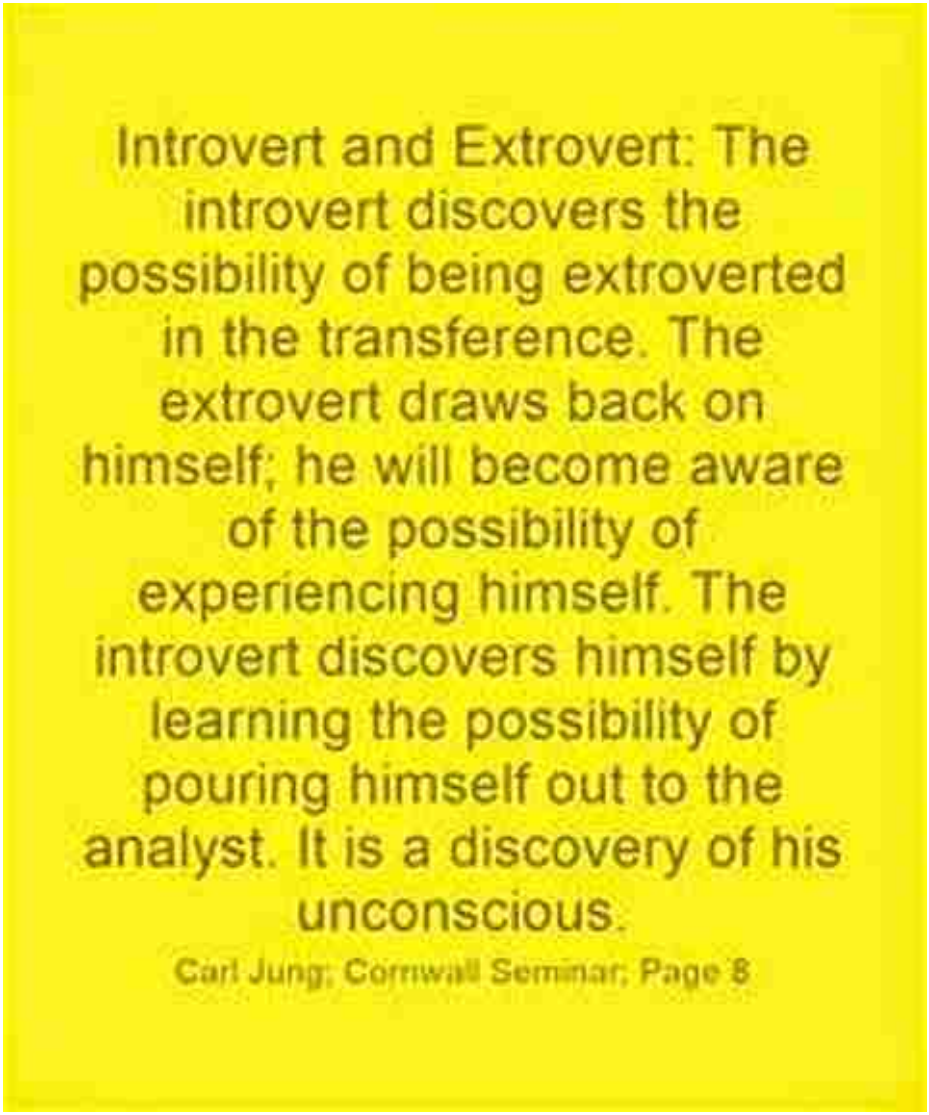
Dr. Jung: Well, this is a bit complicated, you know.
The anima is an archetypal form, expressing the fact that a man has a minority of feminine or female genes.
That is something that doesn't appear or disappear in him, that is constantly present, and works as a female in a man.
As early as the 16th century, the Humanists had discovered that man had an anima, and that each man carried female within himself.
They said it; it is not a modem invention.
The same is the case with the animus.
It is a masculine image in a woman's mind which is sometimes quite conscious, sometimes not quite conscious; but it is called into life the moment that woman meets a man who says the right things.
Then because he says it, it is all true and he is the fellow, no matter what he is.
Those are particularly well-founded archetypes, those two.
And you can lay hands on their bases. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 16-18.

Carl Jung on Introversion-Extraversion and Fantasy (2015-06-30 06:23)



Dr. Evans: Dr. Jung, another set of ideas, original with you and very well known to the world, center around the terms ”introversion” and ”extroversion.” I know that you are aware that these terms have now become so widely known that the man on the street is using them constantly in describing members of his family, his friends, and so on. They have become probably the psychological concepts most often used by the layman today.

Dr. Jung: Like the word ”complex”—I invented it too, you know, from the association experiments—this is simply practical, because there are certain people who definitely are more influenced by their surroundings than by their own intentions, while other people are more influenced by the subjective factor.
Now you see, the subjective factor, which is very characteristic, was understood by Freud as a sort of pathological auto-egotism.
Now this is a mistake. The psyche has two conditions, two important conditions. The one is environmental influence and the other is the given fact of the psyche as it is born.
As I told you yesterday, the psyche is by no means tabula rasa here, but a definite mixture and combination of genes, which are there from the very first moment of our life; and they give a definite character, even to the little child.
That is a subjective factor, looked at from the outside.
Now if you look at it from the inside, then it is just so as if you would observe the world.
When you observe the world, you see people; you see houses; you see the sky; you see tangible objects.
But when you observe yourself within, you see moving images, a world of images generally known as fantasies.
Yet these fantasies are facts.
You see, it is a fact that the man has such and such a fantasy; and it is such a tangible fact, for instance, that when a man has a certain fantasy, another man may lose his life, or a bridge is built.
These houses were all fantasies.
Everything you do here, all this, everything, was fantasy to begin with, and fantasy has a proper reality.
That is not to be forgotten; fantasy is not nothing.
It is, of course, not a tangible object; but it is a fact nevertheless.
Fantasy is, you see, a form of energy, despite the fact that we can’t measure it.
It is a manifestation of something, and that is a reality.
That is a reality, like for instance, the Peace Treaty of Versailles, or something like that.
It is no more; you can’t show it; but it has been a fact.
And so psychical events are facts, are realities.
And when you observe the stream of images within, you observe an aspect of the world, of the world within, because the psyche, if you understand it as a phenomenon that takes place in so-called living bodies, is a quality of matter, as our bodies consist of matter.
We discover that this matter has another aspect, namely, a psychic aspect.
And so it is simply the world from within, seen from within.
It is just as though you were seeing into another aspect of matter.
That is an idea that is not my invention.
The old credos already talked of the spiritus atomis, namely, the spirit that is inserted in atoms.
That means psychic is a quality that appears in matter.
It doesn’t matter whether we understand it or not, but this is the conclusion we come to if we draw conclusions without prejudices.
And so you see, the man who is going by the external world, by the influence of the external world—say society or sense perceptions—thinks that he is more valid, you know, because this is valid, this is real; and the man who goes by the subjective factor is not valid, because the subjective factor is nothing.
No, that man is just as well based, because he bases himself upon the world from within.
And so he is quite right even if he says, ”Oh, it is nothing but my fantasies.” And of course, that is the introvert, and the introvert is always afraid of the external world.
This he will tell you when you ask him.

He will be apologetic about it; he will say, ”Yes, I know, those are my fantasies.”
And he has always resentment against the world in general.
Particularly America is extroverted.
The introvert has no place, because he doesn’t know that he beholds the world from within.
That gives him dignity, and that gives him certainty, because it is the psyche of man. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22.

Dr. Jung on misconceptions about ”Types. (2015-06-30 11:01)

Dr. Evans: Of course, one of the very common misconceptions, at least in my opinion, about your work among some of the writers in America is that they have characterized your discussion of introversion and extroversion as suggesting that the world is made up of only two kinds of people, introverts and extroverts. I’m sure you have been aware of this. Would you like to comment on it? In other words, do you perceive of the world as one made up only of people who are extreme introverts and people who are extreme extroverts?

Dr. Jung: Bismarck once said, ”God may protect me against my friends; with my enemies I can deal myself alone.”
You know how people are.
They have a catch word, and then everything is schematized along that word.
There is no such thing as a pure □ extrovert or a pure introvert.
Such a man would be in the lunatic asylum.
Those are only terms to designate a certain penchant, a certain tendency.
For instance, the tendency to be more influenced by environmental influences, or more influenced by the subjective fact—that’s all.
There are people who are fairly well-balanced who are just as much influenced from within as from without, or just as little.
And so with all the definite classifications, you know, they are only a sort of point to refer to, points for orientation.
There is no such thing as a schematic classification.
Often you have great trouble even to make out to what type a man belongs, either because he is very well□ balanced or he is very neurotic.
The last one is hard because when vou are neurotic, then you have always a certain dissociation of personality.
And then too, the people themselves don’t know when they react consciously or when they react unconsciously.
So you can talk to somebody, and you think he is conscious.
He knows what he says, and to your amazement you discover after a while that he is quite unconscious of it, doesn’t know it.
It is a long and painstaking procedure to find out of what a man is conscious and of what he is not conscious, because the unconscious plays in him all the time.
Certain things are conscious; certain things are unconscious; but you can’t always tell.
You have to ask people, ”Now are you conscious of what you say?”
Or, ”Did you notice?”
And you discover suddenly that there are quite a number of things that he didn’t know at all.
For instance, certain people have many reasons; everybody can see them. They themselves don’t know it at all.
Dr. Evans: Then this whole matter of extremes—introvert and extrovert—you say is a schematic approach, a frame of reference.
Dr. Jung: My whole scheme of typology is merely a sort of orientation.
There is such a factor as introversion; there is such a factor as extroversion. The classification of individuals means nothing at all. It is only the instrumentality, or what I call ”practical psychology,” used to explain, for instance, the husband to a wife, or vice versa.
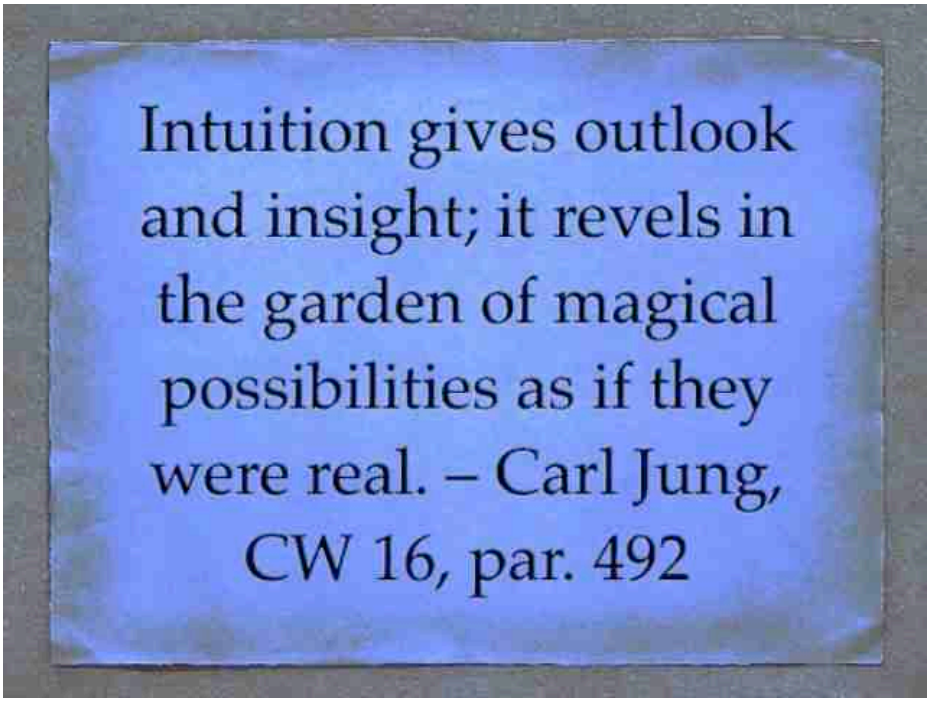
It is very often the case, for instance—I might say it is almost a rule, but I don’t want to make too many rules in order not to be schematic— that an introvert marries an extrovert for compensation, or another type marries a countertype to complement himself.
For example, a man who has made a certain amount of money is a good business man, but he has no education.
His dream is, of course, a grand piano at home and being around artists, painters or singers or God knows what, and intellectual people; and he marries accordingly a wife of that type, in order to have that too.
She has it, and she marries him because he has a lot of money.
These compensations go on all the time.
When you study marriages, you can see it easily.
And, of course, we analysts have to deal a lot with marriages, particularly those that go wrong, because the types are too different sometimes and they don’t understand each other at all.
You see, the main values of the extrovert are anathema to the introvert, and he says, ”To hell with the world, I think.”
His wife interprets this as his megalomania.
But it is just as if an extrovert said to an introvert, ”Now, look here fellow; these here are the facts; this is reality.”
And he’s right! And the other says, ”But I think, I hold—,” and that sounds like nonsense to the extrovert because he doesn’t know that the other one, without knowing it, is beholding an inner world, an inner reality; and that other one may be right, as he may be wrong, even if he found himself upon God knows what solid facts.
Take, for instance, the interpretation of statistics.

You can prove almost anything with statistics.
What is more a fact than a statistic? Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 23.

Carl Jung on the ”Intuitive Extrovert” and ”Intuitive Introvert.” (2015-06-30 15:34)



Dr. Evans: More specifically, what would be an example of the difference between an intuitive extrovert and an intuitive introvert?
Dr. Jung: Well, you have chosen a somewhat difficult case, because one of the most difficult types is the intuitive introvert.
The intuitive extrovert you find in all kinds of bankers, gamblers, etc., which is quite understandable.
The introvert is more difficult because he has intuitions as to the subjective factor, namely the inner world; and, of course, that is very difficult to understand because what he sees are most uncommon things, things which he doesn’t like to talk about if he is not a fool.
If he did, he would spoil his own game by telling what he sees, because people won’t understand it.
For instance, once I had a patient, a young woman about 27 or 28.
Immediately after I had seated her, she said, ”You know, doctor, I came to you because I’ve a snake in my abdomen.”
What! ”Yes, a black snake coiled up in the bottom of my abdomen.”
I must have made an awful face at her, so she said, ”You know that I don’t mean it literally.”
I then replied, however, ”If you say it was a snake, it was a snake.”
In a later conversation with her, which took place about in the middle of her treatment, treatment that only lasted for ten consultations, she reminded me of something she had foretold me.

She had said, ”I come ten times and then it will be all right,” to which I responded with the question, ”How do you know?”
”Oh, I’ve got a hunch,” she said.
Now at about the fifth or sixth hour she said, ”Doctor, I must tell you that the snake has risen; it is now about here.”
A hunch.
Then on the tenth day I said, ”Now this is our last hour, and do you feel cured?”
Just beaming, she replied, ”You know, this morning it came up, came out of my mouth, and the head was golden.”
Those were her last words.
When it comes to reality now, that same girl came to me because she couldn’t hear the step of her feet anymore, because she walked on air, literally. She couldn’t hear it, and that frightened her.
When I asked for her address, she said, ”Oh, Pension so and so.
Well, it is not just called a pension, but it is a sort of pension.”
I had never heard of it.
”I have never heard of that place,” I said.
She replied, ”It is a very nice place.
There are only young girls there; they are all very nice young girls, very lovely young girls, and they have a merry time.
I often wish they would invite me to their merry evenings.”
And I said, ”Do they amuse themselves all alone?”
”No,” she replied, ”there are plenty of young gentlemen coming in; they have a beautiful time, but they never invite me.”
It turned out that this was a private brothel.
She was a perfectly decent girl from a very good family, not from here.
She had found that place, I don’t know how, and she was completely unaware that they were all prostitutes.
I said, ”For heaven’s sake, you fell into a very tough place; you’ll hasten to get out of it.”
She didn’t see reality, but she had hunches like everything, vraiment.
Such a person cannot possibly speak of her experiences because everybody would think she was absolutely crazy.
I myself was quite shocked, and I thought, ”For heaven’s sake, is that case a schizophrenic?”
You don’t normally hear that kind of speech; but she assumed that the old man, of course, knew everything and did understand such kind of language.
So you see, if the introverted intuitive would speak what he really perceives, practically no one would understand him; he would be misunderstood.
Thus they learn to keep things to themselves.
You hardly ever hear them talking of these things.
In a way, that is a great disadvantage, but in another way it is an enormous advantage that these people do not speak of their experiences, both their inward experiences and those which occur in human relations.
For instance, they may come into the presence of somebody they don’t know, not from Adam, and suddenly they may have inner images.
Now these inner images may give them a great deal of information about the psychology of that person they have just met.
That is typical of cases that often happen.
They suddenly know an important piece of the biography of that person, and if they did not keep things to themselves, they would tell the story.
Then the fat would be in the fire!
So the intuitive introvert has in a way a very difficult life, although it is a most interesting one.
It is quite difficult to get into their confidence.
Dr. Evans: Yes, because they are afraid people will think . . .

Dr. Jung: They are sick.
The things that they hint at are interesting to them, are vital to them, and are utterly strange to the ordinary individual. A psychologist, however, should know of such things.
When people make a psychology, as a psychologist ought to do, it is the very first question—is he introverted or extroverted?
The psychologist must look at entirely different things.
He sees the sensation type; he sees the intuitive type; he sees thinking and feeling types.
These things are complicated.
They are still more complicated because the introverted thinking, for instance, is compensated by extroverted feeling, inferior, archaic, extroverted feeling.
So an introverted thinker may be crude in his feeling, like for instance the introverted philosopher who is always carefully avoiding women may be married by his cook in the end.
Dr. Evans: So we can take your introvert-extrovert orientations and describe a number of types; the sensation-introvert and extrovert types, the feeling-introvert and extrovert types, thinking-introvert and extrovert types, and the intuitive-introvert and extrovert types. In each case these combinations do not represent a concrete category but simply, as you have indicated, a model that can be helpful in understanding the individual.
Dr. Jung: It is just a sort of skeleton to which you have to add the flesh.
One could say that it is like a country mapped out by triangulation points, which doesn't mean that the country consists of triangulation points; that is only in order to have an idea of the distances.
And so it is a means to an end.
It only makes sense as a scheme when you deal with practical cases.
For instance, if you have to explain an introverted-intuitive husband to an extrovert wife, it is a most painstaking affair because, you see, an extrovert sensation type is furtherest away from the inner experience and the rational functions.
He adapts and behaves according to the facts as they are, and he is always caught by those facts.
He himself is those facts.
But if the introvert is intuitive, to him that is hell, because as soon as he is in a definite situation, he tries to find a hole where he can get out.
To him, every given situation is just the worst that can happen to him.
He is pinched and feels he is caught, suffocated, chained.
He must break those fetters, because he is the man who will discover a new field. He will plant that field, and as soon as the new plants are coming up, he's done; he's over and no more interested.
Others will reap what he has sown.
When those two marry, the extrovert-sensation and the introvert-intuitive, there is trouble, I can assure you. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 25-26.

Carl Jung on “Motivational Concepts” (2015-07-01 08:44)

Dr. Evans: One question which is quite important as we attempt to understand the individual centers around the problem of motivation, why the person does what he does. To some degree you have already talked about this when you discussed archetypes. However, to go further into this problem, earlier when we discussed the libido, that which Freud considered a psychic, sexual energy, you may recall your suggestion that it was more than just sexual energy. You suggested that it could be something much broader. You have certain principles concerning psychic energy which are very provocative, and one of these principles, I believe you refer to as the principle of entropy.
Dr. Jung: Well, I alluded to it.
The main point is to take the standpoint of energetics as applied to psychical phenomena.
Now with psychical phenomena you have no possibility to measure exactly, so it always remains a sort of analogy.
Freud uses the term ”libido” in the sense of sexual energy, and that is not quite correct.
If it is sexual, then it is a power, like electricity or any other form or manifestation of energy.
Now energy is a concept by which you try to express the analogies of all power manifestations; namely, that they have a certain quality, a certain intensity, and there is a flow in one direction, viz., to the ultimate suspension of the opposites. Low-high-height —a lake on a mountain flows down until all the water is down, you know, then it is finished.
And you see something similar in the case in psychology.
We get tired from intellectual work or from consciously living, and then we must sleep to restore our powers.
Then by sleeping through the night, it is as if the water were pumped from a lower level to a higher level, and we can work again the next day.
Of course, that simile is limping too, so it is only in an analogous way that we use the term ”energy.”
I used it because I wanted to express the fact that the power manifestation of sexuality is not the only power manifestation.
You have a number of drives, say the drive to conquer or the drive to be aggressive, or any number of others.

There are many forms.
For instance, you take animals, the way they are building their nests, or the urge of the traveling birds that migrate.
They all are driven by a sort of energy manifestation, and the meaning of the word ”sexuality” would be entirely gone if all these different urges and drives were included in its definition. Freud himself says that this is not applicable everywhere, and later on he corrected himself by assuming that there are also ego drives.
That is something else, another manifestation.
Now in order not to presume or to prejudice things, I speak simply of energy, and energy is a quantity of energy that can manifest itself via sexuality or via any other instinct.
That is the main feature, not the existence of one single power.
Dr. Evans: Many approaches to motivation in our academic psychology today emphasize what is sometimes referred to as a biocentric theory. It suggests that the individual is bom with certain inborn physiological, self-preserving types of drives, such as the drive for hunger, thirst, etc. Sex is just one of them. In the case of all these drives, however, their satisfaction i s necessary to the maintenance of the organism. Then as the individual is influenced by reality and the culture in which he lives, these primary drives are modified in terms of the society in which he functions. For example, as a result of specific cultural influences, the general hunger drive is supplemented by a specific urge for certain kinds of food. Later, if this is important in the culture in which he lives, he may develop needs for social approval, influencing further his food preferences, and so on. Would this general approach to the understanding of the development of motivations be consistent with your ideas? Would you say that basic, innate, instinctual patterns are modified by the environment or culture to which they are subjected?
Dr. Jung: Yes, certainly.
Dr. Evans: Also, concerning motivation, or the condition which arouses, directs, and sustains the individual, there appear to be two views found in much of our psychology in America today. One might be called an historical view, as illustrated by the biocentric theory just discussed, where we try to look at the history and development of the individual for answers as to why he is doing a certain thing at the moment. Then we have another view, postulated and discussed by Dr. Kurt Lewin, which is a field theory. He did not believe that the history—the past —was the most important element in motivation. Instead he suggested that all the conditions which affect the individual at a given moment help us to best understand the individual and predict his behavior. Do you think that the ”present field” idea of Dr. Lewin has any virtue?
Dr. Jung: Well, obviously I always insist that even a chronic neurosis has its true cause in the moment now.
You see, the neurosis is made every day by the wrong attitude the individual has.
On the other hand, however, that wrong attitude is a sort of fact that needs to be explained historically, by things that have happened in the past.
But that is one-sided too, because all psychological facts are oriented, not only to course, but also to a certain goal.
They are, in a way, physiological; namely, they serve as a purpose, so the wrong attitude can have originated in a certain way long ago.
It is equally true, however, that it wouldn’t exist today any more if there were not immediate causes and immediate purposes to keep it alive today.
Because of this, a neurosis can be finished suddenly on a certain day, despite all causes.

One has observed in the beginning of the war cases of compulsion neuroses which had lasted for many years and suddenly were cured, because they got into an entirely new condition.
It is like a shock, you see.
Even the schizophrenic can be vastly improved by a shock because that's a new condition; it is a very shocking thing, so it shocks them out of their habitual attitude.
Once they are no more in it, the whole thing collapses, the whole system that has been built up for years.
Dr. Evans: You have brought up many interesting and provocative ideas here. Another concept related to motivational development is the process of individuation, a process to which you frequently refer in your writing. Would you like to comment about this process of individuation, how all these factors move toward a whole— a totality?
Dr. Jung: Well, you know, that's something quite simple.
Take an acorn, put it into the ground, and watch it grow and become an oak.
That is man.
Man develops from an egg, and develops into the whole man; that is the law that is in him.
Dr. Evans: So you think the psychic development is in many ways like the biological development.
Dr. Jung: The psychic development is out of the world; it is something else, or maybe an opinion.
It is a fact that people develop in their psychical development on the same principle as they develop in the body.
Why should we assume that it is a different principle?
It is really the same kind of evolutionary behavior as the body shows.
Consider for instance, those animals that have specially differentiated anatomical characteristics, those of the teeth or something like that.
Well, they have a mental behavior which is in accordance with those organs.
Dr. Evans: So as you see it, there is no need to bring in other types of ideas, other types of theories to explain development. The basic biological law is still—
Dr. Jung: The psyche is nothing different from the living being. It is the psychical aspect of the living being. It is even the psychical aspect of matter. It is a quality. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 26-27

Carl Jung and Synchronicity (2015-07-02 04:47)

Dr. Evans: We might go a little further into some of your recent works in this area which many consider quite profound, but are not too well known to many of our students.
Dr. Jung: Of course not.
Nobody in the general public actually reads these things.
Of course, my books are at least sold.
Dr. Evans: To be more specific, I'm referring to the concept, synchronicity, which you have discussed, and which has some relevance at this point in our discussion. Would you care to comment on synchronicity?
Dr. Jung: That is awfully complicated.
One wouldn't know where to begin.
Of course, this kind of thinking started long ago, and when Rhine brought out his results, I thought,
"Now we have at least a more or less dependable basis to argue on."
But the argument has not been understood at all, because it is really very difficult.
When you observe the unconscious, you will come across plenty of cases which show a very peculiar kind of parallel events.
For example, I have a certain thought of a certain definite subject which is occupying my attention and my interest; and at the same time, something else happens, quite independently, that portrays just that thought.
This is utter nonsense, you know, looked at from a causal point of view.
However, that there is something else to it which is not nonsense is made evident by the results of Rhine's experiments.
There is a probability; it is something more than chance that such a case occurs.
I never made statistical experiments except one in the way of Rhine.
I made one for another purpose.
But I have come across quite a number of cases where it was most astounding to find that two causal chains happened at the same time, but independent of each other, so that you could say they had nothing to do with each other.

It's really quite clear.
For instance, I speak of a red car and at that moment a red car comes here.
Now I haven't seen the red car, because it wasn't possible; it was hidden behind the building until just this moment when it suddenly appeared.
Now many would say that this is an example of mere chance, but the Rhine experiment proves that these cases are not mere chance.
Now it would be superstitious and false to say, "This car has appeared because here were some remarks made about a red car; it is a miracle that a red car has appeared."
It is not a miracle; it is just chance—but these chances happen more often than chance allows.
That shows that there is something behind it.
Rhine has a whole institute, many co-workers, and has the means.
We have no means here to make such experiments; otherwise, I probably would have done them.
Here it is just physically impossible, so I have to content myself with the observation of facts!! Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 33-34.

Carl Jung on Emotional Components affecting Bodily Functions (2015-07-02 05:04)

Dr. Evans: An interesting area which is being discussed a lot in the United States today, and I'm sure is of interest to you as well, is that of psychosomatic medicine, an area dealing with the way in which emotional components of personality can affect bodily functions.
Dr. Jung: As an example of this, I see a lot of astounding cures of tuberculosis—chronic tuberculosis—effected by analysts; people learn to breathe again.
The understanding of what their complexes were—that has helped them.
Dr. Evans: When did you first become interested in the psychic factors of tuberculosis? Many years ago?
Dr. Jung: I was an analyst to begin with; I was always interested naturally.
Maybe also because I understood so little of it, or more importantly, I noticed that I understood so little.
Dr. Evans: To expand on my earlier question, we are right now becoming more and more interested in the United States in how emotional, unconscious personality factors can actually have an effect on the body. Of course, the classic example in the literature is the peptic ulcer. It is believed that this is a case where emotional factors have actually created pathology.

These ideas have been extended into many other areas.
It is felt, for example, that where there already is pathology, these emotional factors can intensify it.
Or sometimes there may be actual symptoms or fears concerning pathology when no true pathology exists, such as in cases of hysteria or hypochondriasis.
For example, many physicians in America say that 60 to 70 percent of their patients do not have anything really physically wrong with them, but they instead have disorders of psychosomatic origin.
Dr. Jung: Yes, that is well known—since more than fifty years.
The question is how to cure them. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 34-35.

Carl Jung on the patient selecting the symptoms of their disease. (2015-07-02 05:30)

Dr. Evans: Speaking of such psychosomatic disturbances, as, for instance, your experiences and studies into tuberculosis, do you have any ideas as to why the patient selects this type of symptom?
Dr. Jung: He doesn't select; they happen to him.
You could ask just as well when you are eaten by a crocodile, "How did you happen to select that crocodile?"
Nonsense, he has selected you.

Dr. Evans: Of course, ”selected” in this sense refers to an unconscious process.
Dr. Jung: No, not even unconsciously.
That is an extraordinary exaggeration of the importance of the subject, to say he was choosing such things.
They get him.
Dr. Evans: Perhaps one of the most radical suggestions in the area of psychosomatic medicine has been the suggestion that some forms of cancer may have psychosomatic components as causal factors. Would this surprise you?
Dr. Jung: Not at all.
We know these since long ago, you know.
Fifty years ago we already had these cases; ulcer of the stomach, tuberculosis, chronic arthritis, skin diseases.
All are psychogenic under certain conditions.
Dr. Evans: And even cancer?
Dr. Jung: Well you see, I couldn’t swear, but I have seen cases where I thought or wondered whether or not there was a psychogenic reason for that particular ailment; it came too conveniently.
Many things can be found out about cancer, I’m sure.
You see, with us it has been always a question of how to treat these things, because any disease possible has a psychological accompaniment.
It just all depends upon —perhaps life depends upon it—whether you treat such a patient psychologically in the proper way or not.
That can help tremendously, even if you cannot prove in the least that the disease in itself is psychogenic.
You can have an infectious disease in a certain moment, that is, a physical ailment or predicament, because you are particularly accessible to an infection—maybe sometimes because of a psychological attitude.
Angina is such a typical psychological disease; yet it is not psychological in its physical consequences.
It’s just an infection.
So you ask, ”Then why does psychology have anything to do with it?”
Because it was the psychological moment maybe that allowed the infection to grow.
When the disease has been established and there is a high fever and an abscess, you cannot cure it by psychology.
Yet it is quite possible that you can avoid it by a proper psychological attitude.
Dr. Evans: So all this interest in psychosomatic medicine is pretty old stuff to you.
Dr. Jung: It’s all known here long ago.
Dr. Evans: And you are not at all surprised at the new developments . . .
Dr. Jung: No.
For instance, there is the toxic aspect of schizophrenia. I published it fifty years ago—just fifty years ago—and now everyone discovers it.
You are far ahead in America with technological things, but in psychological matters and such things, you are fifty years back.
You simply don’t understand it; that’s a fact.
I don’t want to figure in a general corrective statement; you simply are not yet aware of what there is.
There are plenty more things than people have any idea of.
I told you that case of the theologian who didn’t even know what the unconscious was; he thought it was an apparition.
Everyone who says that I am a mystic is just an idiot. He just doesn’t understand the first word of psychology. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 34-35.

Carl Jung and "Law.' [Anthology] (2015-07-03 05:38)

Only the gods can pass over the rainbow bridge; mortal men must stick to the earth and are subject to its laws. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 114.

Therefore, the very foundation of existence, the biological truth, is that each being is so interested in itself that it does love itself, thereby fulfilling the laws of its existence. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1477.

The way is within us, but not in Gods, nor in teachings, nor in laws. Within us is the way, the truth, and the life. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 231.

The Animals. We appreciate them much more. We think of the psychology of animals. In the 19th century they made laws for their protection, and began to treat them more decently, but it is only in recent years that we begin to think of a few animals as our brothers. Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Page 21.

Whoever carries over into the afternoon the law of the morning, or the natural aim, must pay for it with damage to his soul, just as surely as a growing youth who tries to carry over his childish egoism into adult life must pay for this mistake with social failure. Carl Jung; In CW 8: The Structure and Dynamics of the Psyche; The Stages of Life; Page 787.

It is a privilege born of human freedom in contradistinction to the compulsion of natural law. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Footnote 9, Page 158.

Nature simply produces a thing, she never tells us her laws, but human intelligence discovers them and makes abstractions, classifications according to sex, age, family, tribe, race, nation etc. Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 1, Page 46.

How life produces complex organic systems from the inorganic we do not know, though we have direct experience of how the psyche does it. Life therefore has a specific law of its own which cannot be deduced from the known physical laws of nature. Carl Jung, CW 8, Pages 178-181, Paras 371-381

One man will chiefly take what comes to him from without, and the other what comes from within, and, according to the law of life, the one will have to take from the outside something he never could accept before from outside, and the other will accept from within things which would always have been excluded before. Carl Jung, The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 92.

‘‘A halo of light surrounds the world of the law. We forget one another, quiet and pure, altogether powerful and empty. The emptiness is irradiated by the light of the heart of heaven. The water of the sea is smooth and mirrors the moon in its surface. The clouds disappear in blue space; the mountains shine clear. Consciousness reverts to contemplation; the moon- disk rests alone.” Hui Ming Ching, The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 121.

Morality is not imposed from outside; we have it in ourselves from the start—not the law, but our moral nature without which the collective life of human society would be impossible. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Page 27.

Any form of love not sanctioned by law is considered immoral, whether between worth-while people or bounders. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Pages 27.

”The Bhagavad-Gita says: whenever there is a decline of the law and ’an increase in iniquity; then I put forth myself for the rescue of the pious and for the destruction of the evildoers, for the establishment of the law I am born in every age.” Jung’s marginal note, The Red Book, Footnote 281, Page 317.

Our natural model is Christ. We have stood under his law since antiquity; first outwardly, and then inwardly. At first we knew this, and then knew it no longer. We fought against Christ, we deposed him, and we seemed to be conquerors. But he remained in us and mastered us. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 293.

No man has a spirituality unto himself or a sexuality unto himself Instead, he stands under the law of spirituality and of sexuality. Therefore no one escapes these daimons. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 353.

The word is the God that rises out of the waters each morning and proclaims the guiding law to the people. Outer laws and outer wisdom are eternally insufficient, since there is only one law and one wisdom, namely my daily law, my daily wisdom. The God renews himself each night. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 311.

The unconscious behaves as if the laws of our world did not exist. It flies to the roof contemptuous of the laws of gravity. We must bring its demands down to earth and somehow try to realize them. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 19.

I must know what the Church teaches but I must then ask myself what my own law is. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 39.

Carl Jung on "Neurosis." [Anthology] (2015-07-07 09:18)

The psychological trouble in neurosis, and the neurosis itself, can be formulated as an act of adaptation that has failed. Carl Jung; CW 4; par. 574.

An exclusively sexual interpretation of dreams and fantasies is a shocking violation of the patient's psychological material: infantile-sexual fantasy is by no means the whole story, since the material also contains a creative element, the purpose of which is to shape a way out of the neurosis. Carl Jung; "The Therapeutic Value of Abreaction," CW 16, par. 277.

In [the Middle Ages] they spoke of the devil, today we call it a neurosis. Carl Jung; "The Meaning of Psychology for Modern Man", 1933.

What we call civilized consciousness has steadily separated itself from the basic instincts. But these instincts have not disappeared. They have merely lost their contact with our consciousness and are thus forced to assert themselves in an indirect fashion. This may be . . . physical symptoms . . . neurosis . . . various incidents . . . moods . . . unexpected forgetfulness . . . or mistakes of speech. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols; Page 72

Neurosis is an inner cleavage-the state of being at war with one- self. ... What drives people to war with themselves is the intuition or the knowledge that they consist of two persons in opposition to one another. Carl Jung; Modern Man in Search of a Soul

We carry our past with us, to wit, the primitive and inferior man with his desires and emotions, and it is only with an enormous effort that we can detach ourselves from this burden. If it comes to a neurosis, we invariably have to deal with a considerably intensified shadow. And if such a person wants to be cured it is necessary to find a way in which his conscious personality and his shadow can live together. Carl Jung; Answer to Job; CW 11; Psychology and Religion: West and East; Page 1.

After the disgraceful defection of Adler, a gifted thinker but a malicious paranoiac, I am now in trouble with our friend, Jung, who apparently has not outgrown his own neurosis." Sigmund Freud to James Jackson Putnam, 20Aug1912.

After the disgraceful defection of Adler, a gifted thinker but a malicious paranoiac, I am now in trouble with our friend, Jung, who apparently has not outgrown his own neurosis." Sigmund Freud to James Jackson Putnam, 20Aug1912.

Doubt is creative if it is answered by deeds, and so is neurosis if it exonerates itself as having been a phase—a crisis which is pathological only when chronic. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 332-334

Neurosis is a justified doubt in oneself and continually poses the ultimate question of trust in man and in God. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 332-334

Inferiority is laming and so leads to a neurosis or even a psychosis. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 2, Page 151.

Ad "neurosis": I mean, of course, that it is as a rule better to leave neurotics to themselves as long as they do not suffer and seek health. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 479-481.

We constantly forget how far we have got from our own inner law and this revenges itself upon us with a neurosis, or digestive disturbances, which should make clear to us that "we have made out the bill without the host".

It is only possible to live as we should if we live according to our own nature. But in these days we live by our brains alone and ignore the very definite laws of our body and the instinctive world. We damage ourselves severely when we offend against these, and this is what our patient has done in her efforts to live rationally. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 219.

It seems to me that the basic facts of the psyche undergo a very marked alteration in the course of life, so much so that we could almost speak of a psychology of life's morning and a psychology of its afternoon. As a rule, the life of a young person is characterized by a general expansion and a striving towards concrete ends; and his neurosis seems mainly to rest on his hesitation or shrinking back from this necessity. But the life of an older person is characterized by a contraction of forces, by the affirmation of what has been achieved, and by the curtailment of further growth. His neurosis comes mainly from his clinging to a youthful attitude which is now out of season.... Carl Jung, CW 16, ¶75.

The classic compulsion neurosis is an exception in that it is always due to a latent psychosis, which is also the reason why it is uncurable. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 299.

Like neurosis, psychosis in its inner course is a process of individuation, but one that is usually not joined up with consciousness and therefore runs its course in the unconscious as an Ouroboros. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 371.

These things are then lost to consciousness, and must be found again in the course of life, at the cost of infinite effort, if God is kind enough to send us a neurosis (that special gift of grace) to accompany us on life's journey. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XIV, Page 119.

But we spend our free time listening to the wireless and rushing off to the cinema. Yet much of our western neurosis comes from the fact that we do not find enough time for ourselves; it would be wiser to meditate and seek the Void when we need rest, than to run after outer distraction. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 128.

Behind a neurosis there is so often concealed all the natural and necessary suffering the patient has been unwilling to bear. We can see this most clearly from hysterical pains, which are relieved in the course of treatment by the corresponding psychic suffering which the patient sought to avoid. Carl Jung, CW 16, Para 185.

Even when we recognise that an erotic problem lies behind a neurosis we must not express it crudely lest we frighten the patient away. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 14.

Too much secrecy causes neurosis and a split from reality, but having no mystery permits only collective thinking and Action. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 14.

If the unconscious does not cooperate, if, that is, there are no dreams or fantasies, then it is very difficult to deal with a neurosis. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 15.

You are quite right, the main interest of my work is not concerned with the treatment of neurosis but rather with the approach to the numinous. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. I, Page 377.

In any case of a child's neurosis, I go back to the parents and see what is going on there, because children have no psychology of their own, literally taken. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 13.

You see, the neurosis is made every day by the wrong attitude the individual has. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 27.

About a third of my cases are not suffering from any clearly definable neurosis, but from the senselessness and aimlessness of their lives. I should not object if this were called the general neurosis of our age. Carl Jung, CW XVI, Par 83.

Carl Jung on “Prophecy.” [Anthology] (2015-07-07 09:26)

In my estimation, second sight is not an illness, but a gift; you might as well say that it is pathological to be endowed with remarkable intelligence, but the possession of a gift always carries with it the burden of responsibility. Carl

Jung, ETH Lecture V, Page 26.
We can have prophetic dreams without possessing second sight, innumerable people have such anticipatory dreams. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture V, Page 26.
It is commonly assumed that on some given occasion in prehistoric times, the basic mythological ideas were ”invented” by a clever old philosopher or prophet, and ever afterward ”believed” by a credulous and uncritical people. But the very word ”invent” is derived from the Latin invenire, and means ”to find” and hence to find something by ”seeking” it. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols; Page 69.
The prophet loved God, and this sanctified him. But Salome did not love God, and this profaned her. But the prophet did not love Salome, and this profaned him. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 248.
Being a scientist I prefer not to be a prophet if I can help it. I am in no position to ascertain facts of the future. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 513.
Myths which day has forgotten continue to be told by night, and powerful figures which consciousness has reduced to banality and ridiculous triviality are recognized again by poets and prophetically revived; therefore they can also be recognized ”in changed form” by the thoughtful person. Carl Jung, Memories Dreams and Reflections, Page 282.
Through his inner vision the prophet discerns from the needs of his time the helpful image in the collective unconscious and expresses it in the symbol: because it speaks out of the collective unconscious it speaks for everyone-le vrai mot de la situation! Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 59-63.
The old prophet expresses persistence, but the young maiden denotes movement. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.
On the night when I considered the essence of the God, I became aware of an image: I lay in a dark depth. An old man stood before me. He looked like one of the old prophets. A black serpent lay at his feet. Some distance away I saw a house with columns. A beautiful maiden steps out of the door. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.
Just as the old prophets [ancients] stood before the Mysterium of Christ, I also stand as yet before the [this] Mysterium of-Christ, [insofar as I reassume the past] although I live two thousand years after-him [later] and at one time believed I was a Christian. But I had never been a Christ. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 253, Footnote 228.
We could say that western man became conscious of the fact that this man, this teacher Jesus, was the divine man, whose path had been prepared for thousands of years by Osiris in Egypt and as the idea of the coming of the Messiah in Israel. This was no human conspiracy, probably Christ had a convincing effect, there was something about him which carried the conviction that he was filled with the spirit of God, that he was a prophet. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 201.
The form in which Christ presented the content of his unconscious to the world became accepted and was declared valid for all. Thereafter all individual fantasies became otiose and worthless, and were persecuted as heretical, as the fate of the Gnostic movement and of all later heresies testifies. The prophet Jeremiah is speaking just in this vein when he warns Carl Jung, CW 6, §BI.
E: ”She loved the prophet who announced the new God to the world. She loved him, do you understand that? For she is my daughter.”
I: ”What my eyes see is exactly what I cannot grasp. You, Elijah, who are a prophet, the mouth of God, and she, a bloodthirsty horror. You are the symbol of the most extreme contradiction.” Elijah to Carl Jung on Salome, Liber Novus, Page 246

Carl Jung on the “Serpent.” [Anthology] (2015-07-07 09:32)

The serpent is the earthly essence of man of which he is not conscious. Its character changes according to peoples and lands, since it is the mystery that flows to him from the nourishing earth-mother. The earthly (numen loci) separates forethinking and pleasure in man, but not in itself. The serpent has the weight of the earth in itself but also its changeability and germination from which everything that becomes emerges. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 247.

Keep it far from me, science that clever knower, that bad prison master who binds the soul and imprisons it in a lightless cell. But above all protect me from the serpent of judgment, which only appears to be a healing serpent, yet in your depths is infernal poison and agonizing death. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 238
Keep it far from me, science that clever knower, that bad prison master who binds the soul and imprisons it in a lightless cell. But above all protect me from the serpent of judgment, which only appears to be a healing serpent, yet in your depths is infernal poison and agonizing death. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 238
Some have their reason in thinking, others in feeling. Both are servants of Logos, and in secret become worshipers of the serpent. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 280.
More especially the threat to one's inmost self from dragons and serpents points to the danger of the newly acquired consciousness being swallowed up again by the instinctive psyche, the unconscious. Carl Jung; CW 9i; para. 282.
More especially the threat to one's inmost self from dragons and serpents points to the danger of the newly acquired consciousness being swallowed up again by the instinctive psyche, the unconscious. Carl Jung; CW 9i; para. 282.
Through the Christ crucified between the two thieves, man gradually attained knowledge of his shadow and its duality. This duality had already been anticipated by the double meaning of the serpent. Just as the serpent stands for the power that heals as well as corrupts, so one of the thieves is destined upwards, the other downwards, and so likewise the shadow is on one side regrettable and reprehensible weakness, on the other side healthy instinctively and the prerequisite for higher consciousness. Carl Jung; Aion; Page 255; Para 402.
Taking it in its deepest sense, the shadow is the invisible saurian tail that man still drags behind him. Carefully amputated, it becomes the healing serpent of the mysteries. Only monkeys parade with it. Carl Jung; The Integration of the Personality.
The idea of transformation and renewal by means of the serpent is a well-substantiated archetype. It is [a] healing [symbol] Carl Jung, CW 7, Par 184.
The second part of it, the secretary-bird and the snake, has been correctly interpreted, in spite of the fact that the snake is not exactly Kundalini because the Kundalini serpent actually dissolves into light. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 95-97.
The serpent is a Gnostic symbol for the spinal cord and the basal ganglia, because a snake is mainly backbone. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XI, Page 97.
The spirit is usually expressed by a serpent which proves that this spirit is not Just the human mind, but an animal or reptile mind. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XIII, Page 111.
We must assume, therefore, that the spirit has two aspects in alchemy, the human mind as we know it, and the serpent mind, which we can only say is unconscious. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XIII, Page 111.
Nothing makes this effect clearer than the serpent. It signifies everything dangerous and everything bad, everything nocturnal and uncanny, which adheres to Logos as well as to Eros, so long as they can work as the dark and unrecognized principles of the unconscious spirit. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.
The serpent represents magical power, which also appears where animal drives are aroused imperceptibly in us. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 366.
The snake in alchemy is the "mercurial serpent", the old Gnostic image for the Nous, the mind, where the spirit was represented as a serpent, as the Agathodaemon (the good daemon), or directly called the serpent of the Nous. Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 215.
This serpent does not represent "reason" or anything approaching it, but rather symbolises a peculiar autonomous mind which can possess one completely, a spirit of revelation which gives us "Intuitionen" (intuitions). Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 215.
Since the time of the old Gnostics, the serpent has been the symbol for the brain and its appendages; that is, for the lower centres of the brain and for the spinal cord, partly on account of its shape, but also from introspective reasons. Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 216.
...the serpent is the hypostatic, underlying materia (the essence of matter), which sinks into the water, or is as it were in the water, and, through illusion, it deceives the senses. Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 219.

On the night when I considered the essence of the God, I became aware of an image: I lay in a dark depth. An old man stood before me. He looked like one of the old prophets. A black serpent lay at his feet. Some distance away I saw a house with columns. A beautiful maiden steps out of the door. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.

As I look into its reflection, the images of Eve, the tree, and the serpent appear to me. After this I catch sight of Odysseus and his journey on the high seas. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.

The Corrected Draft continues: "The serpent is not only a separating but also a unifying principle" (p. 91). Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 247, Footnote 172.

He [Jung] showed a diagram of a cross with Rational/Thinking (Elijah) at the top, Feeling (Salome) at the bottom, Irrational / Intuition (Superior) at the left, and Sensation / Inferior (Serpent) at the right. The Red Book, Page 247, Footnote 173.

If pleasure is united with forethinking, the serpent lies before them. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 249, Footnote 190.

Christ himself compared himself to a serpent, and his hellish brother, the Antichrist, is the old dragon himself. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 318.

But above all protect me from the serpent of judgment, which only appears to be a healing serpent, yet in your depths is infernal poison and agonizing death. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 238.

But the serpent is also life. In the image furnished by the ancients, the serpent put an end to the childlike magnificence of paradise; they even said that Christ himself had been a serpent. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Footnote 136, Page 243.

Alas, he is my dearest, most beautiful friend, he who rushes across, pursuing the sun and wanting to marry himself with the immeasurable mother as the sun does. How closely akin, indeed how completely one are the serpent and the God! The word which was our deliverer has become a deadly weapon, a serpent that secretly stabs. Carl Jung on Izdubar, Liber Novus, Page 280.

The ancients called the saving word the Logos, an expression of divine reason. So much unreason / was in man that he needed reason to be saved. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 280.

If one waits long enough, one sees how the Gods all change into serpents and underworld dragons in the end. This is also the fate of the Logos: in the end it poisons us all. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 280.

Some have their reason in thinking, others in feeling. Both are servants of Logos, and in secret become worshipers of the serpent. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 280.

The daimon of sexuality approaches our soul as a serpent. She is half human soul and is called thought-desire. The daimon of spirituality descends into our soul as the white bird. He is half human soul and is called desire-thought. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 354.

Many have wanted to get help for their sick God and were then devoured by the serpents and dragons lurking on the way to the land of the sun. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 283.

Birth is difficult, but a thousand times more difficult is the hellish afterbirth. All the dragons and monstrous serpents of eternal emptiness follow behind the divine son. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 287.

If I am not conjoined through the uniting of the Below and the Above, I break down into three parts: the serpent, and in that or some other animal form I roam, living nature daimonically, arousing fear and longing. The human soul, living forever within you. The celestial soul, as such dwelling with the Gods, far from you and unknown to you, appearing in the form of a bird. Carl Jung's Soul to him, Black Books, Appendix C., Page 370.

Apart from Elijah and Salome I found the serpent as a third principle. It is a stranger to both principles although it is associated with both. The serpent taught me the unconditional difference in essence between the two principles in me. Carl Jung and Elijah, Liber Novus, Page 247.

Because I was a thinker and caught sight of the hostile principle of pleasure from forethinking, it appeared to me as Salome. If I had been one who felt, and had groped my way toward forethinking, then it would have appeared to me as a serpent-encoiled daimon, if I had actually seen it. Carl Jung and Elijah, Liber Novus, Page 248.

The serpent in the cave is an image which often occurs in antiquity. It is important to realize that in classical antiquity, as in other civilizations, the serpent not only was an animal that aroused fear and represented danger, but also signified healing. Carl Jung, CW 18, Page 116.

The serpent owes his existence to God and by no means to man. Carl Jung, CW 18, Page 690.

We fear our serpent," he said, "as we also fear the numinosum - so we run from it. . . . All we have to give the world and God is ourselves as we are. But this is the hardest of all tasks. Most of us want others to do it for us, to carry us along.. . . Carl Jung, J.E.T., Page 178.

Carl Jung on the “Mystic” and “Mysticism.” [Anthology] (2015-07-08 06:16)

Everyone who says that I am a Mystic is just and idiot. He just doesn’t understand the first word of Psychology. Carl Jung, Conversations with Richard L. Evans, [Houston Film]

When a woman realizes her shadow the animus can be constellated. If the shadow remains in the unconscious the animus possesses her through the shadow. When she realizes her animus, mystical generation can occur. Sarah was Abraham's legitimate wife, but Hagar, the dark one, had the procreative animus. Out of darkness the light is born. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 30.
It is a figure comparable to Hiranyagarbha, Purusha, Atman, and the mystic Buddha. For this reason I have elected to call it the "self," by which I understand a psychic totality and at the same time a centre, neither of which coincides with the ego but includes it, just as a larger circle encloses a smaller one. Carl Jung, CW 9I, 247.
Only the mystics bring religion to what is creative itself. Carl Gustav Jung [LC 540]
Everything psychic has a lower and a higher meaning, as in the profound saying of late classical mysticism: 'Heaven above, Heaven below, stars above, stars below, all that is above also is below, know this and rejoice.' Here we lay our finger on the secret symbolical significance of everything psychic. Carl Jung; CW 5; para 77.
When they [the mystics] descend into the depths of their own being they find 'in their heart' the image of the sun, they find their own life-force which they call the 'sun' for a legitimate and, I would say, a physical reason because our source of energy and life actually is sun. Our physiological life, regarded as an energy process, is entirely solar Carl Jung; Symbols of Transformation; para. 176.
We can find clear proof of this fact in the history of science itself. The so-called "mystical" experience of the French philosopher Descartes involved a . . . sudden revelation in which he saw in a flash the "order of all sciences". The British author Robert Louis Stevenson had spent years looking for a story that would fit his "strong sense of man's double being," when the plot of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde was suddenly revealed to him in a dream. Carl Jung; Man and His symbols; Carl Jung; Man and His symbols; P. 25.
People will do anything, no matter how absurd, in order to avoid facing their own souls. They will practice Indian yoga and all its exercises, observe a strict regimen of diet, learn theosophy by heart, or mechanically repeat mystic text from the literature of the whole world - all because they cannot get on with themselves and have not slightest faith that anything useful could ever come out of their own souls. Thus the soul has been turned into a Nazareth Gradually from which nothing good can come. Therefore let us fetch it from the four corners of the earth - the more far-fetched and bizarre it is the better. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 99 .
Concerning your view about Hatha-Yoga I can confirm your ideas entirely. Yoga as well as other "mystical" practices imitate nature and that explains their efficacy. Yoga postures are imitations of catatonic gestures, postures and mannerisms. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 497-498.
Behind Gretchen stands the Gnostic sequence: Helen-Mary-Sophia. They represent a real Platonic world of ideas (thinking and sensation on the mystic level). Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 264-266.
I was particularly satisfied with the fact that you clearly understand that I am not a mystic but an empiricist. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 237.
Individuation is a philosophical, spiritual and mystical experience Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Page 294.
A genuine and proper ethical development cannot abandon Christianity but must grow up within it, must bring to fruition its hymn of love, the agony and ecstasy over the dying and resurgent god the mystic power of the wine, the awesome anthropophagy of the Last Supper-only this ethical development can serve the vital forces of religion. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 17-19.

The lotus has always had an important mystical meaning. Its roots are down in the slime and mud at the bottom of the lake and the flower unfolds on the surface of the water. Carl Jung, ETH, Page 113.
Prana conceives of the body as a sort of system of pipes, going into the limbs and connecting the centres. These centres are not mystical but psychical centres of experience. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture X, Page 225.
The mystical rose, like the lotus in India, grows for the salvation of man. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 3Mar1939, Page 101.
We could say that it was owing to Al-Gazzali that Islam became a mystical religion, though we in the West know very little today of this mystical side. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 10Nov1939, Page 178.
So Christian theologians became acquainted with the devotional and mystical books of the Arabs and they made a vast impression upon them. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 10Nov1939, Page 178.

It is common for very infantile people to have a mystical, religious feeling, they enjoy this atmosphere in which they can admire their beautiful feelings, but they are simply indulging their auto-eroticism. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 11Jan1935, Pages 171.
Turned towards the world, the anima is fickle, capricious, moody, uncontrolled and emotional, sometimes gifted with daemonic intuitions, ruthless, malicious, untruthful, bitchy, double-faced, and mystical. Carl Jung, CW 9i, Para 222f.
Everyone who says that I am a Mystic is just and idiot. He just doesn't understand the first word of Psychology. Carl Jung, Conversations with Richard L. Evans, [Houston Film]

Dr. Meier has drawn my attention to your short review of Rosenberg's book. For anyone who knows Jewish history, and in particular Hasidism, Rosenberg's assertion that the Jews despise mysticism is a highly regrettable error. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 238.

Owing to rather obvious reasons Protestant theologians are rather reticent and they don't know yet whether I should be condemned as a heretic or depreciated as a mystic. As you know, mysticism and hereticism enjoy about the same bad reputation in Protestantism. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 382.
You will be accused of mysticism, but the reputation you won with the Dementia will hold up for quite some time against that. Sigmund Freud to Carl Jung Letter May 1911.
She had very changeable looks, as so many intuitives do, and could sometimes look beautiful and sometimes quire plain. Her extraordinary brilliant eyes-mystic's eyes-were always expressive. Helena Henderson on Toni Wolff, Carl, Emma, Toni Remembrances, P. 31.

Carl Jung on "Depression." [Anthology] (2015-07-09 03:50)

Only when we bear our situation and accept our depression will it be possible for us to change internally. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 373.

In the process of individuation, too, new contents can announce themselves in this devouring form and darken consciousness; this is experienced as a depression, that is to say, as being pulled downward. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 373.

I begin to feel my age and whenever I get a bit too tired I also feel my heart and that is decidedly disagreeable and makes me cross with the whole world, which is damnable anyhow. I went through a period of black depression during the first 4 days. Only yesterday I began to feel human again. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 307.

[Note: The "period of black depression was related to The Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor 7 Dec. 1941.]

Depression is not necessarily pathological. It often foreshadows a renewal of the personality or a burst of creative activity. There are moments in human life when a new page is turned. Carl Jung, CW 16, par. 373.

Since the depression was not manufactured by the conscious mind but is an unwelcome intrusion from the unconscious, the elaboration of the mood is, as it were, a picture of the contents and tendencies of the unconscious that were massed together in the depression. Carl Jung, CW 8, Page 82.

Often, however, we find cases where there is no tangible mood or depression at all, but just a general, dull discontent, a feeling of resistance to everything, a sort of boredom or vague disgust, an indefinable but excruciating emptiness. Carl Jung, CW 8, Page 83.

These words belonged to the autonomous complex. When excited by an external stimulus, complexes can produce sudden confusions, or violent affects, depressions, anxiety-states, etc., or they may express themselves in hallucinations. Carl Jung, CW 8, Page 313.

Statistics show a rise in the frequency of mental depressions in men about forty. In women the neurotic difficulties generally begin somewhat earlier. We see that in this phase of life—between thirty-five and forty—an important change in the human psyche is in preparation. Carl Jung, CW 8, Page 395.

Youthful longing for the world and for life, for the attainment of high hopes and distant goals, is life's obvious teleological urge which at once changes into fear of life, neurotic resistances, depressions, and phobias if at some point it remains caught in the past, or shrinks from risks without which the unseen goal cannot be attained. Carl Jung, CW 8, Page 406.

When we suffer from lack of psychic energy, we say we have a depression or an inhibition, not realising that part of our mental hierarchy has one away beyond our control, that we have, in fact, lost our soul. Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Page 13.

Depressions always have to be understood teleologically. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 14.

After a stroke general debilitation or senile depression can occur. If the brain is damaged, consciousness can slip back many levels. The real personality has then departed; what remains carries on the fight against death. Conflicts do not reach the whole person anymore and are therefore not real conflicts any longer. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 16.

Carl Jung on the "Egg." [Anthology] (2015-07-09 04:11)

In alchemy the egg stands for the chaos apprehended by the artifex, the prima materia containing the captive world-soul. Out of the egg — symbolized by the round cooking vessel — will rise the eagle or phoenix, the liberated soul, which is ultimately identical with the Anthropos who was imprisoned in the embrace of Physis. Carl Jung; Psychology and Alchemy; Page 202.

I am the egg that surrounds and nurtures the seed of the God in me. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 284.

My God, I love you as a mother loves the unborn whom she carries in her heart. Grow in the egg of the East, nourish yourself from my love, drink the juice of my life so that you will become a radiant God. We need your light, oh child. Since we go in darkness, light up our paths. May your light shine before us, may your fire warm the coldness of our life. We do not need your power but life. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 286.

It happened that I opened the egg and that the God left the egg. He was healed and his figure shone transformed, and I knelt like a child and could not grasp the miracle. He who had been pressed into the core of the beginning rose up, and no trace of illness could be found on him. And when I thought that I had caught the mighty one and held him in my cupped hands, he was the sun itself. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 286.

It is to be conjectured that just as the chicken comes out of the egg in the same way all the world over, so there are psychic modes of functioning, certain ways of thinking, feeling, and imagining, which can be found everywhere and at all times, quite independent of tradition. Carl Jung, CW 16, Para 206.

It is a risky business for an egg to be cleverer than the hen. Still, what is in the egg must find the courage to creep out. Carl Jung, Letter to Sigmund Freud (1911)

Carl Jung on the "Child" and "Children." [Anthology] (2015-07-10 04:53)

But no matter how much parents and grandparents may have sinned against the child, the man who is really adult will accept these sins as his own condition which has to be reckoned with. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 117.

To a man the anima is the Mother of God who gives birth to the Divine Child. To a woman the animus is the Holy Spirit, the procreator. He is at once the light and the dark God – not the Christian God of Love who contains neither the Devil nor the Son. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Pages 31-32.

I wouldn't call the ego a creation of mind or consciousness, since, as we know, little children talk of themselves first in the third person and begin to say 'I' only when they have found their ego. The ego, therefore, is rather a find or an experience and not a creation. Carl Jung, Letters Volume 1; Pages 254-255.

Small children are very old; later on we soon grow younger. In our middle age we are youngest, precisely at the time when we have completely or almost completely lost contact with the collective unconscious, the samskaras. We grow older again only as with the mounting years we remember the samskaras anew. Carl Jung, The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga, Appendix 1, Page 74.

Matter is an hypothesis. When you say "matter," you are really creating a symbol for something unknown, which may just as well be "spirit" or anything else; it may even be God. Religious faith, on the other hand, refuses to give up its pre-Weltanschauung, in contradiction to the saying of Christ, the faithful try to remain children instead of becoming as children. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Page 477, Para 762.

Children are in the collective unconscious until they acquire a small consciousness of their personality, until they say "I," or "me," or their name. They are rooted in the collective unconscious and are uprooted from it by the flood of impressions from the outside. They know everything, but they lose the memory of it. C. G. Jung, Emma Jung and Toni Wolff - A Collection of Remembrances; Pages 51-70.

The divine primordial power is blind, since its face has become human. The human is the face of-the Godhead. If the God comes near you, then plead for your life to be spared, since the God is loving horror. The ancients said: it is terrible to fall into the hands of the living God. They spoke thus because they knew, since they were still close to the ancient forest, and they turned green like the trees in a childlike manner and ascended far away toward the East. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 281.

The spirit of this time of course allowed me to believe in my reason. He let me see myself in the image of a leader with ripe thoughts. But the spirit of the depths teaches me that I am a servant, in fact the servant of a child: This dictum was repugnant to me and I hated it. But I had to recognize and accept that my soul is a child and that my God in my soul is a child. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 234.

The carrier of this consciousness is the individual, who does not produce the psyche on his own volition but is, on the contrary, pre-formed by it and nourished by the gradual awakening of consciousness during childhood. Carl Jung, The undiscovered Self, Page 34.

I suffer from the fact that I can so seldom have a conversation with an adequate partner. The women in my circle understand me, but for women their home, their husband, and their children, come first. Only when this is all taken care of, does a woman still have a little time for the spirit; then it is interesting. Talking with a man, on the other hand, I get a response from the cosmic spheres of the spirit. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 67.

To a man the anima is the Mother of God who gives birth to the Divine Child. To a woman the animus is the Holy Spirit, the procreator. He is at once the light and the dark God – not the Christian God of Love who contains neither the Devil nor the Son. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung; Pages 31-32.

A particle split off from the mother's animus can enter her children and act like an evil spirit. As soon as the mother integrates this animus side of her soul, her children are freed. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 29.

The little world of childhood with its familiar surroundings is a model of the greater world. The more intensively the family has stamped its character upon the child, the more it will tend to feel and see its earlier miniature world again in the bigger world of adult life. Naturally this is not a conscious, intellectual process. Carl Jung; The Theory of Psychoanalysis (1913).

Insofar as this process [of individuation], as a rule, runs its course unconsciously as it has from time immemorial, it means no more than that the acorn becomes an oak, the calf a cow, and the child an adult. But if the individuation process is made conscious, consciousness must confront the unconscious and a balance between the opposites must be found . Carl Jung; "Answer to Job"; CW 11, par. 755.

The dynamic principle of fantasy is play, a characteristic also of the child, and as such it appears inconsistent with the principle of serious work. But without this playing with fantasy any creative work has ever yet come to birth. The debt we owe to the play of imagination is incalculable. It is therefore short-sighted to treat fantasy, on account of its risky or unacceptable nature, as a thing of little worth. Carl Jung; Psychological Types Ch. 1; Page 82.

Nothing exerts a stronger psychic effect upon the environment, and especially upon children, than the [unlived] life [of] the parents. Carl Jung; "Paracelsus", 1929.

How am I to be creative? Nature knows only one answer to that: Through a child (the gift of love). Carl Jung; Symbols of Transformation; para 76.

The strong and natural love that binds the child to the father turns away, during the years when the child is outgrowing the family circle, to the higher forms of the father, to authority, to the "Fathers" of the Church and to the father-god visibly represented by them. Nevertheless, mythology is not lacking in consolations. Did not the Word become flesh? And did not the divine pneuma enter into the Virgin's womb? The whirlwind of Anaxagoras was that same divine nous that produced the world out of itself. Why do we cherish the image of the Immaculate Mother even to this day?" Carl Jung; CW 8, para. 76.

One must give up the retrospective longing which only wants to resuscitate the torpid bliss and effortlessness of childhood. Carl Jung; The Sacrifice; CW 5; Paragraph 643.

Whoever carries over into the afternoon the law of the morning, or the natural aim, must pay for it with damage to his soul, just as surely as a growing youth who tries to carry over his childish egoism into adult life must pay for this mistake with social failure. Carl Jung; In CW 8: The Structure and Dynamics of the Psyche; The Stages of Life; Page 787.

Whoever carries over into the afternoon the law of the morning, or the natural aim, must pay for it with damage to his soul, just as surely as a growing youth who tries to carry over his childish egoism into adult life must pay for this mistake with social failure. Carl Jung; In CW 8: The Structure and Dynamics of the Psyche; The Stages of Life; Page 787.

Because a child is . . . small and its conscious thoughts scarce and simple, we do not realize the far-reaching complications of the infantile mind that are based on its original identity with the prehistoric psyche. That original mind is just as much present and still functioning in the child as the evolutionary stages of mankind are in its embryonic body. Carl Jung; Man and His symbols; Page 89.

For indeed our consciousness does not create itself it wells up from unknown depths. In childhood it awakens gradually, and all through life it wakes each morning out of the depths of sleep from an unconscious condition. It is like a child that is born daily out of the primordial womb of the unconscious." Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Page 394 and Psychology and Religion: West and East, CW 11, pp. 569 f.

As a child I felt myself to be alone, and I am still, because I know things and must hint at things which others apparently know nothing of, and for the most part do not want to know. Loneliness does not come from having no people about one, but from being unable to communicate the things that seem important to oneself, or from holding certain views which others find inadmissible. Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Page 356.

The individual ego is the stable in which the Christ-child is born. Carl Jung; Collected Works Vol. 11
That higher and ”complete” man is begotten by the ”unknown” father and born from Wisdom, and it is he who, in the figure of the puer aeternus—”vultu metabolism albums et ater”—represents our totality, which transcends consciousness. It was this boy into whom Faust had to change, abandoning his inflated onesidedness which saw the devil only outside. Christ’s ”Except ye become as little children” is a prefiguration of this, for in them the opposites lie close together; but what is meant is the boy who is born from the maturity of the adult man, and not the unconscious child we would like to remain. Carl Jung; Answer to Job, R. Hull, trans. (1984), pp. 157-158
If there is anything that we wish to change in the child, we should first examine it and see whether it is not something that could better be changed in ourselves. Carl Jung; The Integration of the Personality; Page 285.
Repression is a process that begins in early childhood under the moral influence of the environment and continues through life. Carl Jung; The Personal and the Collective Unconscious; CW 7, par. 202.
In every adult there lurks a child–an eternal child, something that is always becoming, is never completed, and calls for unceasing care, attention, and education. That is the part of the personality which wants to develop and become whole. -C. G. Jung CW 17: 286
Children are educated by what the grownup is and not by what he says. Carl Jung, Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious, The Psychology of the Child Archetype, Page 174.
The reason I write to you about family matters is that no visitor since Jung has so much impressed the children and done me so much good Sigmund Freud to Oskar Pfister, Dec. 7, 1909.
If ego consciousness follows its own road exclusively, it is trying to become like a god or a superman. But exclusive recognition of its dependence only leads to a childish fatalism and to a world-negating and misanthropic spiritual arrogance. Carl Jung, The Mysteries: Papers from the Eranos, Page 324.
I wouldn’t call the ego a creation of mind or consciousness, since, as we know, little children talk of themselves first in the third person and begin to say ’I’ only when they have found their ego. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 254.
Around the eighth year there is a transition to ego consciousness, as we have already seen in previous children’s dreams. The child breaks away from the extremely close relatedness with the familial milieu; he has already acquired a certain experience of the world, and the libido, which had up to then been tied to the parents, detaches itself from them and often is introverted. Carl Jung, Children’s Dreams Seminar, Page 323.
For there is no coming into being and dying but in time. Carl Jung, Children’s Dream Seminar, Page 101.
The number in a dream always has a meaning. If we cannot find this meaning, we are the idiots, not the dream. Carl Jung, Children’s Dream Seminar, Page 101.
Nature itself speaks in such dreams. The wisdom of the child is the wisdom of nature, and it needs the utmost cunning to follow nature. Carl Jung, Children’s Dream Seminar, Page 136.
The child has to step out of this primordial world, to be able to really enter into life. . Carl Jung, Children’s Dreams Seminar, Page 184.
The Magna Mater has already had pagan children and as Ecclesia spiritualis she embraces a Christendom as huge as it is fragmented. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 395-398.
In religious instruction, we more and more refrain from making children acquainted with these images, and instead offer them moral teaching, in which the devil is ignored altogether. Carl Jung, Children’s Dreams Seminar, Page 369.
The future might easily be so bad that the Church could be forced by circumstances to give up all her childish worldliness and socialism and to turn to the spiritual problem of man, which she has so sadly neglected. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 311-313.
This is because dependence on the behaviour of others is a last vestige of childhood which we think we can’t do without. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 78.
…the brain is complete with the history of the world and every child is born with an unconscious assumption of the world. But for this we could not grasp the world at all. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 27.
His secretary had to keep him provided with coins which he distributed among the children he met on his daily walks; he did this to get their thanks, for he was appallingly lonely, and needed such devices in order to reach some kind of human contact. Carl Jung on J.D. Rockefeller, Modern Psychology, Vol. 1, Page 66.

We sprang from these lower vertebrates - children who suffer from atrophy of the brain show all the characteristics of animals - and this man has come up against his own instinctive nature and feels that he must fight it. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 2, Page 163.
Children are full of active imagination but we think of it as a childish activity. This is an error, for we find it everywhere among primitives and in all ancient cultures all over the world. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 3, Page 12.
A child, too, enters into this sublimity, and there detaches himself from this world and his manifold individuations more quickly than the aged. So easily does he become what you also are that he apparently vanishes. Sooner or later all the dead become what we also are. But in this reality we know little or nothing about that mode of being, and what shall we still know of this earth after death? Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 343.
Parents must realize that they are trees from which the fruit falls in the autumn. Children don't belong to their parents, and they are only apparently produced by them. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 217-218.
But the ground-plan of these images [Archetypal] is universal and must be assumed to be pre-existent, since it can be demonstrated in the dreams of small children or uneducated persons who could not possibly have been influenced by tradition. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 538-539.
The dreams of early childhood contain mythological motifs which the children could not possibly know of. These archetypal images are the primeval knowledge of mankind; we are born with this inheritance, though this fact is not obvious and only becomes visible in indirect ways. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XIV, Page 119.
Jung gave great importance to the papal bull of the Assumptio Maria. He held that it "points to the hieros gamos in the pleroma, and this in turn implies, as we have said, the future birth of the divine child, who, in accordance with the divine trend toward incarnation, will choose as his birthplace the empirical man. This metaphysical process is known as the individuation process in the psychology of the unconscious" Liber Novus, Footnote 200, Page 299.
Adler's letter is stupid chatter and can safely be ignored. We aren't children here. If Adler ever says anything sensible or worth listening to I shall take note of it, even though I don't think much of him as a person. Carl Jung,Freud/Jung Letters, Page 532.
The child's psyche is unconscious, an animal psyche if you like to express it that way, and very gradually a conscious condition develops. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 213.
The child born in a country takes something of that land, it is the secret influence of the place. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 12July1935, Pages 241.
The Chinese do not say there is no content, but "we will not speak of it ", and they are so wise that they really do not do so, but we are so childish that we write thick books about it! Carl Jung, ETH Lecture III, 17May 1935, Page 210.
In early childhood we become acquainted with fairy tales and we learn mythology in school and in our later reading, we forget most of it in consciousness, but in the depths it is all carefully treasured. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 22Feb1935, Pages 192.
A dream gives us unadorned information about the condition of a patient, it is as if a nature- being were stating his diagnosis or taking a child by the ear and telling him what he is doing. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 18Jan1935, Page 174.
We make the great mistake of thinking that children are born a tabula rasa, but this is not the case. They are born with a vast inherited memory which contains a subjective content to meet everything which they contact externally. Carl Jung, Lecture V 25May1934, Page 108.
This disproves the theory that a child's mind is a tabula rasa, for it shows us that the unconscious is no empty surface, but a prepared ground; the brain is complete with the history of the world and every child is born with an unconscious assumption of the world. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture V, Page 27.
Apotropaic: Descriptive of "magical thinking," based on the desire to depotentiate the influence of an object or person. Apotropaic actions are characteristic of introversion as a mode of psychological orientation. I have seen an introverted child who made his first attempts to walk only after he had learned the names of all the objects in the room he might touch. Carl Jung, CW 6, par. 897.
Consciousness does not create itself-it wells up from unknown depths. In childhood it awakens gradually, and all through life it wakes each morning out of the depths of sleep from an unconscious condition. Carl Jung, CW 11, par. 935.
But the serpent is also life. In the image furnished by the ancients, the serpent put an end to the childlike magnificence of paradise; they even said that Christ himself had been a serpent. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Footnote 136, Page 243.

I saw it, I know that this is the way: I saw the death of Christ and I saw his lament; I felt the agony of his dying, of the great dying. I saw a new God, a child, who subdued daimons in his hand. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 254.

Christ has made men desirous, for ever since they expect gifts from their saviors without any service in return. Giving is as childish as power. He who gives presumes himself powerful. The virtue of giving is the sky-blue mantle of the tyrant. You are wise, Oh Philemon, you do not give. You want your garden to bloom, and for everything to grow from within itself. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 316.

But I had to recognize and accept that my soul is a child and that my God in my soul is a child. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 234.

My God is a child, so wonder not that the spirit of this time in me is incensed to mockery and scorn. There will be no one who will laugh at me as I laughed at myself. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 234.

And thus the image of the ancients is fulfilled: I pursued my soul to kill the child in it. For I am also the worst enemy of my God. But I also recognized that my enmity is decided upon in the God. He is mockery and hate and anger, since this is also a way of life. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 244.

I see in splendor the mother of God with the child. Peter stands in front of her in admiration-then Peter alone with the key-the Pope with a triple crown-a Buddha sitting rigidly in a circle of fire-a many-armed bloody Goddess-it is Salome desperately wringing her hands-it takes hold of me, she is my own soul, and now I see Elijah in the image of the stone. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 248.

The image of the mother of God with the child that I foresee, indicates to me the mystery of the transformation. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 250.

Therefore, and insofar as it is the manner of the Gods to go beyond mortals, they become paralyzed, and become as helpless as children. Divinity and humanity should remain preserved, if man should remain before the God, and the God remain before man. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 281.

The ancients said: it is terrible to fall into the hands of the living God. They spoke thus because they knew, since they were still close to the ancient forest, and they turned green like the trees in a childlike manner and ascended far away toward the East. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 281.

Are we not sons of the Gods? Why should Gods not be our children? If my father the God should die, a God child should arise from my maternal heart. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 286.

He who had been pressed into the core of the beginning rose up, and no trace of illness could be found on him. And when I thought that I had caught the mighty one and held him in my cupped hands, he was the sun itself. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 286.

My God rose in the Eastern sky; brighter than the heavenly host, and brought about a new day for all the peoples. This is why I want to go to Hell. Would a mother not want to give up her life for her child? How much easier would it be to give up my life if only my God could overcome the torment of the last hour of the night and victoriously break through the red mist of the morning? Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 289.

The devil knows what is beautiful, and hence he is the shadow of beauty and follows it everywhere, awaiting the moment when the beautiful, writhing great with child, seeks to give life to the God. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 289.

The sacrifice has been accomplished: the divine child, the image of the God's formation, is slain, and I have eaten from the sacrificial flesh. The child, that is, the image of the God's formation, not only bore my human craving, but also enclosed all the primordial and elemental powers that the sons of the sun possess as an inalienable inheritance. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 291.

But man must recognize his complicity in the act of evil. He must bear witness to this recognition by eating from the bloody sacrificial flesh. Through this act he testifies that he is a man, that he recognizes good as well as evil, and that he destroys the image of the God's formation through withdrawing his life force, with which he also dissociates himself from the God. This occurs for the salvation of the soul, which is the true mother of the divine child. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 291.

Who are you, child? My dreams have represented you as a child and as a maiden. I am ignorant of your mystery. Forgive me if I speak as in a dream, like a drunkard-are you God? Is God a child, a maiden? Forgive me if I babble. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 233.

The righteous man is the instrument into which God enters in order to attain self-reflection and thus consciousness and rebirth as a divine child trusted to the care of adult man. Carl Jung, CW 18, Page 739.

Man's relationship to God probably has to undergo a certain important change: Instead of the propitiating praise to an unpredictable king or the child's prayer to a loving father, the responsible living and fulfilling of the divine love in us will be our form of worship of, and commerce with, God.

His "autobiography" he came to reluctantly; it was "the one thing I am not going to write" he had said in 1948. Strictly speaking, it is not an autobiography. He always spoke and wrote of it as "Aniela Jaffe's project," with contributions made by him in the form of childhood, travel, and closing chapters. Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 194.

Even in rearing a child it is often good for parents to react emotionally and not with cool superiority to the child's bad behaviour. Children often irritate their parents just to make them show emotion. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 14.

If the question of an abortion arises the whole situation with all its implications must be taken into account. If the parents are married and healthy the child must be accepted, and the sacrifice of living a more modest life should be met if it is financially necessary. If the parents are not married the question must be weighed very carefully: would it be favourable or not, damaging or useful? Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 16.

I often have to say to an anxious mother, "It is your damned love and anxiety that are preventing your children from ever growing up." Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 48.

The child is born as a high complexity, with existing determinants that never waver through the whole life, and that give the child his character. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 13.

Already, in earliest childhood, a mother recognizes the individuality of her child; and so, if you observe carefully, you see a tremendous difference, even in very small children. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 13.

In any case of a child's neurosis, I go back to the parents and see what is going on there, because children have no psychology of their own, literally taken. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 13.

As I told you yesterday, the psyche is by no means tabula rasa here, but a definite mixture and combination of genes, which are there from the very first moment of our life; and they give a definite character, even to the little child. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22.

. . . what is meant [by the child archetype] is the boy who is born from the maturity of the adult man, and not the unconscious child we would like to remain. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 742.

Carl Jung: ”A man on this earth carries the flame of consciousness within him.” (2015-07-10 12:00)

Primeval history is the story of the beginning of consciousness by differentiation from the archetypes.
It leads to the fire whose origin lies in a crime.
A man on this earth carries the flame of consciousness within him.
Individual existence is the crime against the gods, disobedience to God, the peccatum originale.

6902

Out of this projection of spiritual fire is born the anima.
The coldness of the psyche is in opposition to the warmth of the fire.
The anima comes out of an emotional act, taking place in darkness, the compensation for the crime against the fire; the anima is the compensating element that must be extracted from matter.
It must be begotten by a creative act to compensate for the rape of the fire.
A man needs to be hostile to woman in order to free himself from the ”Baubo” that he sees in his mother.
When the Primeval Mother is overcome the anima can become a world consciousness; she must be chiseled from the earth.
The seed of the anima is only productive when man can subordinate his libido to the female principle.
If he does not succeed the anima runs away and the man turns to violence to find himself – to the tormenting of those around him or the boasting of self-importance.
It naturally makes a great difference in practice to a woman whether a man projects a positive or negative anima on to her, but psychologically speaking they are equivalent projections. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 32.

Carl Jung on “Middle Age.” [Anthology] (2015-07-10 15:30)

From the middle of life, only he who is willing to die with life remains living. Since what takes place in the secret hour of life’s midday is the reversal of the parabola, the birth of death … Carl Jung; Soul and death, CW 8, §800.

From the middle of life onward, only he remains vitally alive who is ready to die with life. Carl Jung; CW 8; Para 800.
Unfortunately I know far too little of X.'s personal life to presume to an opinion, but with young people one must always be careful in this respect, because the demands of instinct are only too easily covered up by deceptive spiritual interests. ...I would conjecture that this is so because middle life has set in too early in consequence of a relatively short life expectancy. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 169.
You must be in the middle of life, surrounded by death on all sides. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 370.
Life is an energetic process like any other. But every energetic process is in principle irreversible and therefore unequivocally directed toward a goal, and the goal is the state of rest ... From the middle of life, only he who is willing to die with life remains living. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 274, Footnote 75.

George Hogel on meeting Carl Jung. (2015-07-10 15:35)

After a walk through the woods to what looked like a fairy tale castle by the side of the lake, the great wooden door was opened to my knock by the huge old hired man, smoking a pipe and with an axe in his hand.
In lame German I asked for Herr Doctor, and in idiomatic English he introduced himself - not the dignified professor I had expected.
As we stood on the beautiful shore he put me somewhat at ease, chatting about his building of his hideaway.
My hesitance and inhibitions were replaced soon after by the conviction that here was a very fallible, rigid old man, as we got into an enormously heated argument about the international situation.
Having helped me realize he was quite human and that it was quite safe to show some feeling, he escorted me up to an elegant Swiss tea which we shared with Emma Jung.
They enquired at length about the situation in Germany, no doubt the reason he was willing to see a non-German coming recently out of that country.

I knew nothing of the controversy regarding his questionable sympathies for the Germans, but certainly at that time I got no impression that he had ever been warm in any way toward Nazism, rather that he only tried to understand what it all meant at a deeper level.
Finally we were alone for about an hour, during which he dealt graciously and helpfully with my impossible enquiry as to what I should do with my life, knowing nothing about me, and yet no doubt knowing much just by observing. Instead of answering my questions he gave me other, better questions to ask myself over the succeeding months. Most of all as I later mused over the experience of being with this extraordinary man, I felt there must be great worth and depth in an association with his work.
Eleven years later I . . . completed my analytic training in London. George Hogel, J.E.T. Page 118.

Carl Jung on ”Prayer.” Anthology (2015-07-11 13:40)

Divine grace is not, so to speak, conjured up, the priest does not make a sort of magic incantation in the prayer of consecration to compel the intervention of divine grace; but the Mass itself is a divine intervention, of which man should become aware. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XIII, Page 110.

The well-known sentence in the Lord's Prayer, "Deliver us from evil", meant, as it was first understood, deliver us from the evil principle of the Heimarmene. Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 225.

The prayer or mantra which is repeated while they walk round these stupas is "om mani padme hum". Om is a primeval sound, you find it in every culture which is still growing on its original foundations, and we ourselves make the same sound to express natural pleasure, we m-m about food , for instance. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 2Dec1938, Page 36.

Great is the need of the dead. But the God needs no sacrificial prayer. He has neither goodwill nor ill will. He is kind and fearful, though not actually so, but only seems to you thus. But the dead hear your prayers since they are still of human nature and not free of goodwill and ill will. Unknown woman to Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 339.

Man's relationship to God probably has to undergo a certain important change: Instead of the propitiating praise to an unpredictable king or the child's prayer to a loving father, the responsible living and fulfilling of the divine love in us will be our form of worship of, and commerce with, God.

We continually pray that "this cup may pass from us" and not harm us. Even Christ did so, but without success. . . . We might. . . discover, among other things, that in every feature Christ's life is a prototype of individuation and hence cannot be imitated: one can only live one's own life totally in the same way with all the consequences this entails. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 76-77.

Misery does not always teach prayer by any means but far more often cursing, violence, and criminality. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 216-217.

The universal hero myth always refers to a powerful man or god-man who vanquishes evil in the form of dragons, serpents, monsters, demons, and so on, and who liberates his people from destruction and death. The narration or ritual repetition of sacred texts and ceremonies, and the worship of such a figure with dances, music, hymns, prayers, and sacrifices, grip the audience with numinous emotions and exalt the individual to an identification with the hero. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols; Page 68.

Carl Jung on "Fate." [Anthology] (2015-07-11 14:54)

But a conscious attitude that renounces its ego-bound intentions—not in imagination only, but in truth—and submits to the supra-personal decrees of fate, can claim to be serving a king. This more exalted attitude raises the status of the anima from that of a temptress to a psychopomp. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 380.

Nature is awful, and I often ask myself, should one not interfere? But one cannot really, it is impossible, because fate must be fulfilled. It is apparently more important to nature that one should have consciousness, understanding, than to avoid suffering. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1416.

You see, in the actual functioning of the psyche, it does not matter whether you do a thing or whether it happens to you; whether it reaches you from without or happens within, fate moves through yourself and outside circumstances equally. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 896.

The ancients called the saving word the Logos, an expression of divine reason. So much unreason / was in man that he needed reason to be saved. If one waits long enough, one sees how the Gods all change into serpents and underworld dragons in the end. This is also the fate of the Logos: in the end it poisons us all. In time, we were all poisoned, but unknowingly we kept the One, the Powerful One, the eternal wanderer in us away from the poison. We spread poison and paralysis around us in that we want to educate all the world around us into reason. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 280.

The ancients devised magic to compel fate. They needed it to determine outer fate. We need it to determine inner fate and to find the way that we are unable to conceive. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 311.

The announcement of an important truth, even with the best of intentions, can lead to an extraordinary mess. That was the fate of Prometheus. It is therefore important to husband dangerous material very carefully so that first graders do not get hold of dynamite. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 59.

For the son, the animus is hidden in the dominating power of the mother and sometimes she leaves him with a sentimental attachment that lasts throughout life and seriously impairs the fate of the adult. Carl Jung, CW 9, Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious, Page 29.

Archetypes are complexes of experience that come upon us like fate, and their effects are felt in our most personal life. The anima no longer crosses our path as a goddess, but, it may be, as an intimately personal misadventure, or perhaps as our best venture. When, for instance, a highly esteemed professor in his seventies abandons his family and runs off with a young red-headed actress, we know that the gods have claimed another victim. Carl Jung; "Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious"; CW 9, Part I: The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious. Page 62.

Emptiness is a great feminine secret. It is something absolutely alien to man; the chasm, the unplumbed depths, the yin. The pitifulness of this vacuous nonentity goes to his heart (I speak here as a man), and one is tempted to say that this constitutes the whole "mystery" of woman. Such a female is fate itself. A man may say what he likes about it; be for it or against it, or both at once; in the end he falls, absurdly happy, into this pit, or, if he does not, he has missed and bungled his only chance of making a man of himself. In the first case one cannot disprove his foolish good luck to him, and in the second one cannot make his misfortune seem plausible. "The Mothers, the Mothers, how eerily it sounds!" Carl Jung; "Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype" (1939); CW 8: The Structure and Dynamics of the Psyche. P.183

The primordial image, or archetype, is a figure–be it a daemon, a human being, or a process–that constantly recurs in the course of history and appears wherever creative fantasy is freely expressed. Essentially, therefore, it is a mythological figure. . . . In each of these images there is a little piece of human psychology and human fate, a remnant of the joys and sorrows that have been repeated countless times in our ancestral history. . . . Carl Jung; On the Relation of Analytical Psychology to Poetry; CW 15; 127.

Before the bar of nature and fate, unconsciousness is never accepted as an excuse; on the contrary there are very severe penalties for it. Carl Jung; Answer to Job; CW 11; Psychology and Religion: West and East; Page 608.

When I was working on the stone tablets, I became aware of the fateful links between me and my ancestors. I feel very strongly that I am under the influence of things or questions which were left incomplete and unanswered by my parents and grandparents and more distant ancestors. It often seems as if there were an impersonal karma within a family, which is passed on from parents to children. It has always seemed to me that I had to answer questions which fate had posed to my forefathers, and which had not yet been answered, or as if I had to complete, or perhaps continue, things which previous ages had left unfinished. It is difficult to determine whether these questions are more of a personal or more of a general (collective) nature. It seems to me that the latter is the case. A collective problem, if not recognized as such, always appears as a personal problem, and in individual cases may give the impression that something is out of order in the realm of the personal psyche. The personal sphere is indeed disturbed, but such disturbances need not be primary; they may well be secondary, the consequence of an insupportable change in the social atmosphere. The cause of disturbance is, therefore, not to be sought in the personal surroundings, but rather in the collective situation. Psychotherapy has hitherto taken this matter far too little into account. Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams, Reflections; Pages 233-234.

The doctor should not strive to heal at all costs. One has to be exceedingly careful not to impose one's own will and conviction on the patient. ... Sometimes it is really a question whether you are allowed to rescue a man from the fate he must undergo for the sake of his further development. Carl Jung; Analytical Psychology: Its Theory and Practice; 1935.

. . . the self is our life's goal, for it is the completest expression of that fateful combination we call individuality . . . Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Page 398 and Two Essays on Analytical Psychology, CW 7, par. 404.

One clings to possessions that have once meant wealth; and the more ineffective, incomprehensible, and lifeless they become the more obstinately people cling to them. (Naturally it is only sterile ideas that they cling to; living ideas have content and riches enough, so there is no need to cling to them.) Thus in the course of time the meaningful turns into the meaningless. This is unfortunately the fate of metaphysical ideas. Carl Jung; Aion;Page 34; Paragraph 65.

From the beginning I had a sense of destiny, as though my life was assigned to me by fate and had to be fulfilled. This gave me an inner security, and, though I could never prove it to myself, it proved itself to me. I did not have this certainty, it had me. Nobody could rob me of the conviction that it was enjoined upon me to do what God wanted and not what I wanted.

That gave me the strength to go my own way. Often I had the feeling that in all decisive matters I was no longer among men, but was alone with God. And when I was "there," where I was no longer alone, I was outside time; I belonged to the centuries; and He who then gave answer was He who had always been, who had been before my birth. He who always is was there. These talks with the "Other" were my profoundest experiences: on the one hand a bloody struggle, on the other supreme ecstasy. Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams and Reflections; Page 48.

"All my writings may be considered tasks imposed from within, their source was a fateful compulsion. What I wrote were things that assailed me from within myself. I permitted the spirit that moved me to speak out." Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams and Reflections; Page 222.

The psychological rule says that when an inner situation is not made conscious, it happens outside, as fate. That is to say, when the individual remains undivided and does not become conscious of his inner opposite, the world must perforce act out the conflict and be torn into opposing halves. Carl Jung, Aion, Christ: A Symbol of the Self, Pages 70-71, Para 126.

The earthly fate of the Church as the body of Christ is modelled on the earthly fate of Christ himself. That is to say the Church, in the course of her history, moves towards a death. Carl Jung, Mysterium Coniunctionis, CW 14, par. 28, note 194.

We cannot receive the Holy Spirit unless we have accepted our own individual life as Christ accepted his. Thus we become the "sons of god" fated to experience the conflict of the divine opposites, represented by the crucifixion. Carl Jung, CW 18, par. 1551.

Individuals who believe they are masters of their fate are as a rule the slaves of destiny. Carl Jung, Letter to Valentine Brooke, 16Nov1959.

It is a shame everything has to go to the devil, but human beings are such fools that they obviously deserve no better fate. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 455-456.

There are cases where it is better not to interfere; we must fulfil our duty as doctors, but the fact remains that some people are not meant to be cured, they are not fitted for life and if you step in and interfere fate always takes its revenge on you. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 27.

This is a dream of fate which gives the dreamer information as to the course his life will take and in this case the actual end was suicide. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 2, Page 182.

This was the case with our dreamer; fate is not devilish but elfish and chose this moment to bring a new influence into his life. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 177.

Speaking from the standpoint of many thousands of dreams I cannot say that they show guidance. It is as if the dream were quite uninterested in the fate of the ego, it is pure Nature, it expresses the given thing, it mirrors the state of our consciousness with complete detachment ; it never says "to do it in such and such a way would be well", but states that it is so. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 198.

There are certain dreams which seem really to concern themselves with the fate of the ego, but these belong to the category of big dreams. Dreams as a whole are without purpose, like nature herself, it is wiser to regard them as such. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 198.

It sometimes happens that such people identify with a content in a dream that belongs to a fate which it is far beyond their capacity to live, and this may cause a bad split, or even a psychosis. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 204.

But the right way to wholeness is made up, unfortunately, of fateful detours and wrong turnings. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 6.

In the centre there is a lotus with the Buddha sitting in it, and the decisive experience is the final knowledge that the meditator himself is the Buddha, whereby the fateful knots woven in the opening story are apparently resolved. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Page 572.

The quiet meditativeness that radiates from the fate you have described is rather like a verse from a hymn-book which one unexpectedly comes across again after 50 years. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 296-297.
It is lovely to hear the word ”friend” from you. Fate seems to have apportioned to us the role of two piers which support the bridge between East and West. Carl Jung to Richard Wilhelm, Letters Vol. 1, Page 66.
Marriage is indeed a brutal reality, yet the experimentum crucis of life. I hope you learn to endure and not to struggle against the suppressing necessities of fate. Only thus you remain in the centre. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 172-173.
Whether a person’s fate comes to him from without or from within, the experiences and events of the way remain the same. Carl Jung, The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 93.
The character ming really signifies a royal command then, destiny, fate, the fate allotted to a man, so too, the duration of life, the measure of vitality at one’s disposal, and thus it comes about that ming (life) is closely related to Eros. The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 11.

A certain line of thought, for instance, is developed through a series of dreams; and I discover that I am the duplicate of my unconscious anticipation of myself; at the same moment I am filled with a sense of purpose as if a secret arrangement of my fate existed. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 214.
It is as if the dream were quite uninterested in the fate of the ego, it is pure Nature, it expresses the given thing, it mirrors the state of our consciousness with complete detachment; it never says ”to do it in such and such a way would be well”, but states that it is so. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 8March1935, Pages 198.
The form in which Christ presented the content of his unconscious to the world became accepted and was declared valid for all. Thereafter all individual fantasies became otiose and worthless, and were persecuted as heretical, as the fate of the Gnostic movement and of all later heresies testifies. The prophet Jeremiah is speaking just in this vein when he warns Carl Jung, CW 6, §BI.
We had to swallow the poison of science. Otherwise we would have met the same fate as you have: we’d be completely lamed, if we encountered it unsuspecting and unprepared. This poison is so insurmountably strong that everyone, even the strongest, and even the eternal Gods, perish because of it. Carl Jung to Izdubar, Liber Novus, Page 279.
If one waits long enough, one sees how the Gods all change into serpents and underworld dragons in the end. This is also the fate of the Logos: in the end it poisons us all. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 280.

Carl Jung on what is ”Real” and ”Reality.” [Anthology] (2015-07-13 05:14)

The image of God has a shadow. The supreme meaning is real and casts a shadow. For what can be actual and corporeal and have no shadow? Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 230

This vision lasted for two hours, it confused me and made me ill. I was not able to interpret it. Two weeks passed then the vision returned, still more violent than before, and an inner voice spoke: ”look at it, it is completely real, and it will come to pass. You cannot doubt this.” I wrestled again for two hours with this vision, but it held me fast. It left me exhausted and confused. And I thought my mind had gone crazy. Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 231

Everything to come was already in images: to find their soul, the ancients went into the desert. This is an image. The ancients lived their symbols, since the world had not yet become real for them. Thus they went into the solitude of the desert to teach us that the place of the soul is a lonely desert. There they found the abundance of visions, the fruits of the desert, the wondrous flowers of the soul. Think diligently about the images that the ancients have left behind. They show the way of what is to come. look back at the collapse of empires, of growth and death, of the desert and monasteries, they are the images of what is to come. Everything has been foretold. But who knows how to interpret it? Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 236.

When the desert begins to bloom, it brings forth strange plants. You will consider yourself mad, and in a certain sense you will in fact be mad. To the extent that the Christianity of this time lacks madness, it lacks divine life. Take note of what the ancients taught us in images: madness is divine. But because the ancients lived this image concretely in events, it became a deception for us, since we became masters of the reality of the world. It is unquestionable: if you enter into the world of the soul, you are like a madman, and a doctor would consider you to be sick. Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 238.

If you are in your solitude, and all the space around you has become cold and unending, then you have moved far from men, and at the same time you have come near to them as never before. Selfish desire only" apparently led you to men, but in reality it led you away from them and in the end to yourself which to you and to others was the most remote. But now, if you are in solitude, your God leads you to the God of others, and through that to the true neighbor, to the neighbor of the self in others. Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 245

Day does not exist through itself, night does not exist through itself. The reality that exists through itself is day and night. So the reality is meaning and absurdity. Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 242

I: "What my eyes see is exactly what I cannot grasp. You, Elijah, who are a prophet, the mouth of God, and she, a bloodthirsty horror. You are the symbol of the most extreme contradiction."

Elijah: "We are real and not symbols." Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 246.

Elijah: "You may call us symbols for the same reason that you can also call your fellow men symbols, if you wish to. But we are just as real as your fellow men. You invalidate nothing and solve nothing by calling us symbols."

I: "You plunge me into a terrible confusion. Do you wish to be real?"

E: "We are certainly what you call real. Here we are, and you have to accept us. The choice is yours." Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 249.

The image of the mother of God with the child that I foresee, indicates to me the mystery of the transformation. If forethinking and pleasure unite in me, a third arises from them, the divine son, who is the supreme meaning, the symbol, the passing over into a new creation. I do not myself become the supreme meaning or the symbol, but the symbol becomes in me such that it has its substance, and I mine. Thus I stand like Peter in worship before the miracle of the transformation and the becoming real of the God in me. Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 250

I earnestly confronted my devil and behaved with him as with a real person. This I learned in the Mysterium: to take seriously every unknown wanderer who personally inhabits the inner world, since they are real because they are effectual. Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 260.

I: "Forgive me, but are you real? It's the sorriest likeness to those foolishly threadbare scenes in novels for me. to assume that you are not simply some unfortunate product of my sleepless brain. Is my doubt then truly confirmed by a situation that conforms so thoroughly with a sentimental romance?"

She: "You wretch, how can you doubt that I am real?"

But still she lies there, crying-yet what if she were real? Then she would be worth feeling sorry for, every man would have compassion for her. If she is a decent girl, what must it have cost her to enter into the room of a strange man! And to overcome her shame in this way?

I: "My dear child, I believe you, despite everything, that you are real. What can I do for you?"

She: "Finally, finally a word from a human mouth!

She gets up, her face beaming. She is beautiful. A deep purity rests in her look. She has a beautiful and unworldly soul, one that wants to come into the life of reality; to all reality worthy of pity; to the bath of filth and the well of health. Oh this beauty of the soul! To see it climb down into the underworld of reality what a spectacle! Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 262

She: "So-you see: even banal reality is a redeemer. I thank you, dear friend, and I bring you greetings from Salome." Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 263

Incidentally-mustn't it be a peculiarly beautiful feeling to hit bottom in reality at least once, where there is no going down any further, but only upward beckons at best? Where for once one stands before the whole height of reality? Carl Jung; Red Book; Page 266.

Carl Jung on Suffering. Anthology. (2015-07-13 05:36)

Tears, sorrow, and disappointment are bitter, but wisdom is the comforter in all psychic suffering. Indeed, bitterness and wisdom form a pair of alternatives: where there is bitterness wisdom is lacking, and where wisdom is there can be no bitterness. CW 20: Mysterium Coniunctionis, para 330, page 246

In our most private and most subjective lives, we are not only the passive witnesses of our age, and its sufferers, but also its makers. We make our own epoch. Carl Gustav Jung, The Symbolic Life, Collected Works 18, par.1400

There can be no resolution - only patient endurance - of the opposites which ultimately spring from your own nature. You yourself are a conflict that rages in itself and against itself in order to melt its incompatible substances, the male and the female in the fire of suffering and thus create that form which is the goal of life. Everyone goes through this mill - consciously or unconsciously, voluntarily or forcibly. We are crucified between the opposites and delivered up to the torture until this third reconciling takes shape. Extracted from an extraordinary letter to a friend Mrs. Frobel, written at age 70 in 1945.

People whose own temperaments offer problems are often neurotic, but it would be a serious misunderstanding to confuse the existence of problems with neurosis. There is a marked difference between the two in that the neurotic is ill because he is unconscious of his problems, while the person with a difficult temperament suffers from his conscious problems without being ill. "The Stages of Life" (1930). In CW 8: The Structure and Dynamics of the Psyche. P.763

The world is God's suffering, and every individual human being who wishes even to approach his own wholeness knows very well that this means bearing his own cross. But the eternal promise for him who bears his own cross is the Paraclete." (from "A Psychological Approach to the Dogma of the Trinity", 1942)

In the case of psychological suffering, which always isolates the individual from the herd of so-called normal people, it is of the greatest importance to understand that the conflict is not a personal failure only, but at the same time a suffering common to all and a problem with which the whole epoch is burdened. This general point of view lifts the individual out of himself and connects him with humanity. - Analytical Psychology: Its Theory and Practice: The Tavistock Lectures. (1935). In CW 18 (retitled) "The Tavistock Lectures" P.116

The great events of world history are, at bottom, profoundly unimportant. In the last analysis, the essential thing is the life of the individual. This alone makes history, here alone do the great transformations first take place, and the whole future, the whole history of the world, ultimately spring as a gigantic summation from these hidden sources in individuals .In our most private and most subjective lives, we are not only the passive witnesses of our age, and its sufferers, but also its makers. We make our own epoch. Carl Gustav Jung, The Symbolic Life, Collected Works 18, par.1400.

". . . The development of consciousness is the burden, the suffering, and the blessing of humankind." C.G. Jung, 1955.

The object of therapy is not the neurosis but the man who has the neurosis. We have long known, for instance, that a cardiac neurosis comes not from the heart, as the old medical mythology would have it, but from the mind of the sufferer. Nor does it come from some obscure corner of the unconscious, as many psychotherapists still struggle to believe; it comes from the totality of a man's life and from all the experiences that have accumulated over the years and decades, and finally, not merely from his life as an individual but from his psychic experience within the family or even the social group. "The State of Psychotherapy Today" (1934). In CW 10: Civilization in Transition. P.337

The realization of the self, which would logically follow from recognition of its supremacy, leads to a fundamental conflict, to a real suspension between opposites (reminiscent of the crucified Christ hanging between two thieves), and to an approximate state of wholeness that lacks perfection. . . . The individual may strive after perfection . . . but must suffer from the opposite of his intentions for the sake of his completeness. ["Christ, A Symbol of the Self, ibid" par. 123.]

"If God wishes to be born as man and to unite mankind in the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, He suffers the terrible torment of having to bear the world in its reality. It is a crux; indeed, He Himself is His own cross. The world is God's suffering, and every individual human being who wishes even to approach his own wholeness knows very well that this means bearing his own cross. But the eternal promise for him who bears his own cross is the Paraclete." (from "A Psychological Approach to the Dogma of the Trinity", 1942)

"As this "inside" is invisible and cannot be imagined, even though it can affect consciousness in the most pronounced manner, I induce those of my patients who suffer mainly from the effects of this "inside" to set them down in pictorial form as best they can. The aim of this method of expression is to make the unconscious contents accessible and so bring them closer to the patient's understanding. The therapeutic effect of this is to prevent a dangerous splitting-off of the unconscious processes from consciousness. In contrast to objective or "conscious" representations, all pictorial representations of processes and effects in the psychic background are symbolic. They point, in a rough and approximate way, to a meaning that for the time being is unknown. “ (CW15 § 207)

“What I have to say begins where the treatment leaves off and this development sets in. Thus my contribution to psychotherapy confines itself to those cases where rational treatment does not yield satisfactory results. The clinical material at my disposal is of a peculiar composition: new cases are decidedly in the minority. Most of them already have some form of psychotherapeutic treatment behind them, with partial or negative results. About a third of my cases are not suffering from any clinically definable neurosis, but from the senselessness and aimlessness of their lives. I should not object if this were called the general neurosis of our age. Fully two thirds of my patients are in the second half of life.” (CW16, § 83)

[Carl Jung on being ”Alone.”] Anthology. (2015-07-13 05:46)

[Carl Jung on being ”Alone.”] Anthology.
My I, you are a barbarian. I want to live with you; therefore I will carry you through an utterly medieval Hell, until you are capable of making living with you bearable. You should be the vessel and womb of life, therefore I shall purify you. The touchstone is being alone with oneself. This is the way. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 330.
Your heights are your own mountain, which belongs to you and you alone. There you are individual and live your very own life. If you live your own life, you do not live the common life, which is always continuing and never-ending, the life of history and the inalienable and ever-present burdens and products of the human race. There you live the endlessness of being, but not the becoming. Becoming belongs to the heights and is full of torment. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 267.

To the extent that he does live in reality the whole range of his particular life, the individual is . . . an alchemical retort, in which the elements present in the collective are melted down and refashioned to form a new synthesis, which is then offered to the collective. But the predigestion of evil which he carried out as part of the process of assimilating his shadow makes him, at the same time, an agent for the immunization of the collective. An individual's shadow is invariably bound up with the collective shadow of his group, and as he digests his own evil, a fragment of the collective evil is invariably co-digested at the same time. Erich Neumann, Depth Psychology and a New Ethic, p. 130.

The highest and most decisive experience of all . . . is to be alone with . . . [one's] own self, or whatever else one chooses to call the objectivity of the psyche. The patient must be alone if he is to find out what it is that supports him when he can no longer support himself. Only this experience can give him an indestructible foundation. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, CW 12, par. 32.

[The philosophers] called their stone animate because, at the final operations, by virtue of the power of this most noble fiery mystery, a dark red liquid, like blood, sweats out drop by drop from their material and their vessel. And for this reason they have prophesied that in the last days a most pure [or genuine] man, through whom the world will be freed, will come to earth and will sweat bloody drops of a rosy or red hue, whereby the world will be redeemed from its Fall. In like manner, too, the blood of their stone will free the leprous metals a and also men from their diseases. . . . and that is the reason why the stone is called animate.

For in the blood of this stone is hidden its soul. . . . For a like reason they have called it their microcosm, because it contains the similitude of all things of this word, and therefore again they say that it is animate, as Plato calls the macrocosm animate. Gerhard Dorn, Quoted in Alchemical Studies, CW 13, par. 381.

Since the stone represents the homo totus, it is only logical for Dorn to speak of the "putissimus homo" [most true man] when discussing the arcane substance and its bloody sweat, for this is what it is all about. He is the arcanum, and the stone and its parallel or prefiguration is Christ in the garden of Gethsemane. This "most pure" or "most true" man must be no other than what he is, just as "argentum putum" is unalloyed silver; he must be entirely man, a man who knows and possesses everything human and is not adulterated by any influence or admixture from without. This man will appear on earth only "in the last days." He cannot be Christ, for Christ by his blood has already redeemed the world from the consequences of the Fall. . . . On no account is it a question here of a future Christ and salvator microcosmi, but rather of the alchemical servator cosmi (preserver of the cosmos), representing the still unconscious idea of the whole and complete man, who shall bring about what the sacrificial death of Christ has obviously left unfinished, namely the deliverance of the world from evil. Like Christ he will sweat a redeeming blood, but . . . it is "rose-colored"; not natural or ordinary blood, but symbolic blood, a psychic substance, the manifestation of a certain kind of Eros which unifies the individual as well as the multitude in the sign of the rose and makes them whole. Gerhard Dorn, Quoted in Alchemical Studies, CW 13, par. 390.

As a doctor it is my task to help the patient to cope with life. I cannot presume to pass judgment on his final decisions, because I know from experience that all coercion-be it suggestion, insinuation, or any other method of persuasion-ultimately proves to be nothing but an obstacle to the highest and most decisive experience of all, which is to be alone with his own self, or whatever else one chooses to call the objectivity of the psyche. The patient must be alone if he is to find out what it is that supports him when he can no longer support himself. Only this experience can give him an indestructible foundation. Carl Jung; Psychology and Alchemy; CW 12: Page 32.

As a child I felt myself to be alone, and I am still, because I know things and must hint at things which others apparently know nothing of, and for the most part do not want to know. Loneliness does not come from having no people about one, but from being unable to communicate the things that seem important to oneself, or from holding certain views which others find inadmissible. Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Page 356.

What is meant is, that you should be with yourself, not alone but with yourself, and you can be with yourself even in a crowd. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1484.

”Synchronicity” is all too often tossed about describing events which do not adhere to the synchronistic events (2015-07-13 09:10)

[Sadly ”Synchronicity” is all too often tossed about describing events which do not adhere to the synchronistic events as used within Depth Psychology.]
Synchronicity:
A phenomenon where an event in the outside world coincides meaningfully with a psychological state of mind.
Synchronicity . . . consists of two factors: a) An unconscious image comes into consciousness either directly (i.e., literally) or indirectly (symbolized or suggested) in the form of a dream, idea, or premonition. b) An objective situation coincides with this content. The one is as puzzling as the other.[”Synchronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle,” ibid., par. 858.]
Jung associated synchronistic experiences with the relativity of space and time and a degree of unconsciousness.
The very diverse and confusing aspects of these phenomena are, so far as I can see at present, completely explicable on the assumption of a psychically relative space-time continuum. As soon as a psychic content crosses the threshold of consciousness, the synchronistic marginal phenomena disappear, time and space resume their accustomed sway, and consciousness is once more isolated in its subjectivity. . . . Conversely, synchronistic phenomena can be evoked by putting the subject into an unconscious state.[”On the Nature of the Psyche,” CW 8, par. 440.]
Synchronicity was defined by Jung as an ”acausal connecting principle,” an essentially mysterious connection between the personal psyche and the material world, based on the fact that at bottom they are only different forms of energy.
It is not only possible but fairly probable, even, that psyche and matter are two different aspects of one and the same thing. The synchronicity phenomena point, it seems to me, in this direction, for they show that the nonpsychic can behave like the psychic, and vice versa, without there being any causal connection between them.[Ibid., par. 418.]

[Carl Jung on “Individuation.”] Anthology. (2015-07-13 14:20)

The individual is obliged by the collective demands to purchase his individuation at the cost of an equivalent work for the benefit of society. Carl Jung, The Symbolic Life, Page 452.

Individuation and collectivity are a pair of opposites, two divergent destinies. They are related to one another by guilt. Carl Jung, The Symbolic Life, Page 452.

In the last analysis every life is the realization of a whole, that is, of a self, for which reason this realization can also be called ”individuation.” Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 222.

You can never come to your self by building a meditation hut on top of Mount Everest; you will only be visited by your own ghosts and that is not individuation: you are all alone with yourself and the self doesn't exist. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 805.

Individuation is only possible with people, through people. You must realize that you are a link in a chain, that you are not an electron suspended somewhere in space or aimlessly drifting through the cosmos. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 103.

Individuation is not that you become an ego—you would then become an individualist. You know, an individualist is a man who did not succeed in individuating; he is a philosophically distilled egotist. Carl Jung, The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga, Pages 39-40.

Where one is identified with the collective unconscious, there is no recognition of the things which come from the unconscious, they cannot be distinguished from those of the self. Such a condition is a possession by the anima or animus. Possession by the animus or anima creates a certain psychological hermaphroditism. The principle of individuation demands a dissociation or differentiation of the male and the female in ourselves. We must dissociate our self from the unconscious. Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Page 26.

Before [individuation] can be taken as a goal, the educational aim of adaptation to the necessary minimum of collective norms must first be attained. If a plant is to unfold its specific nature to the full, it must first be able to grow in the soil in which it is planted. Carl Jung; "Definitions," CW 6, par. 761.

The difference between the "natural" individuation process, which runs its course unconsciously, and the one that is consciously realized is tremendous. In the first case, consciousness nowhere intervenes; the end remains as dark as the beginning. In the second case, so much darkness comes to light that the personality is permeated with light and consciousness necessarily gains in scope and insight. The encounter between conscious and unconscious has to ensure that the light that shines in the darkness is not only comprehended by the darkness, but comprehends it (from "Answer to Job" in CW 11, par. 756).

Insofar as this process [of individuation], as a rule, runs its course unconsciously as it has from time immemorial, it means no more than that the acorn becomes an oak, the calf a cow, and the child an adult. But if the individuation process is made conscious, consciousness must confront the unconscious and a balance between the opposites must be found . Carl Jung; "Answer to Job"; CW 11, par. 755.

Alchemy has performed for me the great and invaluable service of providing material in which my experience could find sufficient room, and has thereby made it possible for me to describe the individuation process at least in its essential aspects. Carl Jung; Mysterium Coniunctionis; Paragraph 792.

The goal of the individuation process is the synthesis of the self. Carl Jung; CW 9i; Page 278.

Individuation does not shut one out from the world, but gathers the world to oneself. Carl Jung; "On the Nature of the Psyche," 1947.

The problem of crucifixion is the beginning of individuation; there is the secret meaning of the Christian symbolism, a path of blood and suffering. Carl Jung; Quoted in Aspects of Jung's Personality and Work by Gerhard Adler

The dead who besiege us are souls who have not fulfilled the principium individuationis, or else they would have become distant stars. Insofar as we do nto fulfill it, the dead have a claim on us and besiege us and we cannot escape them. Carl Jung; The Red Book; Appendix C; Page 370

You see as the individual is not just a single, separate being, but by his very existence presupposes a collective relationship, it follows that the process of individuation must lead to more intense relationships and not to isolation. Carl Jung; CW 6; Page 448; Paragraph 758.

The mystery of the Eucharist transforms the soul of the empirical man, who is only a part of himself, into his totality, symbolically expressed by Christ. In this sense, therefore, we can speak of the Mass as the rite of the individuation process. Carl Jung; Psychology and Religion

The God-image in man was not destroyed by the Fall but was only damaged and corrupted ('deformed'), and can be restored through God's grace. The scope of the integration is suggested by the descent of Christ's soul to hell, its work of redemption embracing even the dead. The psychological equivalent of this is the integration of the collective unconscious which forms an essential part of the individuation process. Carl Jung; Aion; Page 39; Para 72.

The problem of crucifixion is the beginning of individuation; there is the secret meaning of the Christian symbolism, a of blood and suffering. Carl Jung, unpublished letter, quoted in Gerhard Adler, Aspects of Jung's Personality and Work, p. 12.

Individuation and individual existence are indispensable for the transformation of God. Human consciousness is the only seeing eye of the Deity. Carl Jung, Nietzsche's Zarathustra, 336, 409, Letters II, 314ff.
The individuation process is a development on the native soil of Christianity. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 395-398.
Thus the devil is a preliminary stage of individuation, in the negative it has the same goal as the divine quaternity, namely, wholeness. Although it is still darkness, it already carries the germ of light within itself. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 372.
The division into four is a principium individuationis; it means to become one or a whole in the face of the many figures that carry the danger of destruction in them. It is what overcomes death and can bring about rebirth. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 372.
One could say that the whole world with its turmoil and misery is in an individuation process. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 442.
Individuation is by no means a rare thing or a luxury of the few, but those who know that they are in such a process are considered to be lucky. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 442.
Individuation is just ordinary life and what you are made conscious of. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 442.
In the process of individuation, too, new contents can announce themselves in this devouring form and darken consciousness; this is experienced as a depression, that is to say, as being pulled downward. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 373.
I cannot quite agree with your opinion about "individuation." It is not "individualization" but a conscious realization of everything the existence of an individual implies: his needs, his tasks, his duties, his responsibilities, etc. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 503-505.
Individuation does not isolate, it connects. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 503-505.
A child, too, enters into this sublimity, and there detaches himself from this world and his manifold individuations more quickly than the aged. So easily does he become what you also are that he apparently vanishes. Sooner or later all the dead become what we also are. But in this reality we know little or nothing about that mode of being, and what shall we still know of this earth after death? Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 343.
The analysis of older people provides a wealth of dream symbols that psychically prepare the dreams for impending death. It is in fact true, as Jung has emphasized, that the unconscious psyche pays very little attention to the abrupt end of bodily life and behaves as if the psychic life of the individual, that is, the individuation process, will simply continue. ... The unconscious "believes" quite obviously in a life after death. Marie-Louise von Franz (1987), ix.
Individuation is a philosophical, spiritual and mystical experience Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Page 294.
Individuation is the transformational process of integrating the conscious with the personal and collective unconscious Carl Jung, Symbols of Transformation, Page 301.
When these two aspects [physical and psychological] work together, it may easily happen that the cure takes place in the intermediate realm, in other words that it consists of a complexio oppositorum, like the lapis. In this case the illness is in the fullest sense a stage of the individuation process.... Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 375.
Human beings do not stand in one world only but between two worlds and must distinguish themselves from their functions in both worlds. This is individuation. You are rejecting dreams and seeking action. Then the dreams come and thwart your actions. The dreams are a world, and the real is a world. You have to stand between the gods and men. Carl Jung to Sabina Spielrein January 21, 1918.
Relationship paves the way for individuation and makes it possible, but is itself no proof of wholeness. Carl Jung, CW 16, Page 244, Footnote 15
Our age is striving to bring about a conglomeration and organization of enormous masses of people in which the individual suffocates, whereas meditation on the Process of Individuation leads in the reverse direction: to the problem of the spiritual development of the individual. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. V, Page 11.
The process of individuation is founded on the instinctive urge of every living creature to reach its own totality and fulfilment. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. V, Page 11.
This is the reason why such people always fall in love with those who don't love them in return. It is in order to prevent the erotic experience, because such an experience would alienate the person from her secret purpose, which, at least for the time being, is individuation. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 169-170.

Like neurosis, psychosis in its inner course is a process of individuation, but one that is usually not joined up with consciousness and therefore runs its course in the unconscious as an Ouroboros. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 371.
And this being has body, soul and spirit, and is, therefore, the principle of life itself, as well as the principle of individuation. Its nature is spiritual, it cannot be seen, and it contains an invisible image. Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 221.
Jung gave great importance to the papal bull of the Assumptio Maria. He held that it "points to the hieros gamos in the pleroma, and this in turn implies, as we have said, the future birth of the divine child, who, in accordance with the divine trend toward incarnation, will choose as his birthplace the empirical man. This metaphysical process is known as the individuation process in the psychology of the unconscious" Liber Novus, Footnote 200, Page 299.
In other words, individuation, becoming conscious of the Self, is divine suffering. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 201.
Before [individuation] can be taken as a goal, the educational aim of adaptation to the necessary minimum of collective norms must first be attained. Carl Jung, "Definitions," CW 6, par. 761.
The first step in individuation is tragic guilt. The accumulation of guilt demands expiation" Carl Jung, CW I5, §I094).
Animals generally signify the instinctive forces of the unconscious, which are brought into unity within the mandala. This integration of the instincts is a prerequisite for individuation. Carl Jung, CW 9ii, Para 660.
The help which alchemy affords us in understanding the symbols of the individuation process is, in my opinion, of the utmost importance. Carl Jung, CW 16, Para 219.
Individuation does not only mean that man has become truly human as distinct from animal, but that he is to become partially divine as well. That means practically that he becomes adult, responsible for his existence, knowing that he does not only depend on God but that God also depends on man. Carl Jung, Memories Dreams and Reflections, Page 408.
Individuation does not only mean that man has become truly human as distinct from animal, but that he is to become partially divine as well. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 316.
That [Individuation] means practically that he becomes adult, responsible for his existence, knowing that he does not only depend on God but that God also depends on man. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 316.
We continually pray that "this cup may pass from us" and not harm us. Even Christ did so, but without success. . . . We might. . . discover, among other things, that in every feature Christ's life is a prototype of individuation and hence cannot be imitated: one can only live one's own life totally in the same way with all the consequences this entails. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 76-77.
We have to realize the inborn divine will, which is the process of individuation. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 9.
Individuation cannot be achieved without a mystery. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 13.
Individuation is an expression of that biological process - simple or complicated as the case may be - by which every living thing becomes what it was destined to become from the beginning. Carl Jung, CW XI, Para 144.
If you succeed in remembering yourself, if you succeed in making a difference between yourself and that outburst of passion, then you discover the self; you begin to individuate. Carl Jung, The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga, Pages 39-40.
P. W. Martin, author of Experiments in Depth, used to say that the really individuated partner in the Jung couple was Mrs. Jung! Elined Prys Kotschnig; C. G. Jung, Emma Jung and Toni Wolff - A Collection of Remembrances; Page 40
"Uniqueness" lies simply and solely in the relationship between individuated persons, who have no other relationships at all except individual, i.e., unique ones. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 475.

Carl Jung on the significance of Death. (2015-07-14 06:20)

The maximum awareness which has been attained anywhere forms, so it seems to me, the upper limit of knowledge to which the dead can attain. That is probably why earthly life is of such great significance, and why it is that what a human being ”brings over” at the time of his death is so important.
Only here, in life on earth, where the opposites clash together, can the general level of consciousness be raised. That seems to be man’s metaphysical task which he cannot accomplish without ”mythologizing.”
Myth is the natural and indispensable intermediate stage between unconscious and conscious cognition. True, the unconscious knows more than consciousness does; but it is knowledge of a special sort, knowledge in eternity, usually without reference to the here and now, not couched in language of the intellect.
Only when we let its statements amplify themselves, as has been shown above by the example of numerals, does it come within the range of our understanding; only then does a new aspect become perceptible to us.
This process is convincingly repeated in every successful dream analysis. That is why it is so important not to have any preconceived, doctrinaire opinions about the statements made by dreams. As soon as a certain ”monotony of interpretation” strikes us, we know that our approach has become doctrinaire and hence sterile.
Although there is no way to marshal valid proof of continuance of the soul after death, there are nevertheless experiences which make us thoughtful. I take them as hints, and do not presume to ascribe to them the significance of insights. Carl Jung, MDR, Pages 311-312.

[Carl Jung on "Symbols" and the "Symbolic."] Anthology (2015-07-14 08:02)

Because I also want my being other, I must become a Christ. I am made into Christ, I must suffer it. Thus the redeeming blood flows. Through the self-sacrifice my pleasure is changed and goes above into its higher principle. Love is sighted, but pleasure is blind. Both principles are one in the symbol of the flame. The principles strip themselves of human form. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 254.

The symbol becomes my lord and unfailing commander. It will fortify its reign and change itself into a starry and riddling image, whose meaning turns completely inward, and whose pleasure radiates outward like blazing fire, a Buddha in the flames. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 249.
To live oneself means: to be one's own task. Never say that it is a pleasure to live oneself It will be no joy but a long suffering, since you must become your own creator. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 249.
If forethinking and pleasure unite in me, a third arises from them, the divine son, who is the supreme meaning, the symbol, the passing over into a new creation. I do not myself become the supreme meaning or the symbol, but the symbol becomes in me such that it has its substance, and I mine. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 249.
There are, and always have been, those who cannot help but see that the world and its experiences are in the nature of a symbol, and that it really reflects something that lies hidden in the subject himself, in his own transubjective reality. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Page 521, Para 859.
Matter is an hypothesis. When you say "matter," you are really creating a symbol for something unknown, which may just as well be "spirit" or anything else; it may even be God. Religious faith, on the other hand, refuses to give up its pre-Weltanschauung, in contradiction to the saying of Christ, the faithful try to remain children instead of becoming as children. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Page 477, Para 762.
I had to recognize that I am only the expression and symbol of the soul. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 234.
When we say "Our Father," the Father also symbolizes that self which is hidden in Heaven, in the unconscious. The Son (Christ) is the consciously achieved self. The Holy Spirit is the Paraclete promised by Christ in the Words "Ye are as gods," or "Greater things will be done by you." Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 35.
... something which existed before the ego and is in fact its father or creator. Carl Jung, CW 11, Transformation of Symbolism of the Mass, Page 263.
It is the role of religious symbols to give meaning to the life of man. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols.
Abstraction is an activity pertaining to the psychological functions in general. There is an abstract thinking, just as there is abstract feeling, sensation, and intuition. Abstract thinking singles out the rational, logical qualities of a given content from its intellectually irrelevant components. Abstract feeling does the same with a content characterized by its feeling-values . . . . Abstract sensation would be aesthetic as opposed to sensuous sensation, and abstract intuition would be symbolic as opposed to fantastic intuition. Carl Jung; "Definitions," CW 6, par. 678.
We are living in what the Greeks called the right time for a "metamorphosis of the gods," i.e. of the fundamental principles and symbols. This peculiarity of our time, which is certainly not of our conscious choosing, is the expression of the unconscious man within us who is changing. Coming generations will have to take account of this momentous transformation if humanity is not to destroy itself through the might of its own technology and science. Carl Jung; The Undiscovered Self; Page 110.
The self is defined psychologically as the psychic totality of the individual. Anything that a [person] postulates as being a greater totality than [oneself] can become a symbol of the self. For this reason the symbol of the self is not always as total as the definition would require. Carl Jung; "A Psychological Approach to the Trinity"; CW 11, par. 232.
The old natural philosophers . . . said that the miraculous substance, whose essential nature they symbolized by a circle divided into four parts, was man himself (Carl Jung; "Psychology and Religion"; CW 11, par. 153). One might almost say that man himself, or his innermost soul, is the prisoner or the protected inhabitant of the mandala (Carl Jung; "Psychology and Religion"; CW 11, par. 157).
Because of its unconscious component the self is so far removed from the conscious mind that it can only be partially expressed by human figures; the other part of it has to be expressed by objective, abstract symbols. The human figures are father and son, mother and daughter, king and queen, god and goddess.... Carl Jung, CW 9i, para. 314-315.
The union of opposites on a higher level of consciousness is not a rational thing, nor is it a matter of will; it is a process of psychic development that expresses itself in symbols. Carl Jung; Collected Works 13; Alchemical Studies; Page 16.
Why is psychology the youngest of the empirical sciences? Why have we not long since discovered the unconscious and raised up its treasure-house of eternal images? Simply because we had a religious formula for everything psychic — and one that is far more beautiful and comprehensive than immediate experience. Though the Christian view of the world has paled for many people, the symbolic treasure-rooms of the East are still full of marvels that can nourish for a long time to come the passion for show and new clothes. What is more, these images — are they Christian or Buddhist or what you will — are lovely, mysterious, and richly intuitive. Carl Jung; The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious; Pages 7-8.

Water is the commonest symbol for the unconscious. The lake in the valley is the unconscious, which lies, as it were, underneath consciousness, so that it is often referred to as the 'subconscious,' usually with the pejorative connotation of an inferior consciousness. Water is the 'valley spirit,' the water dragon of Tao, whose nature resembles water- a yang in the yin, therefore, water means spirit that has become unconscious." (Carl Jung, CW 9i, para 40)

There is no position without its negation. In or just because of their extreme opposition, neither can exist without the other. It is exactly as formulated in classical Chinese philosophy: yang (the light, warm, dry, masculine principle) contains within it the seed of yin (the dark, cold, moist, feminine principle), and vice versa. Matter therefore would contain the seed of spirit and spirit the seed of matter…. Nevertheless, the symbol has the great advantage of being able to unite heterogeneous or even incommensurable factors in a single image. Carl Jung; CW 9i; para. 197.

The psychic life-force, the libido, symbolizes itself… through phallic symbols. Carl Jung; Symbols of Transformation; para. 297.

Because of its unconscious component the self is so far removed from the conscious mind that it can only be partially expressed by human figures; the other part of it has to be expressed by objective, abstract symbols. The human figures are father and son, mother and daughter, king and queen, god and goddess…. Carl Jung, CW 9i, para. 314-315.

The application of the comparative method shows without a doubt that the quaternity is a more or less direct representation of the God who is manifest in his creation. We might, therefore, conclude that the symbol spontaneously produced in the dreams of modern people means something similar-the God within. Carl Jung; CW 11; para. 101

…a symbol of the unity of personality, a symbol of the self, where the war of opposites finds peace. In this way the primordial being becomes the distant goal of man's self-development. Carl Jung; CW 9i, para. 292-4.

As most people know, one of the basic principles of analytical psychology is that dream-images are to be understood symbolically; that is to say, one must not take them literally, but must surmise a hidden meaning in them. Carl Jung; Symbols of Transformation; para 4.

Everything psychic has a lower and a higher meaning, as in the profound saying of late classical mysticism: 'Heaven above, Heaven below, stars above, stars below, all that is above also is below, know this and rejoice.' Here we lay our finger on the secret symbolical significance of everything psychic. Carl Jung; CW 5; para 77.

Those born after the flesh are opposed to those born after the spirit, who are not born from the fleshly mother but rom a symbol of the mother. Carl Jung; CW 5; Para 313.

Language, in its origin and essence, is simply a system of signs or symbols that denote real occurrences or their echo in the human soul. Carl Jung; Symbols of Transformation; para. 13.

The symbols of the self arise in the depths of the body and they express its materiality every bit as much as the structure of the perceiving consciousness. The symbol is thus a living body, corpus et anima. Carl Jung; CW 9i; para 291.

I . . . regard the symbol as the announcement of something unknown, hard to recognize, and not to be fully determined. Carl Jung; Modern Man in Search of a Soul; Page 22.

In alchemy the egg stands for the chaos apprehended by the artifex, the prima materia containing the captive world-soul. Out of the egg — symbolized by the round cooking vessel — will rise the eagle or phoenix, the liberated soul, which is ultimately identical with the Anthropos who was imprisoned in the embrace of Physis. Carl Jung; Psychology and Alchemy; Page 202.

The sea is the favorite symbol for the unconscious, the mother of all that lives. Carl Jung; Special Phenomenology; Part IV; Psyche & Symbol.

Anyone who has lost the historical symbols and cannot be satisfied with substitutes is certainly in a very difficult position today: before him there yawns the void, and he turns away from it in horror. What is worse, the vacuum gets filled with absurd political and social ideas, which one and all are distinguished by their spiritual bleakness. But if he cannot get along with these pedantic dogmatisms, he sees himself forced to be serious for once with his alleged trust in God, though it usually turns out that his fear of things going wrong if he did so is even more persuasive. Carl Jung; Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious; CW 9; Part I: Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious; Page 28.

The problem of crucifixion is the beginning of individuation; there is the secret meaning of the Christian symbolism, a path of blood and suffering. Carl Jung; Quoted in Aspects of Jung's Personality and Work by Gerhard Adler

When the medical psychologist takes an interest in symbols, he is primarily concerned with "natural" symbols, as distinct from "cultural" symbols. The former are derived from the unconscious . . . the cultural on the other hand . . . used to express "eternal truths", and . . . still used in many religions. Page 83.

. . . we constantly use symbolic terms to represent concepts that we cannot define or fully comprehend. This is one of the reasons why all religions employ symbolic language or images. Carl Jung; Man and His symbols; P. 4

...a symbol of the unity of personality, a symbol of the self, where the war of opposites finds peace. In this way the primordial being becomes the distant goal of man's self-development. Carl Jung; CW 9i; Paragraph 293.

The hermaphrodite means nothing less than a union of the strongest and most striking opposites... The primordial idea has become a symbol of the creative union of opposites, "uniting symbol" in the literal sense. Carl Jung; CW 9i; Paragraph 293.

The mystery of the Eucharist transforms the soul of the empirical man, who is only a part of himself, into his totality, symbolically expressed by Christ. In this sense, therefore, we can speak of the Mass as the rite of the individuation process. Carl Jung; Psychology and Religion

All ages before ours believed in gods in some form or other. Only an unparalleled impoverishment in symbolism could enable us to rediscover the gods as psychic factors, which is to say, as archetypes of the unconscious. No doubt this discovery is hardly credible as yet. Carl Jung; The Integration of the Personality p. 72

How are we to explain religious processes, for instance, whose nature is essentially symbolical? In abstract form, symbols are religious ideas; in the form of action, they are rites or ceremonies. They are the manifestation and expression of excess libido. At the same time they are stepping-stones to new activities, which must be called cultural in order to distinguish them from the instinctual functions that run their regular course according to natural law. Carl Jung; On Psychic Energy; CW 8, par. 91.

The drama of the archetypal life of Christ describes in symbolic images the events of the conscious life–as well as in the life that transcends consciousness–of a man who has been transformed by his higher destiny. Carl Jung; Psychology and Religion.

Freud and Josef Breuer recognized that neurotic symptoms... are in fact symbolically meaningful. They are one way in which the unconscious mind expresses itself. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols; Page 9.

The spirit of this time has condemned us to haste. You have no more futurity and no more past if you serve the spirit of this time. We need the life of eternity. We bear the future and the past in the depths. The future is old and the past is young. You serve the spirit of this time, and believe that you are able to escape the spirit of the depths. But the depths do not hesitate any longer and will force you into the mysteries of Christ. It belongs to this mystery that man is not redeemed through the hero, but becomes a Christ himself. The antecedent example of the saints symbolically teaches us this. Carl Jung; The Red Book; Page 253.

Theoretically, there do exist relatively fixed symbols . . . . If there were no relatively fixed symbols, it would be impossible to determine the structure of the unconscious. Carl Jung; Modern Man in Search of a Soul; Page 21.

The majority of my patients consisted not of believers but of those who had lost their faith. The ones who came to me were the lost sheep. Even in this day and age the believer has the opportunity, in his church, to live the "symbolic life." Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams and Reflections; Page 140.

...it is plain foolishness to believe in ready-made systematic guides to dream interpretation, as if one could simply buy a reference book and look up a particular symbol. Carl Jung, Man and his Symbols, Page 53.

[Uniting symbols] arise from the collision between the conscious and the unconscious and from the confusion which this causes (known in alchemy as 'chaos' or 'nigredo'). Empirically, this confusion takes the form of restlessness and disorientation. Carl Jung, Aion, CW 9 II, §304.

The development of modern art with its seemingly nihilistic trend towards disintegration must be understood as the symptom and symbol of a mood of universal destruction and renewal that has set its mark on our age. Carl Jung, CW 10, Pages 303-304.

Analysis should release an experience that grips us or falls upon us as from above, an experience that has substance and body such as those things which occurred to the ancients. If I were going to symbolize it I would choose the Annunciation. Carl Jung, Seminar 1925, p. 111.

The problem of crucifixion is the beginning of individuation; there is the secret meaning of the Christian symbolism, a of blood and suffering. Carl Jung, unpublished letter, quoted in Gerhard Adler, Aspects of Jung's Personality and Work, p. 12.
The symbolic form of love (animus-anima) shrinks from nothing, least of all from sexual union. Carl Jung, Letters Volume 1, Pages 213-214.
So is healing given to us in the unlockable and ineffable symbol, for it prevents the devil from swallowing up the seed of life. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 31-32.
The idea of transformation and renewal by means of the serpent is a well-substantiated archetype. It is [a] healing [symbol] Carl Jung, CW 7, Par 184.
The anima also has affinities with animals, which symbolize her characteristics. Thus she can appear as a snake or a tiger or a bird. Carl Jung, CW 9i, para. 358
Around the birth of Christ, there follows the Age of Pisces. Pisces is a water sign. That is probably why we have to look for the spirit in the water, in life's flow of images, and in the unconscious. And now we are on the threshold of the sign of Aquarius. The air element is assigned to it, and it is symbolized by an angel or a human being, instead of an animal. Here the spirit is meant to become something subtle again, and man to become who he is. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Pages 354-355.
The long path I have traversed is littered with husks sloughed off, witnesses of countless moultings, those relicta one calls books. They conceal as much as they reveal. Every step is a symbol of those to follow. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 404-405.
An idol is a petrified symbol used stereotypically for "magical" effects. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 59-63.
Through his inner vision the prophet discerns from the needs of his time the helpful image in the collective unconscious and expresses it in the symbol: because it speaks out of the collective unconscious it speaks for everyone-le vrai mot de la situation! Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 59-63.
In the Pleroma, Above and Below lie together in a strange way and produce nothing; but when it is disturbed by the mistakes needs of the individual a waterfall arises between Above and Below, a dynamic something that is the symbol. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 59-63.
I can easily say that (without blushing) because I know how resistant and how foolishly obstinate I was when they first visited me, and what a trouble it was until I could read this symbolic language, so much superior to my dull conscious mind. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 42.
Seeing visions is another of these phenomena; for instance, during three days she saw continually a mass of flames which ran through her whole body. Such visions can sometimes be observed in ordinary neuroses and have a symbolic meaning. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 1, Page 32.
There is no stereotyped explanation for dream symbols, we must not forget that words often have a totally different setting for other people than for ourselves and if we talk to them from our preconceived ideas it is as bad as talking Swiss-German to an Englishman. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 1, Page 141.
It is when we come to a summit in life that the archetypal symbols appear. These primeval pictures of human life form the collective unconscious. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Pages 176-177.
Miracles are symbols for a heightened understanding of life; learning to fly without wings, telepathy, Yoga practices, etc., all belong psychologically to this heightened consciousness. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 204.
Thus the anima is always associated with the source of wisdom and enlightenment, whose symbol is the Old Wise Man. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 498-499.
The message of the Christian symbol is Gnosis, and the compensation effected by the unconscious is Gnosis in even higher degree. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 25.
Everything to come was already in images: to find their soul, the ancients went into the desert. This is an image. The ancients lived their symbols, since the world had not yet become real for them. Thus they went into the solitude of the desert to teach us that the place of the soul is a lonely desert. Carl Jung, Red Book, Page 236.
My medical experience has increasingly compelled me to come to terms with Christian symbolism and here the Church Fathers were a great help. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 471.
The analysis of older people provides a wealth of dream symbols that psychically prepare the dreams for impending death. It is in fact true, as Jung has emphasized, that the unconscious psyche pays very little attention to the abrupt end of bodily life and behaves as if the psychic life of the individual, that is, the individuation process, will simply continue. ... The unconscious “believes” quite obviously in a life after death. Marie-Louise von Franz (1987), ix.

But besides that there is a thinking in primordial images, in symbols which are older than the historical man, which are inborn in him from the earliest times, and, eternally living, outlasting all generations, still make up the groundwork of the human psyche. It is only possible to live the fullest life when we are in harmony with these symbols; wisdom is a return to them. Carl Jung, CW 8, Pages 399-403.

I think we must give it time to infiltrate into people from many centers, to revivify among intellectuals a feeling for symbol and myth, ever so gently to transform Christ back into the soothsaying god of the vine, which he was, and in this way absorb those ecstatic instinctual forces of Christianity for the one purpose of making the cult and the sacred myth what they once were a drunken feast of joy where man regained the ethos and holiness of an animal. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 17-19.

This perfect being is a conception of an optimum of life, and it is symbolically represented as the all-round being. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture 10, Page 81.

The serpent is a Gnostic symbol for the spinal cord and the basal ganglia, because a snake is mainly backbone. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XI, Page 97.

The snake is a personification of the unconscious, for, as early as the Gnostics, it was used as a symbol for the spinal cord and the basal ganglia, where the vegetative psyche is localized. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XIII, Page 111.

The ”Aurora Consurgens” asks the question: ”What is the science? It is the gift and sanctuary of the Deity, it is a divine thing, and is hidden by the Wise in symbolical words and in many ways.” Cited in ETH Lectures, Page 175.

This serpent does not represent ”reason” or anything approaching it, but rather symbolises a peculiar autonomous mind which can possess one completely, a spirit of revelation which gives us ”Intuitionen” (intuitions). Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 215.

Since the time of the old Gnostics, the serpent has been the symbol for the brain and its appendages; that is, for the lower centres of the brain and for the spinal cord, partly on account of its shape, but also from introspective reasons. Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 216.

Human nature [hsing] and consciousness [hui] are expressed in light symbolism, and are therefore intensity, while life [ming] would coincide with extensity. The first have the character of the yang principle, the latter of the yin. Carl Jung, The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 101.

The Chinese philosophy of yoga is based upon the fact of this instinctive preparation for death as a goal, and, following the analogy with the goal of the first half of life, namely, begetting and reproduction, the means towards perpetuation of physical life, it takes as the purpose of spiritual existence the symbolic begetting and bringing to birth of a psychic spirit body (’subtle body’), which ensures the continuity of the detached consciousness. Carl Jung, The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 124.

Alchemy began about the same time as Christianity, in fact we find alchemical ideas in China long before our era, so one can only be sure that the symbolism and language of the Fathers of the Church play an enormous role in alchemy. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Pages 161-162.

This round motif should be kept clearly in your mind, for it is an exceedingly important symbol in the West as well as in the East. It is especially women who produce such symbols in the West. This is not the case in the East, the mandalas are made by men, the feminine has remained unconscious. We find an exception to this rule in the matriarchal South of India. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture XI., 3Feb1939, Page 70.

On Gnostic gems we find the symbol of the vase, the vase of sin. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 8March1935, Pages 199.

Miracles are symbols for a heightened understanding of life; learning to fly without wings, telepathy, Yoga practices, etc., all belong psychologically to this heightened consciousness. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 1May1935, Pages 203.

In every case of very pronounced introversion, the three groups of phenomena, which I mentioned in the last lecture, occur: first, experience of the relative character of space and time; secondly, the autonomy of certain psychic contents and thirdly, the experience of symbols belonging to a centre which does not coincide with the centre of consciousness and which is equivalent to an experience of God. Carl Jung, Lecture X, 12Jan1934, Page 43.

It belongs to this mystery that man is not redeemed through the hero, but becomes a Christ himself. The antecedent example of the saints symbolically teaches us this. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 253.

...in scientific usage the ’self’ refers neither to Christ nor to the Buddha but to the totality of the figures that are its equivalent, and each of these figures is a symbol of the self’ Carl Jung, CW 12, §20.

Because I sink into my symbol to such an extent, the symbol changes me from my one into my other, and that cruel Goddess of my interior, my womanly pleasure, my own other, the tormented tormentor, that which is to be tormented. I have interpreted these images, as best I can, with poor words. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 250.
The scarab is a classical rebirth symbol. According to the description in the ancient Egyptian book Am-Tuat, the dead sun God transforms himself at the tenth station into Khepri, the scarab, and as such mounts the barge at the twelfth station, which raises the rejuvenated sun into the morning sky Carl Jung, CW 8, §843.
But if the depths have conceived, then the symbol grows out of itself and is born from the mind, as befits a God. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 311.
The dream is not only the fulfillment of infantile desires, but also symbolizes the future … The dream provides the answer through the symbol, which one must understand. . Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 233, Footnote 53.
I: ”What my eyes see is exactly what I cannot grasp. You, Elijah, who are a prophet, the mouth of God, and she, a bloodthirsty horror. You are the symbol of the most extreme contradiction.”
E: ”We are real and not symbols.” Carl Jung and Elijah, Liber Novus, Page 246.
Just as the alchemists knew that the production of their stone was a miracle that could only happen ”Deo concedente,” so the modern psychologist is aware that he can produce no more than a description, couched in scientific symbols, of a psychic process whose real nature transcends consciousness just as much as does the mystery of life or of matter. Carl Jung, CW 11, Page 296.
The anima also has affinities with animals, which symbolize her characteristics. Thus she can appear as a snake or a tiger or a bird. Carl Jung, CW 9ii, Para 358.
For the practising psychologist, however, alchemy has one inestimable advantage over Indian yoga its ideas are expressed almost entirely in an extraordinarily rich symbolism, the very symbolism we still find in our patients today. Carl Jung, CW 16, Para 219.
The help which alchemy affords us in understanding the symbols of the individuation process is, in my opinion, of the utmost importance. Carl Jung, CW 16, Para 219.
When geometric symbols appear in dreams or drawings they are the original images of the primeval condition. Geometric designs may also appear if a schizophrenic destruction is threatening. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 17.
So you see, in a moment during a patient’s treatment when there is a great disorder and chaos in a man’s mind, the symbol can appear, as in the form of a mandala in a dream, or when he makes imaginary and fantastical drawings, or something of the sort. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 21.
Language is originally and essentially nothing but a system of signs or symbols, which denote real occurrences, or their echo in the human soul. Carl Jung, CW 5, Page 15.
This is not to say that the idea of God derives from the loss of a lover and is nothing but a substitute for the human object. What is evidently in question here is the displacement of libido on to a symbolical object. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 83.
Christ’s redemptive death on the cross was understood as a “baptism,” that is to say, as rebirth through the second mother, symbolized by the tree of death… The dual-mother motif suggests the idea of a dual birth. One of the mothers is the real, human mother, the other is the symbolical mother. Carl Jung, CW 5, para 494-495.
The ‘realm of the Mothers’ has not a few connections with the womb, with the matrix, which frequently symbolizes the creative aspect of the unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 182.
The psychic life-force, the libido, symbolizes itself… through phallic symbols. Carl Jung, CW 5, para. 297.

Carl Jung on “Eros.” Anthology (2015-07-15 04:50)

Carl Jung on “Eros.” Anthology
On a low level the animus is an inferior Logos, a caricature of the differentiated masculine mind, just as on a low level the anima is a caricature of the feminine Eros. Carl Jung, Commentary Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 41.

Numerous mythological and philosophical attempts have been made to formulate and visualize the creative force which man knows only by subjective experience. To give but a few examples, I would remind the reader of the cosmogonic significance of Eros in Hesiod, and also of the Orphic figure of Phanes, the 'Shining One,' the first-born, the 'Father of Eros.' In Orphic terms, Phanes also denotes Priapos, a god of love, androgynous, and equal to the Theban Dionysus Lysios. The Orphic meaning of Phanes is the same as that of the Indian Kama, the God of love, which is also a cosmogonic principle. Carl Jung; Symbols of Transformation; para. 198.

Eros...might well be the first condition of all cognition and the quintessence of divinity itself. Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Late Thoughts; Page 353.

Men are rarely split off from sexuality, because it is too evident for them, but what they lack is Eros, the relational function. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 313.

Of course, I did not invent the term Eros. I learnt it from Plato. But I never would have applied this term if I hadn't observed facts that gave me a hint of how to use this Platonic notion. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 464-466.

As my whole psychology derives from immediate experience with living people, it is a matter of course that my concept of Eros also originated in immediate experiences. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 464-466.

It has just struck me that in my commentary I have suggested using "logos" for "hun" instead of "animus," because "animus" is a natural term for the "mind" of a woman, corresponding to the "anima" of a man. European philosophy must take into account the existence of feminine psychology. The "anima" of a woman might suitably be designated "Eros." Carl Jung to Richard Wilhelm, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 67-68.

The "anima" of a woman might suitably be designated "Eros." Carl Jung to Richard Wilhelm, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 67-68.

"One is the beginning, the Sun God.

"Two is Eros, for he binds two together and spreads himself out in brightness.

"Three is the Tree of Life, for it fills space with bodies.

"Four is the devil, for he opens all that is closed. He dissolves everything formed and physical; he is the destroyer in whom everything becomes nothing. Philemon, Liber Novus, 351.

Salome is hence apparently no (complete) correct embodiment of Eros, but a variety of the same. (This supposition is later confirmed.) That she is actually an incorrect allegory for Eros also stems from the fact that she is blind. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.

It [Eros] is not form-giving but form-fulfilling; it is the wine that will be poured into the vessel; it is not the bed and direction of the stream but the impetuous water flowing in it. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.

The house represents a fixed abode, which indicates that Logos and Eros have permanent residence in us. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.

Where Logos is ordering and insistence, Eros is dissolution and movement. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.

Nothing makes this effect clearer than the serpent. It signifies everything dangerous and everything bad, everything nocturnal and uncanny, which adheres to Logos as well as to Eros, so long as they can work as the dark and unrecognized principles of the unconscious spirit. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.

This suggests that Eros does not tend toward the right, the side of consciousness, conscious will and conscious choice, but toward the side of the heart, which is less subject to our conscious will. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 366.

Like many sons, Adler had learned from his "father" not what the father said, but what he did. Instantly, the problem of love (Eros) and power came down upon me like a leaden weight. Carl Jung, Memories Dreams and Reflections, Page 153.

Jung gave great importance to the papal bull of the Assumptio Maria. He held that it "points to the hieros gamos in the pleroma, and this in turn implies, as we have said, the future birth of the divine child, who, in accordance with the divine trend toward incarnation, will choose as his birthplace the empirical man. This metaphysical process is known as the individuation process in the psychology of the unconscious" Liber Novus, Footnote 200, Page 299.

The character ming really signifies a royal command then, destiny, fate, the fate allotted to a man, so too, the duration of life, the measure of vitality at one's disposal, and thus it comes about that ming (life) is closely related to Eros. The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 11.

Life (ming) is also super-individual in that man must simply accept a destiny which does not come from his conscious will and thus it comes about that ming (life) is closely related to Eros. The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 11.

“No one provokes me with impunity.” The ancients knew how inexorable a god Eros is. Cited by Carl Jung in Freud/Jung Letters, Page 19.

Each individual contains a central monad which, at the moment of conception, splits into life and essence, Ming and Hsing. These two are super-individual principles, and so can be related to Eros and logos. The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 73.

The growth of culture consists, as we know, is a progressive subjugation of the animal in man. It is a process of domestication which cannot be accomplished without rebellion on the part of the animal nature that thirsts for freedom. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Page 19.

Morality is not imposed from outside; we have it in ourselves from the start—not the law, but our moral nature without which the collective life of human society would be impossible. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Page 27.

Just as in the early Middle Ages finance was held in contempt because there was as yet no differentiated financial morality to suit each case, but only a mass morality, so today there is only a mass sexual morality. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Page 27.

A girl who has an illegitimate baby is condemned and nobody asks whether she is a decent human being or not. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Page 27.

Any form of love not sanctioned by law is considered immoral, whether between worth-while people or bounders. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Pages 27.

We are still so hypnotized by what happens that we forget how and to whom it happens, just as for the Middle Ages finance was nothing but glittering gold, fiercely coveted and therefore the devil. Carl Jung, CW 7, On Eros Theory, Page 27.

So, too, man will be forced to develop his feminine side, to open his eyes to the psyche and to Eros, It is a task he can’ not avoid. Carl Jung, CW 10, Page 125.

The man’s Eros does not lead upward only but downward into that uncanny dark world of Hecate and Kali. Carl Jung, CW 9i, Para 186.

The animus corresponds to the paternal Logos just as the anima corresponds to the maternal Eros. Carl Jung, CW 9ii, Par. 28f.

Carl Jung on ”Christianity.” (2015-07-15 10:17)

We always think that Christianity consists in a particular confession of faith and in belonging to a Church.
No, Christianity is our world.
Everything we think is the fruit of the Middle Ages and indeed of the Christian Middle Ages.
Our whole science, everything that passes through our head, has inevitably gone through this history.
It lives in us and has left its stamp upon us for all time and will always form a vital layer of our psyche, just like the phylogenetic traces in our body.
The whole character of our mentality, the way we look at things, is also the result of the Christian Middle Ages; whether we know it or not is quite immaterial.
The age of rational enlightenment has eradicated nothing.
Even our method of rational enlightenment is Christian.
The Christian Weltanschauung is therefore a psychological fact that does not allow of any further rationalization; it is something that has happened, that is present.
We are inevitably stamped as Christians, but we are also stamped by what existed before Christianity. Carl Jung, Psychological Reflections, Pages 341-342.
All of us who have had a religious education are deeply impressed by the idea that Christianity entered into history without an historical past, like a stroke of lightning out of a clear sky.
This attitude was necessary, but I am convinced it is not true.
Everything has its history, everything has ”grown,” and Christianity, which is supposed to have appeared suddenly as a unique revelation from heaven, undoubtedly also has its history.
Moreover, how it began is as clear as daylight. I need not speak of the rites of the Mass and certain peculiarities of the priests’ clothing which are borrowed from pagan times, for the fundamental ideas of the Christian Church also have their predecessors.

But a break in continuity has occurred because we are all overcome by the impression of the uniqueness of Christianity.
It is exactly as if we had built a cathedral over a pagan temple and no longer knew that it is still there underneath.
The result is that the inner correspondence with the outer God-image is undeveloped through lack of psychic culture and has remained stuck in paganism. Carl Jung, Psychological Reflections, Pages 342.

Carl Jung on "The Animal in Man." (2015-07-15 10:21)

When we say "the animal in man," this always strikes us as something horrible.
But this animal in man is not horrible, no more than animals are horrible, for they fulfill God's will most faithfully; they live to fulfill their Creator's purpose.
We do not do this.
We meddle with the work of the Creator, for we always want to be something different from what we are.
Our ambition is not to be the whole of ourselves, for that would be unpleasant.
But the animals are themselves and they fulfill the will of God that is within them in a true and faithful manner. Carl Jung, Psychological Reflections, Pages 310-311.

Carl Jung on “Love thy neighbor as thyself.” (2015-07-15 10:26)

”Love thy neighbour” is wonderful, since we then have nothing to do about ourselves; but when it is a question of ”love thy neighbour as thyself” we are no longer so sure, for we think it would be egoism to love ourselves.

There was no need to preach ”love thyself” to people in olden times, because they did so as a matter of course.
But how is it nowadays?
It would do us good to take this thing somewhat to heart, especially the phrase ”as thyself.”
How can I love my neighbour if I do not love myself?
How can we be altruistic if we do not treat ourselves decently?
But if we treat ourselves decently, if we love ourselves, we make discoveries, and then we see what we are and what we should love.
There is nothing for it but to put our foot into the serpent’s mouth.
He who cannot love can never transform the serpent, and then nothing is changed. Carl Jung, Psychological Reflections, Page 249.

[Carl Jung on “Clairvoyance.”]
To S. Wieser
Dear Colleague, 6 July 1951
Thank you for telling me about your interesting experience.
It is a case of what we would call clairvoyance.
But since this is just a word that signifies nothing further, it explains nothing.
You can get a bit nearer to understanding such happenings only if you observe them in a wider context of the same or similar events.

Surveying the sum of experiences of this kind you come to the conclusion that there is something like an ”absolute knowledge” which is not accessible to consciousness but probably is to the unconscious, though only under certain conditions.
In my experience these conditions are always provided by emotion.
Any emotion that goes at all deep has a lowering effect on consciousness, which Pierre Janet called ”abaissement du niveau mental.”
The lowering of consciousness means on the other hand an approach to the unconscious, and because the unconscious seems to have access to this ”absolute knowledge,” information can be mediated which can no longer be explained rationally and causally.
This occasional failure of the seemingly absolute law of causality is due to the fact that even this law has only statistical validity, with the implication that exceptions must occur.
If you are interested in the theory of these acausal connections of events I would mention that a little book of mine will shortly be published by Rascher under the title Die Synchronizitat als ein Prinzip akausaler Zusammenhange.
With collegial regards and best, thanks,
Yours sincerely,

To Erich Neumann
Dear Neumann, 15 December 1955
Deepest thanks for your heartfelt letter.
Let me in return express my condolences on the loss of your mother.
I am sorry I can only set down these dry words, but the shock I have experienced is so great that I can neither concentrate nor recover my power of speech.
I would have liked to tell the heart you have opened to me in friendship that two days before the death of my wife I had what one can only call a great illumination which, like a flash of lightning, lit up a centuries-old secret that was embodied in her and had exerted an unfathomable influence on my life.
I can only suppose that the illumination came from my wife, who was then mostly in a coma, and that

The quick and painless end-only five days between the final diagnosis and death-and this experience have been a great comfort to me.
But the stillness and the audible silence about me, the empty air and the infinite distance, are hard to bear.

Carl Jung on ”ESP” and ”Synchronicity.” (2015-07-17 04:48)

To J. B . Rhine
Dear Dr. Rhine, 9 August 1954
Thank you for your kind letter.
The English translation of ”Synchronicity” will be published by the Bollingen Press
The translator is Mr. Hull, who is translating my Collected Works.
He has a fair understanding of the synchronicity concept, which au fond is not complicated at all and has its long history reaching from high antiquity right down to Leibniz.

He had still four principles for the explanation of Nature, viz. space, time, causality, and his harmonia praestabilita, an acausal principle.
My doctoral thesis was published, if I am right, in my volume Collected Papers on Analytical Psychology (znd edit., 1920).
(I am actually not at home.)
The main difficulty with synchronicity (and also with ESP) is that one thinks of it as being produced by the subject, while I think it is rather in the nature of objective events.
Although ESP is a gift of certain individuals and seems to depend upon an emotional perception, the picture it produces is that of an objective fact.
This truth becomes highly problematical in the case of precognition, where a fact is perceived that apparently does not exist.
As one cannot perceive a fact that does not exist, we must assume that it has some form of existence, so that it can be perceived nevertheless.
To explain it we must assume that the (future) objective fact is paralleled by a similar or identical subjective, i.e., psychic, already existing arrangement which cannot be explained as an anticipatory causal effect.
But it is quite possible and, as a matter of fact, you have shown it to be possible, that the subjective parallelism can be perceived as if it were the future fact itself.
The harmonia praestabilita would be in this case the obvious explanation.
I think that all forms of ESP (telepathy, precognition, etc.) including PK have essentially the same underlying principle, viz. the identity of a subjective and an objective arrangement coinciding in time (hence the term ”synchronicity”) .
With my best wishes,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on “Modern Art” and “Black Magic.” (2015-07-17 05:04)

To Horst Scharschuch
Dear Herr Scharschuch, 1 September 1952
There can be no doubt that the unconscious comes to the surface in modern art and with its dynamism destroys the orderliness that is characteristic of consciousness.
This process is a phenomenon that can be observed in more or less developed form in all epochs, as for instance under primitive conditions where the habitual way of life, regulated by strict laws, is suddenly disrupted, either by outbreaks of panic coupled with wild lawlessness at solar and lunar eclipses, or in the form of religious license as in the Dionysian orgies, or during the Middle Ages in the monasteries with the reversal of the hierarchical order/ and today at carnival time.
These episodic or regular disruptions of the accustomed order should be regarded as psycho-hygienic measures since they give vent from time to time to the suppressed forces of chaos.
At the present day such things are obviously taking place on the largest scale because the cultural order has suppressed the primitive disorderliness too long and too violently.
If one views modern art prospectively, as I think one can, it plainly announces the uprush of the dissolvent forces of disorder.
It clears the air by abolishing the constraints of order.
I myself am inclined to view what rushes up as the opposite of art, since it very evidently lacks order and form.
The uprushing chaos seeks new symbolic ideas which will embrace and express not only the previous order but also the essential contents of the disorder.
Such ideas would have a magical effect by holding the destructive forces of disorder spellbound, as has been the case in Christianity and in all other religions.
In ancient tradition this magic is called white magic; black magic, on the other hand, exalts the destructive forces into the only valid truth in contrast to the previous order, and moreover compels them to serve the individual in contrast to the collective.
The means used for this purpose are primitive, fascinating, or awe-inspiring ideas and images, unintelligible incantations, outlandish words and shapes, savage rhythms, drumming and suchlike.

In so far as modern art uses such means as ends in themselves and thereby increases the state of disorder it can be described outright as black magic.
The daemonic, on the contrary, rests entirely on the unconscious forces of negation and destruction and on the reality of evil.
The existence of the daemonic is demonstrated by the fact that black magic is not only possible but uncannily successful, so much so that it is tempting to assume that black magicians are possessed by a daemon.
Hitler's magic, for instance, consisted in his always saying what everybody was afraid to say out loud because it was considered too disreputable and inferior (resentment against the Jews).
But his daemonism lay in the fact that his methods were uncannily effective and that he himself obviously became the victim of the daemon which had taken total possession of him.
The study of these questions must of course begin with a thorough knowledge of primitive magical practices.
I would advise you to read the book by Mircea Eliade, Le Chamanisme, also the Philosophia Occulta of Agrippa von Nettesheim and some of the writings of Paracelsus, for instance Liber Azoth.
In Paracelsus especially you will find a lot about sympathetic magic.
You will also find the same kind of suggestive neologisms that characterize the latest German philosophy-the incomprehensible words, signs, antics, etc.
You may get something out of my little book Paracelsica (1942).
I should also mention the theory of Albertus Magnus that when anyone gives free rein to violent emotion and in this state wishes evil, it will have a magical effect.
This is the quintessence of primitive magic and of the corresponding mass phenomena like Naziism, Communism, etc.
Ernst Robert Curtius once described James Joyce's classic Ulysses as "infernal"-quite rightly.
I fear this description can also be applied to long stretches of modern art in all its forms.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung, Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 81-83

Carl Jung: ”I cannot love anyone if I hate myself.” (2015-07-17 05:28)

I cannot love anyone if I hate myself.
That is the reason why we feel so extremely uncomfortable in the presence of people who are noted for their special virtuousness, for they radiate an atmosphere of the torture they inflict on themselves.
That is not a virtue but a vice.
And thus, from so-called goodness, which was once really good, something has arisen which is no longer good; it has become an evasion. Nowadays any coward can make himself respectable by going to church and loving his neighbour.
But it is simply an untrue state, an artificial world. Carl Jung, Psychological Reflections, Page 221.

Carl Jung on “Nirdvandva” and “Liberation.” (2015-07-17 10:30)

Anonymous
My dear N., May 1956
My conceptions are empirical and not at all speculative.
If you understand them from a philosophical standpoint you go completely astray, since they are not rational but mere names of groups of irrational phenomena.
The conceptions of Indian philosophy however are thoroughly philosophical and have the character of postulates and can therefore only be analogous to my terms but not identical with them at all.
Take f.i. the concept of nirdvandva.
Nobody has ever been entirely liberated from the opposites, because no living being could possibly attain to such a state, as nobody escapes pain and pleasure as long as he functions physiologically.
He may have occasional ecstatic experiences when he gets the intuition of a complete liberation, f.i. in reaching the state of sat-chit-ananda.
But the word ananda shows that he experiences pleasure, and you cannot even be conscious of something if you don’t discriminate between opposites, and thus participate in them.

My psychology deals with modern man in Europe, who is practically beyond the belief in philosophical postulates.
They convey nothing to him anymore.
Whereas you are still a believer in orthodox philosophy; thus you can be compared to a staunch Christian, still convinced that he is redeemed through his Lord Jesus Christ, etc.
He believes in postulates.
It is quite obvious that such a man would neither have any use for a psychology of the unconscious nor would he understand such a psychology at all.
He cannot imagine himself in the role of an unbeliever, moreover if he seriously tried to, he might get into a panic as he would feel the ground subsiding under his feet.
He cannot admit or imagine that the idea of redemption through Christ’s self-sacrifice could be an illusion, or at least a mere postulate of religious speculation, as you yourself would not dream of disbelieving the existence of the atman, or the reality of jivan-mukti, Samadhi etc.
This is in contradiction to the fact that a complete liberation from the opposites cannot be attained through jivan-mukti, the latter being a mere postulate and-as I told you above-not to be experienced in its totality.
Modern man in Europe has lost or given up-getting tired of them -his traditional beliefs- and has to find out for himself what is going to happen to him in his impoverished state.
Analytical psychology tells you the story of his adventures.
Only if you are able to see the relativity, i.e., the uncertainty of all human postulates, can you experience that state in which analytical psychology makes sense.
But analytical psychology just makes no sense for you.
Nothing of the things I describe comes to life unless you can accompany or sympathize understandingly with beings that are forced to base their life upon facts to be experienced and not upon transcendental postulates beyond human experience.
Thus, inasmuch as you are a believer in postulates, you have no use for my psychology and you are not even able to understand why we shouldn’t simply adopt Indian philosophy if we are dissatisfied with our religious philosophy.
In other words, why study analytical psychology at all?
It cannot make sense to you as it does not make sense to a Christian or any other believer.
On the contrary the believer will translate the psychological terms into his metaphysical language.
The Christian f.i. will call the self Christ and will not understand why I call the central symbol ”self.”
He will not see why we need to know about the unconscious from A to Z, exactly like the Indian way.
He is like you in possession of the Truth, while we psychologists are merely in search of something like the truth and our only source of information is the unconscious and its mythological products like archetypes, etc.
We have no traditional beliefs or philosophical postulates . (. . .) Analytical psychology is an empirical science and (. . .) individuation is an empirical process and not a way of initiation at all.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 302-304.

Carl Jung on Mathematics, Synchronicity and Biology (2015-07-18 05:47)

To E . L. Grant Watson
Dear Mr. Watson, 9 February 1956
You are surely touching upon a most important fact when you begin to question the coincidence of a purely mathematical deduction with physical facts, such as the sectio aurea (the Fibonacci series.)
My source calls him Fibonacci, not -nicci. He lived 1180-1250) and in modern times the equations expressing the turbulence of gases.
One has not marvelled enough about these parallelisms.
It is quite obvious that there must exist a condition common to the moving body and the psychic ”movement,” more than a merely logical corollarium or consectarium.
I should call it an irrational (a causal) corollary of synchronicity.
The Fibonacci series is self-evident and a property of the series of whole numbers, and it exists independently of empirical facts, as on the other hand the periodicity of a biological spiral occurs without application of mathematical reasoning unless one assumes an equal arrangement in living matter as well as in the human mind, ergo a property of matter (or of ”energy” or whatever you call the primordial principle) in general and consequently also of moving bodies in general, the psychic ”movement” included.
If this argument stands to reason, the coincidence of physical and mental forms and also of physical and mental events (synchronicity) would needs be a regular occurrence, which, however, particularly with synchronicity, is not the case.
This is a serious snag pointing, as it seems to me, to an indeterminate or at least indeterminable, apparently arbitrary arrangement.
This is a much neglected but characteristic aspect of physical nature: the statistical truth is largely made up of exceptions.
That is the aspect of reality the poet and artist would insist upon, and that is also the reason why a philosophy exclusively based upon natural science is nearly always flat, superficial, and vastly beside the point, as it misses all the colourful improbable exceptions, the real ”salt of the earth”!
It is not realistic, but rather an abstract half-truth, which, when applied to living man, destroys all individual values indispensable to human life.
The coincidence of the Fibonacci numbers (or sectio aurea) with plant growth is a sort of analogy with synchronicity inasmuch as the latter consists in the coincidence of a psychic process with an external physical event of the same character or meaning.
But whereas the sectio aurea is a static condition, synchronicity is a concidence in time, even of events that, in themselves, are not synchronous (f.i., a case of precognition).
In the latter case one could assume that synchronicity is a property of energy, but in so far as energy is equal to matter it is a secondary effect of the primary coincidence of mental and physical events (as in the Fibonacci series).

The bridge seems to be formed by the numbers.
Numbers are just as much invented as they are discovered as natural facts, like all true archetypes.
As far as I know, archetypes are perhaps the most important basis for synchronistic events.
I am afraid this is all rather involved and very difficult.
I don't see my way yet out of the jungle.
But I feel that the root of the enigma is to be found probably in the peculiar properties of whole numbers.
The old Pythagorean postulate!
Mr. Cook seems to have conceived his ideas about the same time I began to think about archetypes as unconscious a priori determinants of imagination and behaviour, reaching conscious apperception in the human mind chiefly in the form of so-called mythological images.
I then spoke of "urtiimliche Bilder" (primordial images, in Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido, 1912 . Engl. tr. Psychology of the Unconscious, 1917) .
Inasmuch as karma means either a personal or at least an individual inherited determinant of character and fate, it represents the individually differentiated manifestation of the instinctual behaviour pattern, i.e., the general archetypal disposition.
Karma would express the individually modified archetypal inheritance represented by the collective unconscious in each individual.
I avoid the term of karma because it includes metaphysical assumptions for which I have no evidence, f.i. that karma is a fate I have acquired in a previous existence or that it is the result of an individual life left over and by chance becoming my own.
For such assumptions there is no empirical evidence I am aware of.
Well, your ideas move in the right direction. Good luck! – The interpretation of your dream is more or less complete.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 287-289.

Carl Jung's Premonitory dream of Emma's Death (2015-07-18 05:56)

Anonymous
Dear Dr. N., 26 June 1956
It is only now that I can thank you for your letters and also for the book Panim Vaccares which I am saving for my holiday.

At the moment my work allows me no such relaxation.
I was particularly interested in the dream which, in mid-August 1955, anticipated the death of my wife.
It probably expresses the idea of life's perfection: the epitome of all fruits, rounded into a bullet, struck her like karma.
The bullet represents death in perfect form; it is at the same time a symbol of the self.
Death brought and probably always brings-a confrontation with wholeness.
But perhaps not always in such perfection.
These are the thoughts I associated with your dream.
Yours very sincerely,

Dear Mrs. N.,
30 March 1960
Thank you very much for your kind attention!
The book will interest me very much, also what you told me about the Buddhist Society came quite a propos, since I have been studying Buddha's sermons in the Middle Collection of the Pali-Canon for several months.

I am trying to get nearer to the remarkable psychology of the Buddha himself, or at least of that which his contemporaries assumed him to be.
It is chiefly the question of karma and rebirth which has renewed my interest in Buddha.
With my very best thanks I remain,
Yours cordially, c . G. J u N G Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 548.

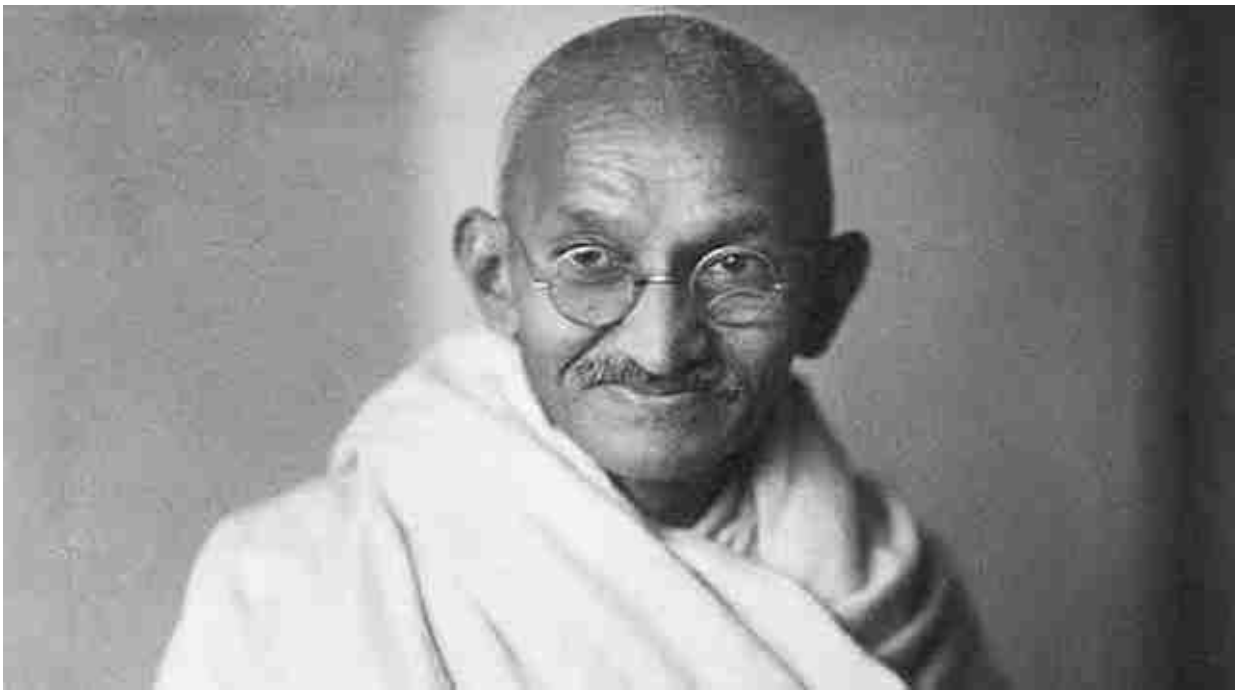
Carl Jung on Modern Art and the Artist. (2015-07-18 06:18)

To Walter Mertens
Dear Walter, 24 November 1932
I am entirely in agreement with the spirit of your essay on Picasso.

6954

I am only against artists getting away with it like the theologians, about whom one may not say anything critical.
I don't see why artists should not have exactly the same human psychology as everybody else.
The claim to be the infallible mouthpiece of God is as odious to me in art as in theology.
From the artistic standpoint I can well appreciate the achievements of modern art, but from the standpoint of the psychologist I have to say what the nature of these achievements is.
In my article in the N.Z.Z. I expressly pointed out that I wasn't talking of art but of psychology.
Yet psychology seems to be as hateful to artists as it is to theologians, and as I say I find this extremely repugnant.
Moreover, art fails entirely in its educative purpose if people don't see that it depicts the sickness of our time.
That is why this art is neither enjoyable nor elevating, but as you rightly say a "scream."
But a scream is always just that-a noise and not music.
Hence I shall hold unswervingly to the view that modem art is much more correct judged from the psychological rather than from the artistic standpoint.
"Kunst" [art] comes from "Konnen" [ability, skill]: "stammering" is not skill but only a miserable attempt to speak.
Naturally I don't want to discourage modem art; it must continue its attempts and I wish it luck.
The creative spirit cannot be discouraged anyway, otherwise it would not be creative.
So nothing untoward has happened.
With best greetings,
Yours, CARL Carl Jung, Letters Vol. I, Pages 107-108.

Carl Jung on the "European" and the "Indian." (2015-07-18 07:53)



The Indian can forget neither the body nor the mind, while the European is always forgetting either the one or the other.
With this capacity to forget he has, for the time being, conquered the world.
Not so the Indian.
He not only knows his own nature, but he also knows how much he himself is nature.
The European, on the other hand, has a science of nature and knows astonishingly little of his own nature, the nature within him.

For the Indian, it comes as a blessing to know of a method which helps him to control the supreme power of nature within and without.
For the European, it is sheer poison to suppress his nature, which is warped enough as it is, and to make out of it a willing robot. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 866.

Carl Jung on "Solitude." [Anthology] (2015-07-18 14:49)

It is always important to have something to bring into a relationship, and solitude is often the means by which you acquire it. Carl Jung; Letters, Vol. II, Page 610.

Everything to come was already in images: to find their soul, the ancients went into the desert. This is an image. The ancients lived their symbols, since the world had not yet become real for them. Thus they went into the solitude of the desert to teach us that the place of the soul is a lonely desert. Carl Jung, Red Book, Page 236.

You should call me if you want to live with men, but the one God if you want to rise above the human world to the divine and eternal solitude of the star. Carl Jung's Soul, The Red Book, Page 371.

In this bloody battle death steps up to you, just like today where mass killing and dying: fill the world. The coldness of death penetrates you. When I froze to death in my solitude, I saw dearly and saw what was to come, as clearly as I could see the stars and the distant mountains on a frosty night. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 274, Footnote 73.

The individual must now consolidate himself by cutting himself off from God and becoming wholly himself Thereby and at the same time he also separates himself from society: Outwardly he plunges into solitude, but inwardly into Hell, distance from God" Carl Jung, CW 18, §1103.

We should become reconciled to solitude in ourselves and to the God outside of us. If we enter into this solitude then the life of the God begins. If we are in ourselves, then the space around us is free, but filled by the God. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.

But now, if you are in solitude, your God leads you to the God of others, and through that to the true neighbor, to the neighbor of the self in others. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.

What occurs between the lover and the beloved is the entire fullness of the Godhead. Both are unfathomable riddles to each other. For who understands the Godhead? / But the God is born in solitude, from the secret / mystery of the individual. / The separation between life and love is the contradiction between solitude and togetherness. Carl Jung, The Black Books, Feb. 23, 1920, Page 88.

No one besides you has your God. He is always with you, yet you see him in others, and thus he is never with you. You strive to draw to yourself those who seem to possess your God. But a conscious attitude that renounces its ego-bound intentions—not in imagination only, but in truth—and submits to the supra-personal decrees of fate, can claim to be serving a king. This more exalted attitude raises the status of the anima from that of a temptress to a psychopomp. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 380.

Nature is awful, and I often ask myself, should one not interfere? But one cannot really, it is impossible, because fate must be fulfilled. It is apparently more important to nature that one should have consciousness, understanding, than to avoid suffering. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1416.

You see, in the actual functioning of the psyche, it does not matter whether you do a thing or whether it happens to you; whether it reaches you from without or happens within, fate moves through yourself and outside circumstances equally. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 896.

The ancients called the saving word the Logos, an expression of divine reason. So much unreason / was in man that he needed reason to be saved. If one waits long enough, one sees how the Gods all change into serpents and underworld dragons in the end. This is also the fate of the Logos: in the end it poisons us all. In time, we were all poisoned, but unknowingly we kept the One, the Powerful One, the eternal wanderer in us away from the poison. We spread poison and paralysis around us in that we want to educate all the world around us into reason. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 280.

The ancients devised magic to compel fate. They needed it to determine outer fate. We need it to determine inner fate and to find the way that we are unable to conceive. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 311.

The announcement of an important truth, even with the best of intentions, can lead to an extraordinary mess. That was the fate of Prometheus. It is therefore important to husband dangerous material very carefully so that first graders do not get hold of dynamite. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 59.

For the son, the animus is hidden in the dominating power of the mother and sometimes she leaves him with a sentimental attachment that lasts throughout life and seriously impairs the fate of the adult. Carl Jung, CW 9, Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious, Page 29.

Archetypes are complexes of experience that come upon us like fate, and their effects are felt in our most personal life. The anima no longer crosses our path as a goddess, but, it may be, as an intimately personal misadventure, or perhaps as our best venture. When, for instance, a highly esteemed professor in his seventies abandons his family and runs off with a young red-headed actress, we know that the gods have claimed another victim. Carl Jung; "Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious"; CW 9, Part I: The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious. Page 62.

Emptiness is a great feminine secret. It is something absolutely alien to man; the chasm, the unplumbed depths, the yin. The pitifulness of this vacuous nonentity goes to his heart (I speak here as a man), and one is tempted to say that this constitutes the whole "mystery" of woman. Such a female is fate itself. A man may say what he likes about it; be for it or against it, or both at once; in the end he falls, absurdly happy, into this pit, or, if he does not, he has missed and bungled his only chance of making a man of himself. In the first case one cannot disprove his foolish good luck to him, and in the second one cannot make his misfortune seem plausible. "The Mothers, the Mothers, how eerily it sounds!" Carl Jung; "Psychological Aspects of the Mother Archetype" (1939); CW 8: The Structure and Dynamics of the Psyche. P.183

The primordial image, or archetype, is a figure–be it a daemon, a human being, or a process–that constantly recurs in the course of history and appears wherever creative fantasy is freely expressed. Essentially, therefore, it is a mythological figure. . . . In each of these images there is a little piece of human psychology and human fate, a remnant of the joys and sorrows that have been repeated countless times in our ancestral history. . . . Carl Jung; On the Relation of Analytical Psychology to Poetry; CW 15; 127.

Before the bar of nature and fate, unconsciousness is never accepted as an excuse; on the contrary there are very severe penalties for it. Carl Jung; Answer to Job; CW 11; Psychology and Religion: West and East; Page 608.

When I was working on the stone tablets, I became aware of the fateful links between me and my ancestors. I feel very strongly that I am under the influence of things or questions which were left incomplete and unanswered by my parents and grandparents and more distant ancestors. It often seems as if there were an impersonal karma within a family, which is passed on from parents to children. It has always seemed to me that I had to answer questions which fate had posed to my forefathers, and which had not yet been answered, or as if I had to complete, or perhaps continue, things which previous ages had left unfinished. It is difficult to determine whether these questions are more of a personal or more of a general (collective) nature. It seems to me that the latter is the case. A collective problem, if not recognized as such, always appears as a personal problem, and in individual cases may give the impression that something is out of order in the realm of the personal psyche. The personal sphere is indeed disturbed, but such disturbances need not be primary; they may well be secondary, the consequence of an insupportable change in the social atmosphere. The cause of disturbance is, therefore, not to be sought in the personal surroundings, but rather in the collective situation. Psychotherapy has hitherto taken this matter far too little into account. Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams, Reflections; Pages 233-234.

The doctor should not strive to heal at all costs. One has to be exceedingly careful not to impose one's own will and conviction on the patient. ... Sometimes it is really a question whether you are allowed to rescue a man from the fate he must undergo for the sake of his further development. Carl Jung; Analytical Psychology: Its Theory and Practice; 1935.

. . . the self is our life's goal, for it is the completest expression of that fateful combination we call individuality . . . Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Page 398 and Two Essays on Analytical Psychology, CW 7, par. 404.

One clings to possessions that have once meant wealth; and the more ineffective, incomprehensible, and lifeless they become the more obstinately people cling to them. (Naturally it is only sterile ideas that they cling to; living ideas have content and riches enough, so there is no need to cling to them.) Thus in the course of time the meaningful turns into the meaningless. This is unfortunately the fate of metaphysical ideas. Carl Jung; Aion;Page 34; Paragraph 65.

From the beginning I had a sense of destiny, as though my life was assigned to me by fate and had to be fulfilled. This gave me an inner security, and, though I could never prove it to myself, it proved itself to me. I did not have this certainty, it had me. Nobody could rob me of the conviction that it was enjoined upon me to do what God wanted and not what I wanted.

That gave me the strength to go my own way. Often I had the feeling that in all decisive matters I was no longer among men, but was alone with God. And when I was "there," where I was no longer alone, I was outside time; I belonged to the centuries; and He who then gave answer was He who had always been, who had been before my birth. He who always is was there. These talks with the ”Other” were my profoundest experiences: on the one hand a bloody struggle, on the other supreme ecstasy. Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams and Reflections; Page 48.

”All my writings may be considered tasks imposed from within, their source was a fateful compulsion. What I wrote were things that assailed me from within myself. I permitted the spirit that moved me to speak out.” Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams and Reflections; Page 222.
The psychological rule says that when an inner situation is not made conscious, it happens outside, as fate. That is to say, when the individual remains undivided and does not become conscious of his inner opposite, the world must perforce act out the conflict and be torn into opposing halves. Carl Jung, Aion, Christ: A Symbol of the Self, Pages 70-71, Para 126.
The earthly fate of the Church as the body of Christ is modelled on the earthly fate of Christ himself. That is to say the Church, in the course of her history, moves towards a death. Carl Jung, Mysterium Coniunctionis, CW 14, par. 28, note 194.
We cannot receive the Holy Spirit unless we have accepted our own individual life as Christ accepted his. Thus we become the ”sons of god” fated to experience the conflict of the divine opposites, represented by the crucifixion. Carl Jung, CW 18, par. 1551.
Individuals who believe they are masters of their fate are as a rule the slaves of destiny. Carl Jung, Letter to Valentine Brooke, 16Nov1959.
It is a shame everything has to go to the devil, but human beings are such fools that they obviously deserve no better fate. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 455-456.
There are cases where it is better not to interfere; we must fulfil our duty as doctors, but the fact remains that some people are not meant to be cured, they are not fitted for life and if you step in and interfere fate always takes its revenge on you. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 27.
This is a dream of fate which gives the dreamer information as to the course his life will take and in this case the actual end was suicide. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 2, Page 182.
This was the case with our dreamer; fate is not devilish but elfish and chose this moment to bring a new influence into his life. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 177.
Speaking from the standpoint of many thousands of dreams I cannot say that they show guidance. It is as if the dream were quite uninterested in the fate of the ego, it is pure Nature, it expresses the given thing, it mirrors the state of our consciousness with complete detachment ; it never says ”to do it in such and such a way would be well”, but states that it is so. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 198.
There are certain dreams which seem really to concern themselves with the fate of the ego, but these belong to the category of big dreams. Dreams as a whole are without purpose, like nature herself, it is wiser to regard them as such. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 198.
It sometimes happens that such people identify with a content in a dream that belongs to a fate which it is far beyond their capacity to live, and this may cause a bad split, or even a psychosis. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 204.
But the right way to wholeness is made up, unfortunately, of fateful detours and wrong turnings. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 6.
Although since 1918 I knew that a terrible fire would spread over Europe beginning in the North East, I have no vision beyond 1940 concerning the fate of Europe. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 285-286.
In the centre there is a lotus with the Buddha sitting in it, and the decisive experience is the final knowledge that the meditator himself is the Buddha, whereby the fateful knots woven in the opening story are apparently resolved. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Page 572.
Then the spirit comes in the form of the devil, as the cruel fate of Germany shows. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 340-341.
The quiet meditativeness that radiates from the fate you have described is rather like a verse from a hymn-book which one unexpectedly comes across again after 50 years. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 296-297.
It is lovely to hear the word ”friend” from you. Fate seems to have apportioned to us the role of two piers which support the bridge between East and West. Carl Jung to Richard Wilhelm, Letters Vol. 1, Page 66.
Marriage is indeed a brutal reality, yet the experimentum crucis of life. I hope you learn to endure and not to struggle against the suppressing necessities of fate. Only thus you remain in the centre. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 172-173.

Whether a person's fate comes to him from without or from within, the experiences and events of the way remain the same. Carl Jung, The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 93.

The character ming really signifies a royal command then, destiny, fate, the fate allotted to a man, so too, the duration of life, the measure of vitality at one's disposal, and thus it comes about that ming (life) is closely related to Eros. The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 11.

Somewhat deaf somewhat blind, it [Stupidity] brings about necessary fate and keeps from us the virtuousness coupled with rationality. Liber Novus, Page 316, Footnote 277.

A certain line of thought, for instance, is developed through a series of dreams; and I discover that I am the duplicate of my unconscious anticipation of myself; at the same moment I am filled with a sense of purpose as if a secret arrangement of my fate existed. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 214.

It is as if the dream were quite uninterested in the fate of the ego, it is pure Nature, it expresses the given thing, it mirrors the state of our consciousness with complete detachment; it never says "to do it in such and such a way would be well", but states that it is so. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 8March1935, Pages 198.

The form in which Christ presented the content of his unconscious to the world became accepted and was declared valid for all. Thereafter all individual fantasies became otiose and worthless, and were persecuted as heretical, as the fate of the Gnostic movement and of all later heresies testifies. The prophet Jeremiah is speaking just in this vein when he warns Carl Jung, CW 6, §BI.

We had to swallow the poison of science. Otherwise we would have met the same fate as you have: we'd be completely lamed, if we encountered it unsuspecting and unprepared. This poison is so insurmountably strong that everyone, even the strongest, and even the eternal Gods, perish because of it. Carl Jung to Izdubar, Liber Novus, Page 279.

If one waits long enough, one sees how the Gods all change into serpents and underworld dragons in the end. This is also the fate of the Logos: in the end it poisons us all. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 280.

For relaxation, Jung played solitaire in the evenings, occasionally "helping fate a little by switching the cards around" in "unabashed cheating." Aniela Jaffe, Last Years, Pages 114-115.

We imitate Christ and hope he will deliver us from our own fate. Like little Iambs we follow the shepherd, naturally to good pastures. No talk at all of uniting our Above and Below! Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 76-77.

The announcement of an important truth, even with the best of intentions, can lead to an extraordinary mess. That was the fate of Prometheus. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 60.

A book of mine is always a matter of fate. A creative person has little power over his own life. He is not free. He is captive and drawn by his daimon. Carl Jung, MDR, Page 357.

Carl Jung on Gnostic, Gnosticism, and Gnosis. [Anthology] (2015-07-19 05:35)

Carl Jung on Gnostic, Gnosticism, and Gnosis. [Anthology]
Gnosis, as a special kind of knowledge, should not be confused with. ”Gnosticism.” Carl Jung, Footnote #13, Psychology and Religion, Page 45.
We find in Gnosticism what was lacking in the centuries that followed: a belief in the efficacy of individual revelation and individual knowledge. This belief was rooted in the proud feeling of man’s affinity with the gods. Carl Jung, Psychological Types, Page 242.
At the Reformation two things happened which upset the absolute attitude of that day: (a) Crucifixes were found in Mexico, which undermined the belief in the uniqueness of the Christian religion where the crucifixion was the central teaching, (b) The rediscovery of Gnosticism, the Dionysian myth and so forth, which showed that teachings similar to Christianity had been prevalent before the birth of Christ. Carl Jung; Cornwall Seminar; Page 15.
A woman is oriented towards the animus because it is the son of the unknown father, the Old Sage, whom she never comes to know. This motive is hinted at in the Gnostic texts where Sophia in her madness loves the Great Father On the other hand a man does not know the mother of the anima. She may be personified, for example, in Sophia or the seven times veiled Isis. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 30.

This process of becoming human is represented in dreams and inner images as the putting together of many scattered units, and sometimes as the gradual emergence and clarification of something that was always there. The speculations of alchemy, and also of some Gnostics, revolve around this process. It is likewise expressed in Christian Dogma, and more particularly in the transformation mystery of the Mass. Carl Jung; “Transformation Symbolism in the Mass”; CW 11, par. 399.

I . . . have the feeling that this is a time full of marvels, and, if the auguries do not deceive us, it may very well be that . . . we are on the threshold of something really sensational, which I scarcely know how to describe except with the Gnostic concept of [Sophia], an Alexandrian term particularly suited to the reincarnation of ancient wisdom in the shape of ΨA. Carl Jung, The Freud/Jung Letters, Page 439.

Further, according to an early Christian-Gnostic idea, the spirit which appeared in the form of a dove was interpreted as Sophia-Sapientia—Wisdom and the Mother of Christ. Thanks to this motif of the dual birth, children today, instead of having good and evil fairies who magically ”adopt” them at birth with blessings or curses, are given sponsors—a ”godfather” and a ”godmother.” Carl Jung, The Portable Jung; Page 63.

The doctrine that all evil thoughts come from the heart and that the human soul is a sink of iniquity must lie deep in the marrow of their bones. Were that so, then God had made a sorry job of creation, and it were high time for us to go over to Marcion the Gnostic and depose the incompetent Demiurge. Ethically, of course, it is infinitely more convenient to leave God the sole responsibility for such a Home tor Idiot Children, where no one is capable of putting a spoon into his own mouth. But it is worth man’s while to take pains with himself, and he has something in his soul that can grow. It is rewarding to watch patiently the silent happenings in the soul, and the most and the best happens when it is not regulated from outside and from above. I readily admit that I have such a great respect for what happens in the human soul that I would be afraid of disturbing and distorting the silent operation of nature by clumsy interference. Carl Jung, The Portable Jung; Pages 362-363.

Therefore the center of the circle which expresses such a totality would correspond not to the ego but to the self as the summation of the total personality. (The center with a circle is a very well-known allegory of the nature of God.) In the philosophy of the Upanishads the Self is in one aspect the personal atman, but at the same time it has a cosmic and metaphysical quality as the suprapersonal Atman.

We meet with similar ideas in Gnosticism: I would mention the idea of the Anthropos, the Pleroma, the Monad, and the spark of light (Spinther) in a treatise of the Codex Brucianus:

This same is he [Monogenes] who dwelleth in the Monad, which is in the Setheus, and which came from the place of which none can say where it is. . . . From Him it is the Monad came, in the manner of a ship, laden with all good things, and in the manner of a field, filled or planted with every kind of tree, and in the manner of a city, filled with all races of mankind. . . . This is the fashion of the Monad, all these being in it: there are twelve Monads as a crown upon its head. . . . And to its veil which surroundeth it in the manner of a defense. there are twelve gates. . . . I his same is the Mother-City-begotten. Carl Jung, The Portable Jung, Page 367.

In alchemical literature this prophetess is taken to be Maria Prophetissa, also called the Jewess, sister of Moses, or the Copt, and it is not unlikely that she is connected with the Maria of Gnostic tradition. Epiphanius testifies to the existence of writings by this Maria, namely the ”Interrogationes magnae” and ”Interrogationes parvae,” said to describe a vision of how Christ, on a mountain, caused a woman to come forth from his side and how he mingled himself with her. Carl Jung, The Portable Jung, Page 406.

So the union of the two is a kind of self-fertilization, a characteristic always ascribed to the mercurial dragon. From these hints it can easily be seen who the philosophical man is: he is the androgynous original man or Anthropos of Gnosticism, close parallel in India is purusha. Of him the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad says: ”He was as large as a man and woman embracing. He divided his self [Atman] in two, and thence arose husband and wife. He united himself with her and men were born,” etc. The common origin of these ideas lies in the primitive notion of the bisexual original man. Carl Jung, The Portable Jung, Pages 407-408.

The Son of Man is an anticipation of the idea of the self: hence the Gnostic adulteration oi Christ with the other synonyms for the self among the Naassenes, recorded by Hippolytus. The also a connection with the symbolism of Horus: on the one hand, Christ enthroned with the four emblems o\ the evangelists—three animals and an angel; on the other. Father Horus with his four sons, or Osiris with the four sons of Horus. Horus is also the rising sun and Christ was still worshiped as such by the early Christians. Carl Jung, The Portable Jung, Page 443.

That there is a general interest in these matters a denied, however much it offends against good taste. I am not thinking merely of the interest taken in psychology a science, or of the still narrower interest in the analysis of Freud, but of the widespread and every interest in all sorts of psychic phenomena, including spiritualism, astrology, Theosophy, parapsychology, and so forth. The world has seen nothing like it since the end of the seventeenth century. We can compare it only to the flowering of Gnostic thought in the first and second centuries after Christ. The spiritual currents of our time have, in a deep affinity with Gnosticism. There is even an ”eglise gnostique de la France,” and I know o(two schools in Germany which openly declare themselves Gnostic. The most impressive movement numerically is undoubtedly Theosophy, together with its continental sister, Anthroposophy; these are pure Gnosticism in Hindu dress. Compared with them the interest in scientific psychology is negligible. What is striking about these Gnostic systems is that they are based exclusively on the manifestations of the unconscious, and that their moral teachings penetrate into the dark side of life, as is clear!) shown by the refurbished European version of Kundalini-yoga. The same is true of parapsychology, as everyone acquainted with it will agree. Carl Jung, The Portable Jung, Page 467.

Modern man, in contrast to his nineteenth-century brother, turns to the psyche with very great expectations, and does so without reference to any traditional creed but rather with a view to Gnostic experience. The fact that all the movements I have mentioned give themselves a scientific veneer is not just a grotesque caricature or a masquerade, but a positive sign that they are actually pursuing ”science,” i.e., knowledge, instead of faith, which is the essence of the Western forms of religion. Modern man abhors faith and the religions based upon it. He holds them valid only so far as their knowledge-content seems to accord with his own experience of the psychic background. He wants to know —to experience for himself. Carl Jung, The Portable Jung, Pages 467-468.

I have purposely cited the ecclesiastical allegories in greater detail here, so that the reader can see how saturated Gnostic symbolism is in the language of the Church, and how, on the other hand, particularly in Origen, the liveliness of his amplifications and interpretations has much in common with Gnostic views.

Thus, to him as to many of his contemporaries and successors, the idea of the cosmic correspondence of the ”spiritual inner man” was something quite familiar: in his first Homily on Genesis he says that God first created heaven, the whole spiritual substance, and that the counterpart of this is ”our mind, which is itself a spirit, that is, it is our spiritual inner man which sees and knows God.” Carl Jung; Aion; Page 215.

The Pleroma, or fullness, is a term from Gnosticism. It played a central role in the Valentinian system. Hans Jonas states that ”Pleroma is the standard term for the fully explicated manifold of divine characteristics, whose standard number is thirty, forming a hierarchy and together constituting the divine realm” (The Gnostic Religion: The Message of the Alien God and the Beginnings of Christianity [London: Routledge, 1992], p. 180).

In 1929, Jung said: ”The Gnostics … expressed it as Pleroma, a state of fullness where the pairs of opposites, yea and nay; day and night, are together, then when they ’become,’ it is either day or night. In the state of ’promise’ before they become, they are nonexistent, there is neither white nor black, good nor bad” (Dream Analysis: Notes of the Seminar Given in 1928-1930, ed. William McGuire [Bollingen Series, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984], p. 131)

Carl Jung: ”This compensates for 1,000 misunderstandings!.” (2015-07-19 05:49)

To Erich Neumann
My dear Neumann, Bollingen, 5 January 1952
Very many thanks for your kind letter and the way you have understood me.
This compensates for 1,000 misunderstandings!
You have put your finger on the right spot, a painful one for me: I could no longer consider the average reader.
Rather, he has to consider me.
I had to pay this tribute to the pitiless fact of my old age.
With the undimmed prospect of all-round incomprehension I could exercise no suasions and no captatio benevolentiae; there was no hope of tunnelling knowledge into fools.
Not in my livery, but ”naked and bare I must go down to the grave,” fully aware of the outrage my nakedness will provoke.
But what is that compared with the arrogance I had to summon up in order to be able to insult God?
This gave me a bigger bellyache than if I had had the whole world against me.
That is nothing new to me anymore.
I have expressed my sorrow and condolence in my motto, Doleo super te, fratri mi.
Your questions:
The book is about the Canonical God-image.
This is our prime concern, and not a general philosophical concept of God.
God is always specific and always locally valid, otherwise he would be ineffectual .
The Western God-image is the valid one for me, whether I assent to it intellectually or not.
I do not go in for religious philosophy, but am held in thrall, almost crushed, and defend myself as best I can.
There is no place for Gnosis or the Midrashim in this image, for there is nothing of them in it.
Only my intellect has anything to do with purusha-atman or Tao, but not my living thralldom.
This is local, barbaric, infantile, and abysmally unscientific.
The ”vacillation between theological and psychological formulation” is indeed ”involuntary.”
I have much more sympathy with Sophia than with the demiurge but faced with the reality of both my sympathy counts for nothing.

God is a contradiction in terms, therefore he needs man in order to be made One.
Sophia is always ahead, the demiurge always behind.
God is an ailment man has to cure.
For this purpose God penetrates into man.
Why should he do that when he has everything already?
In order to reach man, God has to show himself in his true form, or man would be everlastingly praising his goodness and justice and so deny him admission.
This can be effected only by Satan, a fact which should not be taken as a justification for Satanic actions, otherwise God would not be recognized for what he really is.
The ”advocate” seems to me to be Sophia or omniscience.
Ouranos and Tethys no longer sleep together.
Kether and Malkhuth are separated, the Shekhinah is in exile; that is the reason for God’s suffering.
The mysterium coniunctionis is the business of man.
He is the nymphagogos of the heavenly marriage.
How can a man hold aloof from this drama?
He would then be a philosopher, talking about God but not with him.
The first would be easy and would give man a false sense of security, the second is difficult and therefore extremely unpopular.
Just that was my lamented lot, wherefore I needed an energetic illness to break down my resistance.
I have to be everywhere beneath and not above.
How would Job have looked had he been able to keep his distance?
Although I am talking of the Western, specifically Protestant God-image, there are no texts one can turn to for a more or less reliable interpretation.
They have to be taken in the lump.
One doesn’t shoot at sparrows with cannons, i.e., the God-image is a representation collective which everyone knows something about.
As for the nigredo, it is certain that no one is redeemed from a sin he has not committed, and that a man who stands on a peak cannot climb it.
The humiliation allotted to each of us is implicit in his character.
If he seeks his wholeness seriously, he will step unawares into the hole destined for him, and out of this darkness the light will rise.
But the light cannot be enlightened.
If anyone feels he is in the light, I would never talk him into the darkness, for with his light he would seek and find something black which is not him at all.
The light cannot see its own peculiar blackness.
But if it dims, and he follows his twilight as he followed his light, then he will get into the night that is his.
If the light does not dim he would be a fool not to abide in it.
Your Psyche has arrived-many thanks-and I have begun reading it.
I will write about it later.
So far I am very impressed and am enjoying it.
Job and Synchronicity are now in the press.
At present, with my unfortunately very limited working capacity, I am still struggling with the last chapter of Mysterium Coniunctionis.
The book will run to 2 volumes, followed by a third, containing Aurora Consurgens (attributed to Thomas Aquinas) as an example of the interpenetration of Christianity and alchemy.
Again many thanks!
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung: ” The serious illness of my wife has consumed all my spare time.” (2015-07-19 06:08)

To Father Victor White
Dear Victor, 6 May 1955
The serious illness of my wife has consumed all my spare time.
She has undergone an operation so far successfully, but it has left her in a feeble state needing careful nursing for several weeks to come.
Since I am the cause of much discomfort to you I am not sure whether you care to see me or not.
Please put conventionality aside and do not feel under any obligation.
I can understand your true situation and I would prefer not to add to its spikes and thorns.
A conventional call means nothing to me, and a straightforward talk may be painful and not desirable.
Please decide according to your judgment.
Needless to say, you can count upon my friendship .
Cordially yours, C.G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 251.

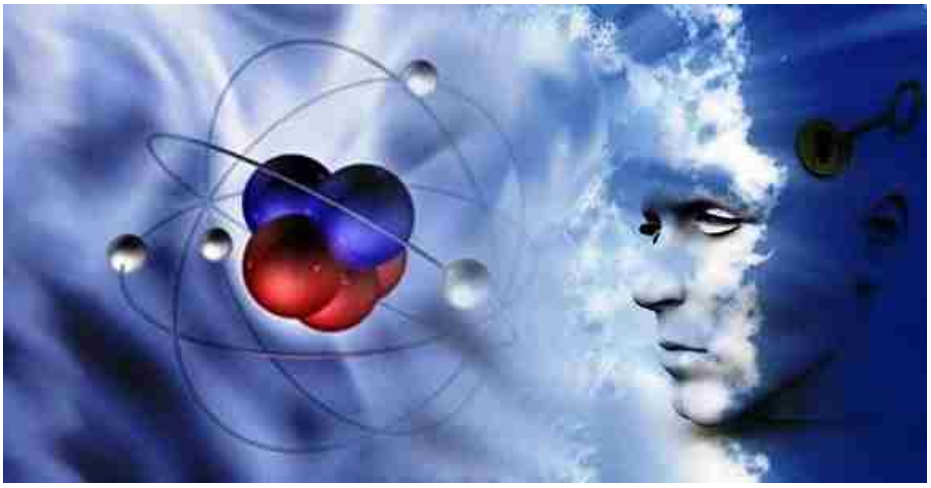
Carl Jung: A controversial book of mine is to appear shortly... (2015-07-19 06:21)

Walter Uhsadel
Dear Pastor Uhsadel, 6 February 1952
It is extraordinarily kind of you to wish to dedicate your book to me, and I would gladly accept this dedication if I were certain that you would be equally pleased in the future.

6968

My wife has pointed out that this might possibly not be the case and I have to agree with her.
A controversial book of mine is to appear shortly, entitled Answer to Job.
Unfortunately I cannot tell you in detail what I have written In it, but can only hint that this book is a very critical discussion of the Old Testament Yahweh and of the Christian appropriation of this God-concept.
I have shown the MS to three theologians and they were shocked.
On the other hand many younger people had a very positive reaction.
But I can imagine that in circles where thinking and feeling are orthodox my book could have a devastating effect -both for me and for all those with whom I have close relationships.
I wouldn't like to expose you to this danger without cause.
Therefore I would ask you to think twice about it.
The motive for my book was an increasingly urgent feeling of responsibility which in the end I could no longer withstand.
Nor could I, like Albert Schweitzer, seek suitable refuge far away from Europe and open a practice there.
On the time-honoured principle Hie Rhodus, hie salta, I had to resign myself to looking the problem of the modern Christian in the eye.
So perhaps you had better wait until the book is out.
Meanwhile with kind regards and best thanks,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 39-40.

Carl Jung on "Archetype," "Atom," "Numbers." (2015-07-19 06:50)



To Dr. H.
Dear Dr. H., 30 August 1951
You must pardon my long silence.
In the spring I was plagued by my liver, had often to stay in bed and in the midst of this misery write a little essay (ca.100 typed pages) whose publication is causing me some trouble.
I am afraid of stirring up a hornets' nest.
It is about the question you raised in your letter of 1 May.
I myself have the feeling that I have not yet found the right way to formulate my answer, i.e., the kind of presentation that would convey my views to the public without provoking too many misunderstandings.

My modus procedendi is naturally empirical: how to give a satisfactory description of the phenomenon ”Christ” from the standpoint of psychological experience?
The existing statements about Christ are, in part, about an empirical man, but for the other and greater part about a mythological God-man.
Out of these different statements you can reconstruct a personality who, as an empirical man, was identical with the traditional Son of Man type, as presented in the then widely read Book of Enoch .
Wherever such identities occur, characteristic archetypal effects appear, that is, numinosity and synchronistic phenomena, hence tales of miracles are inseparable from the Christ figure.
The former explains the irresistible suggestive power of his personality, for only the one who is ”gripped” has a ”gripping” effect on others; the latter occur chiefly in the field of force of an archetype and, because of their aspatial and atemporal character, are acausal, i.e., ”miracles .”
(I have just lectured at Eranos on synchronicity.)
The paper will soon appear in the acts of the Institute.
This remarkable effect points to the ”psychoid” and essentially transcendental nature of the archetype as an ”arranger” of psychic forms inside and outside the psyche.
(In theoretical physics the archetype corresponds to the model of a radioactive atom, with the difference that the atom consists of quantitative, the archetype of qualitative, i.e., meaningful, relationships, the quantum appearing only in the degree of numinosity.
In physics the quale appears in the irreducible quality of the so-called discontinuities as for instance in the quantum or in the half-life of radioactive substances.)
In consequence of the predominance of the archetype the personality that is ”gripped” is in direct contact with the mundus archetypus, and his life or biography is only a brief episode in the eternal course of things or in the eternal revolution of ”divine” images.
That which is eternally present appears in the temporal order as a succession.
”When the time was fulfilled’: the solitary creator-god transformed himself into a father and begot himself as a son, although from eternity, i.e., in the non-time of the Pleroma or in his transcendental form of being, he is father-son-spirit-mother, i.e., the succession of archetypal manifestations.
Although the psychoid archetype is a mere model or postulate, archetypal effects have just as real an existence as radioactivity.
Anyone who is gripped by the archetype of the Anthropos lives the Godman-one can very well say that he is a God-man.
Archetypes are not mere concepts but are entities, exactly like whole numbers, which are not merely aids to counting but possess irrational qualities that do not result from the concept of counting, as for instance the prime numbers and their behaviour.
Hence the mathematician Kronecker could say: Man created mathematics, but God created whole numbers.
This description of Christ satisfies me because it permits a non-contradictory presentation of the paradoxical interplay of his human and divine existence, his empirical character and h is mythological being.
The wordless or formless ”gripping” is no argument against the presence of the archetype, since the very numinosity of the moment is itself one of its manifestations (and the most frequent), a primordial form of archetypal seizure, cf. Kairos and Tao or (in Zen) satori.
On account of its transcendence, the a archetype per se is as irrepresentable as the nature of light and hence must be strictly distinguished from the archetypal idea or mythologem (see ”Der Geist der Psychologie” in Eranos-Jahrbuch 1946).
In this way the transcendence of the theological premise remains intact.
In the hope that I have answered your question at least to some extent, with best regards,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on the dreams of Elias Ashmole. (2015-07-20 03:56)

[Carl Jung on the dreams of Elias Ashmole.]
To C. H. Josten
Dear Sir, 6 April 1952
Thank you ever so much for letting me see Ashmole's dreams!
Such a series is indeed unique.
One has to go right back to the 3rd cent. A.D. to find something that would bear comparison, namely the dream-visions of Zosimos of Panopoli.
These are indubitably alchemistic, while Ashrnole's dreams have nothing-on the surface at least-reminiscent of alchemy.
They are, though, of considerable interest inasmuch as they contain a problem which played a great role in the generation immediately before Ashmole's time:
It is the so-called "Mysterium Coniunctionis" represented in a literary document, viz . Christian Rosencreutz: Chymische Hochzeit, 1616.
It is also the foundation of Goethe's Faust and one of the most important items in Gerard us Dorneus ' "Speculativa Philosophia" (end of XVIth cent. Printed in Theatr. Chemi.,2 Vol. I, 1 6oz) .
The "Mysterium" reaches its culmination in the dream of Dec. 29th 1646.
The peripeteia follows in the dream of March 1st 1647 and the catastrophe in the dream of May 16th 1 647.
The subsequent dreams show the turning over from the feminine to the masculine side, i.e., from the attempt at coniunctios. compositio to the suppression of the feminine factor in favour of a one-sided masculinity.
This a mounts to a complete disregard of the "left" side. i.e., th e unconscious, and the equally complete restoration of the former state of consciousness.
We describe this process as an intrusion of unconscious contents into the conscious world of an individual.
It is setting in with Sept. 11 th 1645: in the IX house = a personification of the alchemistic "Sapientia" (parallel to the Gnostic "Sophia"!).
All the subsequent erotic and semi-erotic dreams aim at a coniunctio with the feminine, i.e., transconscious side (called "anima"). The "bridegroom" is always, curiously enough , also the cipher chosen for Ashmole himself, quite correctly, because it is his "mystery." March 1, 1647, a "young man" poisons him, i.e., he himself as a younger person than he is, less experienced, his inferior, insinuates a younger, more masculine idea over against an older, wiser attitude, inclined to integrate his more "feminine" trends which aim at the completion of the Self ("process of individuation").
The latter is expressed in dream June 21st 1646 by paradise on th e North pole, the 4 springs (quaternity!) and the "chapel of Our Lady," also by dream of Dec. 29th 1646: "all my affections terminate in thee," i .e., th e Anima-Sapientia
.
In the North pole dwells the cor Mercurii.
"A" describes here a mandala, a well-known symbol of the Self.
(You will find all the necessary amplifications and evidence in my book Psychologie u. Alchemie, 1944 and in Symbolik des Geistes, 1948, here especially about ⍰⍰.Concerning the "North" vide my book Aion, 1951.)
On account of a complete lack of personal material I am unable to say anything about the personalistic aspect of the dreams.
It would be however nothing more than a bit of personal or "all-too-human (!) chronique scandaleuse," not altogether interesting.
I have confined myself therefore to the archetypal and impersonal aspect exclusively.
Here we have ample material for comparison at our disposal and a fairly conclusive one at that.
The whole dream-episode pictures in a remarkably neat way the experience of an "unconscious" invasion compensating a somewhat impulsive and rather one-sided masculine attitude, characteristic of the XVI and XVII cent. in the northern countries.

A parallel document in Italy is the famous Ipnerotomachia of Poliphilo (XVth cent.) with very much the same psychology.
(Cf. the book by L. FierzDavid : Der Liebestraum des Poliphilo [1947] Zurich.)
I have given you a very rough draft indeed of what one could say about A.'s dreams.
There is quite a lot more of detail I have not dealt with here.
To do so would require half a small book.
I only want to draw your attention to the Faust parallel: in the beginning of the series a number of women symbolize the approach of the unconscious; he is unable to establish a relationship with the female partner (his unconscious side, viz. his "anima"), he then gets poisoned through his shadow (alchem.: "familiaris," as a rule , in Faust Mephisto) and through death and murder and fraud he regains his former masculine attitude with its ambitions: honour and wealth.
Another solution even in those unpsychological times would have been possible if "A"had carefully observed the ethical rules as well as the "Philosophia Meditativa"of alchemy.
It does not seem as if the publication of the Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum had been the right answer.
However the dream series was an episode which might have had another effect if repeated later in his life.
I have dealt with this classical alchemistic problem in a special treatise Mysterium Coniunctionis, that is not yet published.
But my Psych . and Alch . gives you a general orientation at least.
Could you enlighten me about Mr. Lilly?
Was he a sort of sorcerer? and about the "Negative Oath"?
I know nothing about it.
Thank you again for your kindness!
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
P.S. Are you going to publish the dreams?
It would be interesting material for a psychologist of my brand. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 47-48

Carl Jung on if there is “personal survival after death or not.” (2015-07-20 04:20)

To H. J. Barrett
Dear Mr. Barrett, 12 October 1956
Although my time is short and my old age is a real fact, I would like to answer to your questions.
They are not quite easy, f.i. the first question whether I believe in personal survival after death or not, I could not say that I believe in it, since I have not the gift of belief.
I only can say whether I know something or not.
I do know that the psyche possesses certain qualities transcending the confinement in time and space.
Or you might say, the psyche can make those categories as if elastic, i.e., 100 miles can be reduced to 1 yard and a year to a few seconds.
This is a fact for which we have all the necessary proofs.
There are moreover certain post-mortal phenomena which I am unable to reduce to subjective illusions.
Thus I know that the psyche is capable of functioning unhampered by the categories of time and space.
Ergo it is in itself an equally transcendental being and therefore relatively non-spatial and ”eternal.”
This does not mean that I hold any kind of convictions as to the transcendental nature of the psyche.
It may be anything.
2. There is no reason whatever to assume that all so-called psychic phenomena are illusory effects of our mental processes.
3· I don’t think that all reports of so-called miraculous phenomena (such as precognition, telepathy, supranormal knowledge, etc.) are doubtful.
I know plenty of cases where there is no shadow of a doubt about their veracity.
4· I do not think that so-called personal messages from the dead can be dismissed in globo as self-deceptions.
Emmanuel Kant once said that he would doubt all stories about spooks, etc., individually, but as a whole there was something in them, which reminds me fatally of a Professor of Catholic Theology who, treating the seven arguments about the existence of God, was made to admit that every one of them was a syllogism.

But in the end he said: ”Oh, I admit you can prove that everyone taken singly may be at fault, but there are seven of them, that must mean something!”
I carefully sift my empirical material and I must say that among many most arbitrary assumptions there are some cases that made me sit up.
I have made it a rule to apply Multatuli’s wise statement: There is nothing quite true, and even this is not quite true.
Hoping I have answered your questions to your satisfaction,
I remain,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on “Gnosis,” “Archetypes,” and “Aion.” (2015-07-20 12:22)

To H. Haberlandt
Dear Colleague, 23 April 1952
Very many thanks for kindly sending me your review of Aion.
It stands out from all the others because it is obvious that its author has really read the book, which is something I am grateful for.
I therefore venture to ask you to let me know in what sense you use the term ”Gnosis.”

You can hardly mean knowledge in general, but more specifically the Christian or even that of Gnosticism.
In both the latter cases it has to do with metaphysical assertions or postulates, i.e., it is assumed that actually consists in the knowledge of a metaphysical object.
Now I state expressly and repeatedly in my writings that psychology can do no more than concern itself with assertions and anthropomorphic images.
The possible metaphysical significance of these assertions is completely outside the bounds of empirical psychology as a science.
When I say ”God” I mean an anthropomorphic (archetypal) God-image and no not imagine I have said anything about God.
I have neither denied nor affirmed him, unlike the Christian or Gnostic yvwm> which thinks it has said or has to say something about a metaphysical God.
The difficulty which gives rise to misunderstandings is that archetypes are ”real.”
That is to say, effects can be empirically established whose cause is described hypothetically as archetype, just as in physics effects can be established whose cause is assumed to be the atom (which is merely a model).
Nobody has ever seen an archetype, and nobody has ever seen an atom either.
But the former is known to produce numinous effects and the latter explosions.
When I say ”atom” I am talking of the model made of it; when I say ”archetype” I am talking of ideas corresponding to it, but never of the thing-in itself, which in both cases is a transcendental mystery.
It would never occur to a physicist that he has bagged the bird with his atomic model (for instance Niels Bohr’s planetary system).
He is fully aware that he is handling a variable schema or model which merely points to unknowable facts.
This is scientific gnosis, such as I also pursue.
Only it is news to me that such knowledge is accounted ”metaphysical.”
You see, for me the psyche is something real because it works as can be established empirically.
One must therefore assume that the effective archetypal ideas, including our model of the archetype, rest on something actual even though unknowable, just as the model of the atom rests on certain unknowable qualities of matter.
But science cannot possibly establish that, or to what extent, this unknowable substrate is in both cases God.
This can be decided only by dogmatics or faith, as for instance in Islamic philosophy (Al-Ghazzali), which explained gravitation as the will of Allah. This is Gnosticism with its characteristic overstepping of epistemological barriers.
The Church’s proofs of God likewise come under this heading, all of which beg the question if looked at logically.
By contrast I pursue a scientific psychology which could be called a comparative anatomy of the psyche.
I postulate the psyche as something real.
But this hypothesis can hardly be called ”gnostic” any more than the atomic theory can.
So my question is: Wherein consists my ”gnosis” in your view, or what do you understand by ”gnosis”?
Excuse me for bothering you with such a long letter.
But I wonder how it comes that so many people think I am a gnostic while equally many others accuse me of being an agnostic.
I would like to know whether I am making a fundamental mistake somewhere that occasions such misunderstandings.
I would be sincerely grateful to you if you could lighten my darkness.
With collegial regards,
Yours very sincerely,

Carl Jung on “Prayer.” (2015-07-20 12:39)

Anonymous
Dear N., Bollingen,3 August 1953
Hearty thanks for your kind birthday wishes!
Unfortunately I can’t remember here in Bollingen what you sent me.
There was such a flood of letters, flowers, and things pouring in on me that I can remember absolutely nothing except your letter with its main point, the question of prayer.
This was and still is a problem for me.
Some years ago I felt that all demands which go beyond what is are unjustified and infantile, so that we shouldn’t ask for anything that is not granted.
We can’t remind God of anything or prescribe anything for him, except when he tries to force something on us that our human limitation cannot endure.
The question is, of course, whether such things happen.
I think the answer is yes, for if God needs us as regulators of his incarnation and his coming to consciousness, it is because in his boundlessness he exceeds all the bounds that are necessary for becoming conscious.
Becoming conscious means continual renunciation because it is an ever-deepening concentration.
If this is right, then it may be that God has to be ”reminded.”
The innermost self of every man and animal, of plants and crystals, is God, but infinitely diminished and approximated to his ultimate individual form.
In approximating to man he is also ”personal,” like an antique god, and hence ”in the likeness of a man”
(as Yahweh appeared to Ezekiel).
An old alchemist formulated the relation to God thus: ”Help me, that I may help you! ”
With cordial greetings,

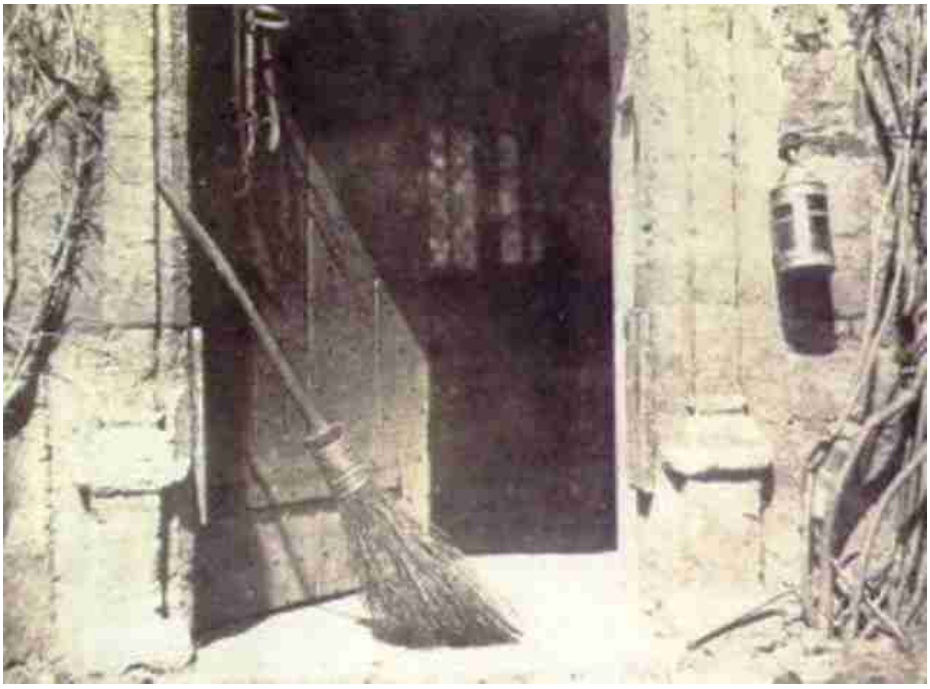
Carl Jung: ”Can you imagine a real prophet or saviour in our days of television and press reportage?”
(2015-07-21 04:59)



To Eugene M. E . Rolfe
Dear Mr. Rolfe, 1 May 1954
Thank you very much for your interesting article on ”Rival Gods.”
You ask a pertinent question indeed.
I am afraid there will be nobody to answer it, at least not in the way which we would expect following tradition.
Can you imagine a real prophet or saviour in our days of television and press reportage?
He would perish by his own popularity within a few weeks.
And yet some answer will be expected.
You rightly point out the emptiness of our souls and the perplexity of our mind when we should give an equally pat, simple-minded and understandable answer as f.i. Marxism.
The trouble is that most of us believe in the same ideals or very similar ones.
Mankind as a whole has not/yet understood that the ultimate decision is really laid into its own hands.
It is still possessed by wrathful gods and is doing their will.
There are very few who realize the true position and its desperate urgency.
I am glad you asked the question!
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 172.

Carl Jung on the "Christian Message." (2015-07-21 05:41)

To Pastor W. Niederer
Dear Pastor Niederer, 1 October 1953
I will answer your points a s best I can in writing.
1 . My interest in the first place was to understand the meaning of the Christian message myself, in the second place to convey this understanding to those of my patients who felt a religious need, and in the third place to salvage the meaning of Christian symbols in general.
2. I don't do anything to God at all, how could I?
I criticize merely our conceptions of God. I have no idea what God is in himself.
In my experience there are only psychic phenomena which are ultimately of unknown origin, since the psyche in itself is hopelessly unconscious.
My critics all ignore the epistemological barrier which is expressly respected by me.
Just as everything we perceive is a psychic phenomenon and therefore secondary, so is all inner experience.
We should be truly modest and not imagine we can say anything about God himself.
Truly we are confronted with frightful enigmas.
We must in fact be conscious that an unconscious exists.
I don't dare to formulate what the theologian does, but what I do is try to make people conscious enough to know where they can exercise their will and where they are confronted with the power of a non-ego.
So far as I can observe the workings of this non-ego it is possible for me to make statements about it.
I have no real cognitive means (only arbitrary decisions) which would enable me to distinguish the unknowable non-ego from what men since the remotest times have called God (or gods, etc.).
For instance the-so far as I can supreme God archetype of the self has a symbolism identical with the traditional Christian God-image.
How all this can be understood without a knowledge of the psychology of the unconscious, or without self-knowledge,is utterly beyond me. In psychology one understands only what one has experienced.
The archetype is the ultimate I can know of the inner world.
This knowledge denies nothing else that might be there.
3· If one assumes that God affects the psychic background and activates it or actually is it, then the archetypes are, so to speak, organs (tools) of God.
The self "functions" like the Christ-image.
This is the theological Christus in nobis.
It is not only I who think this way, but ail the ancients right back to Paul.
I take my stand clearly on the empirical plane and speak a psychological language where the theologian speaks an analogous theological or mythological language.
Of course theological statements about the Christian aeon do not agree at all points with psychological empiricism, for instance in regard to God as the Summum Bonum or Christ as a one-sided pneumatic light-figure.

But everything that is alive changes; it even develops, so that Christianity is no longer what it was woo let alone 1900 years ago.
It can differentiate itself still further, i.e., go on living, but to do that it must be interpreted anew in every aeon.
If that does not happen (it happens even in the Catholic Church) it suffocates in traditionalism.
But the foundations, the fundamental psychic facts, remain eternally the same.
4- Here I can only say: 0 sancta simplicitas!
I realize I am fit for the stake ad maiorem Dei gloriam.
I consider myself a Christian, but that didn't do Savonarola or Servetus much good, and not even Christ himself escaped this fate.
"Woe to that man by whom the offence cometh!"
How about these parsons and the true imitatio Christi?
Where are they crucified?
They· are redeemed scot-free of all pain, and Christ can take care of everything else.
With respects to your wife and kind regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 129-131.

Carl Jung: "I seek real knowledge and therefore avoid all unverifiable speculation." (2015-07-21 06:02)

To Fernando Cassani
Dear Herr Cassani, 13 July 1954
Best thanks for your friendly letter.
I can only tell you that none of my books represents a "synthesis or foundation of my work," at least not in my view.
I am not a philosopher who might be able to achieve something as ambitious as that, but an empiricist who describes the progress of his experiences; thus my work has no absolute beginning and no all-encompassing end.
It is like the life of an individual, which suddenly becomes visible somewhere but rests on definite though invisible foundations, so has no proper beginning and no proper end, ceasing just as suddenly and leaving questions behind which should have been answered.
You do not know my later (and perhaps more important) works yet.

I therefore enclose a list of them.
As for the writings of Ouspenskt and Gurdjieff, I know enough to satisfy me that I have no time for them.
I seek real knowledge and therefore avoid all unverifiable speculation. I have seen enough of that as a psychiatrist.
You might just as well recommend Mme. Blavatsky's Isis Unveiled or the compendious opus of Rudolf Steiner or Bo-Yin-Ra (why not Schneiderfranken?).
Anyway I thank you for your good intentions.
It is so difficult to establish facts that I detest anything that obscures them.
You can attribute this to a deformation professionelle.
I naturally agree with what you say about freedom of thought.
The Communist doesn't come into this category, since he doesn't think; but his actions are a danger to the public.
If he thought, he would have found out his deceit long ago.
Hoping you will excuse my freedom of thought,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Life after Death (2015-07-22 04:31)

Anonymous
Dear Frau N., 30 May 1960
My old age and the need for rest make me fight shy of too many visitors, so I have to confine myself as far as possible to written answers.
I can answer your question about life after death just as well by letter as by word of mouth .
Actually this question exceeds the capacity of the human mind, which cannot assert anything beyond itself.
Furthermore, all scientific statements are merely probable.
So we can only ask: is there a probability of life after death?
The point is that, like all our concepts, time and space are not axiomatic but are statistical truths.
This is proved by the fact that the psyche does not fit entirely into these categories.
It is capable of telepathic and precognitive perceptions.
To that extent it exists in a continuum outside time and space.
We may therefore expect post-mortal phenomena to occur which must be regarded as authentic.
Nothing can be ascertained about existence outside time.
The comparative rarity of such phenomena suggests at all events that the forms of existence inside and outside time are so sharply divided that crossing this boundary presents the greatest difficulties.
But this does not exclude the possibility that there is an existence outside time which runs parallel with existence inside time.
Yes, we ourselves may simultaneously exist in both worlds, and occasionally we do have intimations of a twofold existence.
But what is outside time is, according to our understanding, outside change.
It possesses relative eternity.
Perhaps you know my essay ”The Soul and Death .”
For its scientific foundation I would draw your attention to my ”Synchronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle,” in Jung and Pauli, The Interpretation of Nature and the Psyche.
These are my essential thoughts, and I would not express them otherwise in a talk with you.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 561.

Carl Jung after his embolism laid him up for a month. (2015-07-22 06:15)

To Eugen Bohler
Dear friend, 25 February 1960
It is time I gave you some news of my existence.
I am now well enough to write letters again.
On Jan. 23rd I had a slight embolism followed by not too severe heart cramps.
I was under house arrest for a month, forbidden all mental activity, i.e., active concentration.
However, it didn't stop me from my long planned (renewed) reading of Buddhist texts, whose content I am leaving to simmer inside me.
Thanks to my isolation I have been slipping away from the world and holding converse not with the men of today but with voices long past.
On my return to the 2oth century I discovered that I have heard nothing from you.
Therefore I wanted to notify myself that it was I who was fetched out of the present and transported into the neighbourhood of the Bardo, which always happens when I hear such a distinct memento mori.
I am sufficiently restored to health to go, with luck, to Lugano this Saturday in the hope of heedless and deedless days in the blessed sun.
Hoping to see you again when I get back,
Yours ever,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 544.

Carl Jung on the Buber-Jung controversy (2015-07-22 13:22)

To Bernhard Lang
Dear Colleague, June 1957

6984

Many thanks for your friendly letter, which shows that the Buber-Jung controversy is a serious matter for you.
And so indeed it is, for here that threshold which separates two epochs plays the principal role.
I mean by that threshold the theory of knowledge whose starting point is Kant.
On that threshold minds go their separate ways: those that have understood Kant, and the others that cannot follow him.
I will not enter here into the Critique of Pure Reason, but will try to make things clear to you from a different, more human standpoint.
Let us take as an example the believing person who has Buber's attitude to belief.
He lives in the same world as me and appears to be a human being like me.
But when I express doubts about the absolute validity of his statements, he expostulates that he is the happy possessor of a "receiver," an organ by means of which he can know or tune in the Transcendent.
This information obliges me to reflect on myself and ask myself whether I also possess a like receiver which can make the Transcendent, i.e., something that transcends consciousness and is by definition unknowable, knowable.
But I find in myself nothing of the sort.
I find I am incapable of knowing the infinite and eternal or paradoxical; it is beyond my powers.
I may say that I know what is infinite and eternal; I may even assert that I have experienced it; but that one could actually know it is impossible because man is neither an infinite nor an eternal being.
He can know only the part but not the whole, not the infinite and eternal.
So when the believer assures me that I do not possess the organ he possesses, he makes me aware of my humanity, of my limitation which he allegedly does not have.
He is the superior one, who regretfully points out my deformity or mutilation.
Therefore I speak of the beati possidentes of belief, and this is what I reproach them with: that they exalt themselves above our human stature and our human limitation and won't admit to pluming themselves on a possession which distinguishes them from the ordinary mortal.
I start with the confession of not knowing and not being able to know; believers start with the assertion of knowing and being able to know.
There is now only one truth, and when we ask the believers what this truth is they give us a number of very different answers with regard to which the one sure thing is that each believer announces his own particular truth.
Instead of saying: To me personally it seems so, he says: It is so, thus putting everybody else automatically in the wrong.
Now in my estimation it would be more human, more decent, and altogether more appropriate if we carefully inquired beforehand what other people think and if we expressed ourselves less categorically.
It would be more becoming to do this than to believe subjective opinions and to damn the opinions of others as fallacies.
If we do not do this, the inevitable consequence is that only my subjective opinion is valid, I alone possess the true receiver, and everyone else is deformed who lacks such an important organ as belief is considered to be.
Buber is unconscious of the fact that when he says "God" he is expressing his subjective belief and imagining by "God" something other people could not sanction.
What, for instance, would a Buddhist say about Buber's conception of God?
My human limitation does not permit me to assert that I know God, hence I cannot but regard all assertions about God as relative because subjectively conditioned-and this out of respect for my brothers, whose other conceptions and beliefs have as much to justify them as mine.
If I am a psychologist I shall try to take these differences seriously and to understand them.
But under no circumstances shall I assume that if the other person doesn't share my opinion it is due to a deformity or lack of an organ.
How could I have any communication at all with a person if I approached him with the absolutist claims of the believer?
Though I am sure of my subjective experience, I must impose on myself every conceivable restriction in interpreting it.

I must guard against identifying with my subjective experience.
I consider all such identifications as serious psychological mistakes indicative of total lack of criticism.
For what purpose am I endowed with a modicum of intelligence if I do not apply it in these decisive matters?
Instead of being delighted with the fact of my inner experience, I am then using it merely to exalt myself, through my subjective belief, above all those who do not accept my interpretation of the experience.
The experience itself is not in question, only the absolutizing interpretation of it.
If I have a vision of Christ, this is far from proving that it was Christ, as we know only too well from our psychiatric practice.
I therefore treat all confessions of faith with extreme reserve.
I am ready at any time to confess to the inner experience but not to my metaphysical interpretation, otherwise I am implicitly laying claim to universal recognition.
On the contrary, I must confess that I cannot interpret the inner experience in its metaphysical reality, since its essential core is of a transcendental nature and beyond my human grasp.
Naturally I am free to believe something about it, but that is my subjective prejudice which I don't want to thrust on other people, nor can I ever prove that it is universally valid.
As a matter of fact we have every reason to suppose that it is not.
I am sorry to say that everything men assert about God is twaddle, for no man can know God.
Knowing means seeing a thing in such a way that all can know it, and for me it means absolutely nothing if I profess a knowledge which I alone possess.
Such people are found in the lunatic asylum.
I therefore regard the proposition that belief is knowledge as absolutely misleading.
"What has really happened to these people is that they have been overpowered by an inner experience.
They then make an interpretation which is as subjective as possible and believe it, instead of remaining true to the original experience.
Take as an example our national saint Nicholas von der Flue: he sees an overwhelmingly terrifying face which he involuntarily interprets as God and then twiddles it around until it turns into the image of the Trinity, which still hangs today in the church at Sachseln.
This image has nothing to do with the original experience, but represents the Summum Bonum and divine love, which are miles away from God's Yahwistic terrors or the "wrath fire" of Boehme.
Actually after this vision Nicholas should have preached: "God is terrible."
But he believed his own interpretation instead of the immediate experience.
This is a typical phenomenon of belief and one sees from it how such confessions of faith come about.
Because this so-called knowledge is illegitimate, inner uncertainty makes it fanatical and generates missionary zeal, so that through the concurrence of the multitude the subjective interpretation, precarious enough as it is, may not be shaken still further.
But the certitude of inner experience generates greater certainty than the interpretation we have imposed upon it.
Buber fails to see that when he says "My experience is God" he is interpreting it in such a way as to force everyone into believing his opinion-because he himself is uncertain; for confronted with the great mystery no mortal man can aver that he has given a reliable interpretation, otherwise it would no longer be a mystery.
It is only too plain to see that such people have no mysteries any more, like those Oxfordites who think they can call up God on the telephone.
Then you ask me if I am a believer I must answer "no."
I am loyal to my inner experience and have pistis in the Pauline sense, but I do not presume to believe in my subjective interpretation, which would seem to me highly obnoxious when I consider my human brothers.
I "abhor" the belief that I or anybody else could be in possession of an absolute truth.
As I have said, I regard this unseemliness as a psychological mistake, a hidden inflation.
If you have inner experiences you are always in danger of identifying with them and imagining that you are specially favoured, or are a special species of man who possesses one organ more than others.

I know only too well how difficult it is for people to stand off from their own experience far enough to see the difference between the authentic experience and what they have made of it.
For if they stood by it, they would reach very weighty conclusions which could severely shake their interpretation.
Obviously they want to avoid these consequences, and my critical psychology is therefore a thorn in their flesh.
I can also confirm that I regard all declarations of faith, which Buber for instance has in mind, as an object of psychological research, since they are subjective human statements about actual experiences whose real nature cannot be fathomed by man in any case.
These experiences contain a real mystery, but the statements made about them don't.
Thus it remained a real mystery to Brother Klaus what that terrifying countenance of God actually meant.
Incidentally, I would like to remark that the concept "transcendent" is relative.
Transcendence is simply that which is unconscious to us, and it cannot be established whether this is permanently inaccessible or only at present.
In the past many things were transcendent that are now the subject-matter of science.
This should make one cautious-especially when dealing with ultimate things man cannot know about.
We cannot, after all, assert that belief enables us to attain godlike knowledge.
We merely believe we can become godlike, but we must modestly accept the fact that we cannot thrust this belief on anybody else.
We could never prove that this would not be an unbelievable presumption.
I for one am convinced that it is.
All that I have written you is Kantian epistemology expressed in everyday psychological language.
I hope by this means to have gained your ear.
In case my idea of interpretation should seem unintelligible to you, I would like to add a few words more.
Interpretation by faith seeks to represent the experienced content of a vision, for instance, as the visible manifestation of a transcendental Being, and it invariably does so in terms of a traditional system and then asserts that this representation is the absolute truth.
Opposed to this is my view, which also interprets, in a sense.
It interprets by comparing all traditional assumptions and does not assert that Transcendence itself has been perceived; it insists only on the reality of the fact that an experience has taken place, and that this is exactly the form it took.
I compare this experience with all other experiences of the kind and conclude that a process is going on in the unconscious which expresses itself in various forms.
I am aware that this process is actually going on, but I do not know what its nature is, whether it is psychic, whether it comes from an angel or from God himself.
We must leave these questions open, and no belief will help us over the hurdle, for we do not know and can never know.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 375-379.

Carl Jung on approaching the age where one is “left behind.” (2015-07-22 13:59)

To Michael Fordham
Dear Fordham, 18 June 1954
Your letter brings bad news; I am really sorry that you didn’t get the post at the Institute of Psychiatry although it may be a small consolation to you that they took at least your pupil, Dr. Hobson.
Well, after all, you are approaching the age when one has to become acquainted with the difficult experience of being superseded.
Times go on and inexorably one is left behind, sometimes more, sometimes less, and one has to realize that there are things beyond our reach one shouldn’t grieve for, as such grieving is still a remnant of too youthful an ambition.
Our libido certainly would go on reaching for the stars if fate didn’t make it clear beyond any reasonable doubt that we shouldn’t seek completion without, but within alas!
One becomes aware that there is so much to improve in the field of the inner man that we must even be grateful to adversity that it helps us to have the necessary amount of free energy to deal with the defects of our development, i.e., with that which has been ”spoiled by the father and by the mother.”
In this respect, loss of such kind is pure gain.
Cordially yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 177-178.

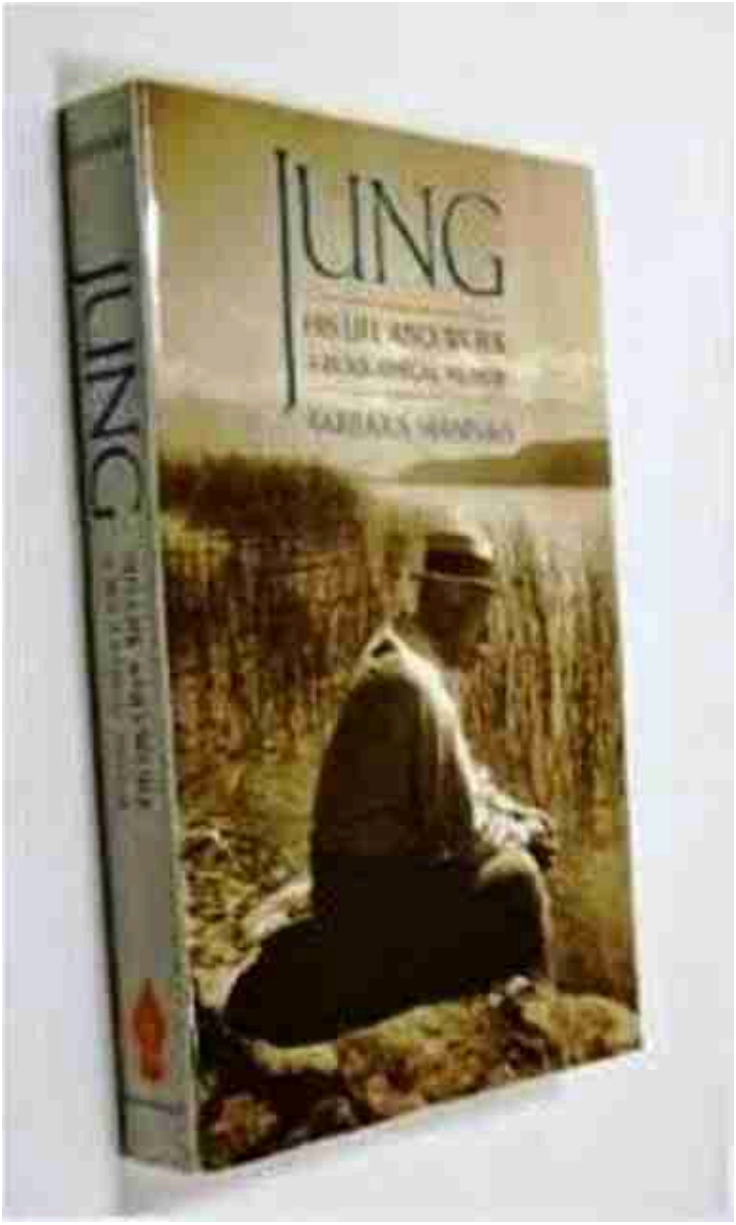
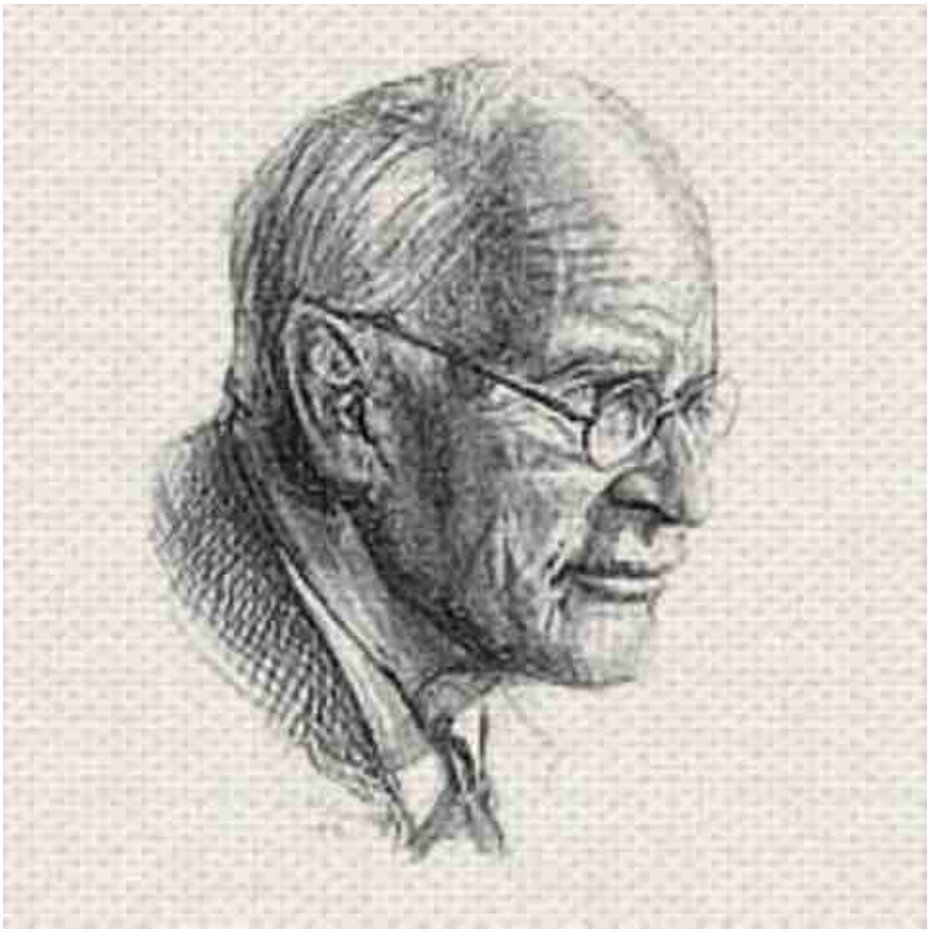
Carl Jung: Memories Dreams and Reflections is not an Autobiography (2015-07-22 14:29)



To Walther Niehus-Jung
Dear Walther, 5 April 1960

I want to thank you for your efforts on behalf of my so-called ”Autobiography” and to reaffirm that I do not regard this book as my undertaking but expressly as a book which Frau A. Jaffe has written.
The chapters in it that are written by me I regard as a contribution to Frau Jaffe’s work.
The book should appear under her name and not under mine, since it does not represent an autobiography that I myself have composed.
With cordial regards,
Your father-in-law,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 550.

Carl Jung: ... I am a psychiatrist and not a philosopher... (2015-07-23 09:50)



To Heinrich Boltze

Dear Herr Boltze, February 1951
For your orientation: I am a psychiatrist and not a philosopher, merely an empiricist who ponders on certain experiences.
Psyche for me is an inclusive term for the totality of all so-called psychic processes.
Spirit is a qualitative designation for certain psychic contents (rather like ”material” or ”physical”).
Atlantis: a mythical phantasm.
L. Frobenius: an imaginative and somewhat credulous original.
Great collector of material. Less good as a thinker.
God: an inner experience, not discussable as such but impressive.
Psychic experience has two sources: the outer world and the unconscious.
All immediate experience is psychic.
There is physically transmitted (outer world) experience and inner (spiritual) experience.
The one is as valid as the other.
God is not a statistical truth, hence it is just as s upid to try to prove the existence of God as to deny him.
If a person feels happy, he needs neither proof nor counterproof.
Also, there is no reason to suppose that ”happiness” or ”sadness” cannot be experienced.
God is a universal experience which is obfuscated only by silly rationalism and an equally silly theology.
(Cf. my little book Psychologic und Religion, Rascher-Verlag, Zurich 1940, where you will find something on this theme.)
What mankind has called ”God” from time immemorial you experience every day.
You only give him another, so-called ”rational” name-for instance, you call him ”affect.”
Time out of mind he has been the psychically stronger, capable of throwing your conscious purposes off the rails, fatally thwarting them and occasionally making mincemeat of them. Hence there are not a few who are afraid ”of themselves.”
God is then called ”I myself,” and so on.
Outer world and God are the two primordial experiences and the one is as great as the other, and both have a thousand names, which one and all do not alter the facts. The roots of both are unknown. The psyche mirrors both. It is perhaps the point where they touch.
Why do we ask about God at all?
God effervesces in you and sets you to the most wondrous speculations.
People speak of belief when they have lost knowledge.
Belief and disbelief in God are mere surrogates.
The naive primitive doesn’t believe, he knows, because the inner experience rightly means as much to him as the outer.
He still has no theology and hasn’t yet let himself be befuddled by booby trap concepts.
He adjusts his life-of necessity-to outer and inner facts, which he does not-as we do-feel to be discontinuous.
He lives in one world, whereas we live only in one half and merely believe in the other or not at all.
We have blotted it out with so-called ”spiritual development,” which means that we live by self-fabricated electric light and-to heighten the comedy-believe or don’t believe in the sun.
Stalin in Paris would have become uneespece d’ existentialist like Sartre, a ruthless doctrinaire.
What generates a cloud of twaddle in Paris causes the ground to tremble in Asia.
There a potentate can still set himself up as the incarnation of reason instead of the sun.
Yours very truly,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 4-5

Carl Jung and UFO's. (2015-07-23 12:22)

To Fowler McCormick
Dear Fowler, 22 February 1951
It is very kind of you to send me news about the flying saucers again.
I have read Gerald Heard's book in the meantime which is a very emphatic apology for the saucers' existence.
Unfortunately he is preaching his cause a bit too much for my taste.
The news statements about the saucers being nothing but weather balloons unfortunately does not chime in with the alleged observations, but maybe the latter are also just fake and hallucination.
It is very funny indeed that it seems to be so difficult to establish the truth about the reality of this phenomenon.
I think it is chiefly an obstinate rumour, but the question whether there is something real behind it is not answered.
Apart from some rheumatism I feel pretty well and I'm doing my work as usual. I suppose you are very busy!
I appreciate it all the more that I get some token of your existence from time to time.
Many thanks!
Yours ever cordially,

Carl Jung and the death of a close friend. (2015-07-24 05:56)

To Adolf L. Vischer
Dear Colleague, 21 March 1951
I am sorry I am thanking you only now for your very kind letter of 26.XII. 50.
Your sympathy over the death of my last close friend, Albert Oeri was veritable balm.
One can indeed feel the pain of such a loss without making oneself guilty of undue sentimentality.
One notices on all such occasions how age gradually pushes one out of time and the world into wider and uninhabited spaces where one feels at first rather lonely and strange.
You have written so sympathetically and perceptively in your book of the peculiarities of old age that you will have an understanding heart for this mood.
The imminence of death and the vision of the world in conspectu mortis is in truth a curious experience: the sense of the present stretches out beyond today, looking back into centuries gone by, and forward into futures yet unborn.
With heartfelt thanks,
Affectionately yours ,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters, Vol. II, Page 10.

Carl Jung and his violent criticism of Protestantism. (2015-07-24 07:09)

To Adolf Keller
Dear friend, 20 March 1951
What you feel as my anti-Protestant complex is an admittedly violent criticism of Protestantism, for it is not where I would want it to be.
Now that the Catholic Church has taken the momentous step of the Assumption, Protestantism is really and truly nailed fast to the Patriarchal line of the Old Testament and way behindhand in the matter of dogmatic development. The Catholic at least believes in continuing revelation, but the Protestant sees himself committed to an-oh so contradictory!-document like the Bible, and consequently cannot construct but merely demolish-vide the famous ”demythologization” of Christianity.

As though statements about sacred history were not-mythologems!
God always speaks mythologically. If he didn’t, he would reveal reason and science.
I fight against the backwardness of Protestantism. I don’t want it to lose the lead.
I don’t want to turn back to the unconsciousness, the nebulosity, of Catholic concretism, so I also fight against the Protestant concretism of historicity and the vacuity of the Protestant message, which can only be understood today as an historical vestige.
If Christ means anything to me, it is only as a symbol.
As an historical figure he could just as well have been called Pythagoras, Lao-tse, Zarathustra, etc.
I do not find the historical Jesus edifying at all, merely interesting because controversial.
I say this so that you may know where I stand.
I’d be glad if you would nevertheless have a talk with me.
So if ever you can find the time I shall be ready.
Again with best thanks for your attentive and good-natured letter,
Carl Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 9-10.

Carl Jung “The unconscious expresses itself chiefly in quaternities. (2015-07-25 05:55)

To Adolf Keller
Dear friend, Easter Monday [26 March 1951]

6996

At the end of this week I am spending April in Bollingen, where I have all sorts of work to attend to.
So this week is still open should you be here again.
Best thanks for your two letters!
They swarm with questions and possible misunderstandings which we can only settle by talking.
Otherwise I would have to write whole treatises.
I would only remark now that I haven't become "more Christian," it's just that I now feel better prepared to contribute something to the psychology of Christianity.
Dreams can be many things, but we have only one theoretical premise for their explanation.
The scientific axiom principia explicandi non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem should be taken very seriously.
We must therefore try to get as far as we can with the compensation theory.
The quaternity is an empirical fact, not a doctrine.
Until now Christianity, like so many other systems, had 4 metaphysical figures: Trinity and the "fiery god, the fourth by number,".
The unconscious expresses itself chiefly in quaternities, irrespective of Christian tradition.
The quaternity is of Old Testament as well as Egyptian origin.
Vishnu has four faces, etc.
Theologia naturalis must take account of this fact, or it will make no contact with psychology.
The quaternity is not a doctrine that can be discussed but a fact which, ut supra demonstravimus, also underlies dogmatics.
Since the incarnatio Dei conveys nothing intelligible to modern man, "became flesh" has to be translated for better of worse, e.g., "has assumed definite empirical form."
This formula would serve as a bridge to psychology.
Meanwhile best greetings,
CARL Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 13.

Carl Jung's Letter to Aniela Jaffe (2015-07-25 06:19)

To Aniela Jaffe
Dear Aniela, Bollingen, 29 May 1951
So it goes all the time: memories rise up and disappear again, as it suits them.
In this way I have landed the great whale; I mean "Answer to Job."
I can't say I have fully digested this tour de force of the unconscious.
It still goes on rumbling a bit, rather like an earthquake.
I notice it when I am chiseling away at my inscription (which has made good progress).
Then thoughts come to me, as for instance that consciousness is only an organ for perceiving the fourth dimension, i .e., the all-pervasive meaning, and itself produces no real ideas.
I am getting much better.
Only my sleep is still rather delicate.
I oughtn't to talk much, or intensely.
Luckily occasions for this are rare.
How are you?
I hope you are not overstraining yourself at the Institute.
I won't make any false promises about a visit from you, but I am thinking of it.
Meanwhile with cordial greetings,
C. G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 16-17.

Carl Jung's letter to R.J. Zwi Werblowsky (2015-07-25 06:34)

To R. J. Zwi Werblowsky
Dear Herr Werblowsky, 28 March 1951

I hope that in the meantime you have received my short foreword.
I am sorry that I am only now getting down to saying a few words about some points in your book.
P. So. I should propose a somewhat different wording: instead of saying ”pushing the process of individuation”-exactly the thing you cannot do because it instantly leads into an inflation or into an identification with archetypes-I should recommend something like ”becoming too recklessly selfish.” The term individuation ought to be reserved for the legitimate evolution of the individual entelechy.
Your singling out of hybris as the specific vice of the Greeks is very illuminating.
It corresponds to Augustine’s conception of superbia.
As you know, he said there are two cardinal sins: superbia and concupiscentia.
It is therefore to be supposed that if the specific Greek vice is superbia, concupiscentia falls to the lot of the Jews.
We see this very clearly in Freud, namely in his ”pleasure principle,” in its turn corresponding to the castration complex which, incidentally, plays a much smaller role with non-Jews.
In my practice I very seldom have occasion even to speak of it.
Hybris actually looms much larger with the Gentiles.
P. 84. Here I would recommend a revision of the text.
Hybris can hardly be described as a ”hypertrophy of masculinity,” since this would not apply in the case of a woman.
Hybris is an inflation of the human being in general.
It is also extremely doubtful whether Greek homosexuality can be derived from it.
Homosexuality is more a social phenomenon which develops wherever a primitive society of males has to be cemented together as a stepping-stone to the State.
This is particularly evident in Greece.
Nor can one impute without qualification a contempt of women to homosexuals.
Very often they are good friends to them.
For instance, a young homosexual bachelor is a welcome guest among women of uncertain age, and he feels happy in their company because it surrounds him with mothers.
Most homosexuals are suspended or potential males still clinging to their mother’s apron strings.
The castration complex, which you mention in this connection, really has nothing to do with homosexuality but very much to do with the meaning of Jewish circumcision which, as a most incisive operation on a sensitive organ, is a reminder of concupiscentia.
And because it is an act prescribed by divine law, it bridles concupiscence for the purpose of consolidating man’s affinity with the Law or with God as a permanent state.
It is a kind of Karoxv, an expression of Yahweh’s marriage with Israel.
When the idea of God’s marriage becomes obsolete, the alleged castration, which circumcision is understood to be, regresses to dependence on the mother (Attis myth!).
But in so far as the mother signifies the unconscious pure and simple, the unconscious takes Yahweh’s place.
It is, however, correct to say that homosexuality comes in here indirectly as the result of an almighty mother complex.
The mother-fixated son, because of his ”aloofness from women,” is constantly in danger of autoerotism and exaggerated self-esteem.
The characteristic arrogance of adolescent youths towards the female sex is simply a defence mechanism against domination by the mother and can hardly be interpreted as hybris.
”Greek” homosexuality occurs, as said, in all primitive societies of males though it never led them to the soaring flights of Greek culture.
The real foundation of the Greek spirit is not to be found in these primitive phenomena but in the specific endowments of the people.
One must, I think, be very chary of the assumption that the genius of a culture has anything to do with ”masculinity.”
P. 85, note 21.
You say an antisexual tendency is inherent in the Virgin Mother archetype.
This can hardly be maintained since the cult of the Oriental love-goddess is notoriously anything but antisexual.

I have read your book with great pleasure and found the difference between Jewish and Greek psychology particularly instructive.
I must confess that I have never read the whole of Paradise Lost any more than I have read the Messias of Klopstock.
I have learnt a lot from your work and have tried in my foreword to see the emergence of the figure of Satan in the 17th century in historical perspective.
Many thanks for the notes about Blake you enclosed in your letter.
I am no particular friend of Blake, whom I am always inclined to criticize.
With kind regards,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on ”Overpopulation.” (2015-07-25 06:45)

To Bernard Aschner
Dear Colleague, 28 March 1951
I still have vivid memories of our meeting in Vienna, since it was from you that I took over, in my own way, your interest in Paracelsus.
During the war, especially, I was much concerned with him, in particular with his religio medica as expounded in his treatise De Vita Longa.
As for your question I can only tell you that I fully stand by my earlier remarks.
Sooner or later it will grow into a question of first class importance for humanity, since we are rapidly approaching the time when the feeding of the world’s population will come up against a barrier that cannot be crossed.
Even now India is so near the brink that a single bad season is enough to precipitate a famine, and today, thanks to modern hygiene, the whole world is multiplying unchecked.
This surely cannot go on much longer, for the problem will then arise that already confronts all primitive societies: limitation of progeny through food shortages.
This danger of overpopulation, already staring us in the face, still hasn’t reached the consciousness of the public at large, least of all our legislators, who are smitten by a special blindness.

Your initiative has my undivided applause.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 14-15.

Carl Jung on his relationship to “Answer to Job.” (2015-07-25 09:14)

To Aniela Jaffe
Dear Aniela, 18 July 1951

I a m especially pleased that you could get into such close relationship with the second part of my book.
So far most people have remained stuck in the first.
I personally have the second more at heart because it is bound up with the present and future.
If there is anything like the spirit seizing one by the scruff of the neck, it was the way this book came into being.
Footnote: ”Answer to Job,” CW 11. The second part probably begins at sec. 8, pars . 649ff.

Carl Jung: Individuation is a transcendental goal. (2015-07-25 09:56)

Dear Pastor Niederer, Easter Monday [26 March]1951
While tidying up my MSS I carne across your kind gift! of Feb. 1949.
I doubt whether I ever thanked you for it.
Though I have a secretary upon whom it is incumbent to protect me from the consequences of my absent-mindedness and forgetfulness, she too occasionally drowns in the floods of paper which pour down upon me without cease.
At any rate I will now make good my thanks and beg you for indulgence and forgiveness of sins.
At the end of your lucid expose you inquire about the ”merit” of Christ, which you no longer understand as a magical occurrence, replacing it, so to speak, by the integration of projections.
This is rationally correct but, it seems to me, scarcely an adequate answer.
The psychological ”merit” (or rather, significance) of Christ consists in the fact that, as the ”firstling,” he is the prototype of the “perfect”, the integral man.

7004

This image, as history testifies, is numinous and can therefore be answered only by another numinosity.
It touches the imago Dei, the archetype of the self in us, and thereby awakens it.
The self is then ”constellated” and by virtue of its numinosity compels man towards wholeness, i.e., towards the integration of the unconscious or the subordination of the ego to a holistic ”will,” which is rightly conceived to be ”God’s will.” πληρότητα in the psychological sense means the ”completeness,” not the ”perfection” of man.
Wholeness cannot be conscious, since it also embraces the unconscious.
Hence at least half of it is a transcendental state, mystical and numinous.
Individuation is a transcendental goal, an incarnation of the [Greek word.] The only part of this we can understand rationally is the holistic religious striving of consciousness, i.e., the religiose observare of the holistic impulses in the unconscious, but not the existential reality of wholeness or of the self, which is prefigured by the “being in Christ”.
Very sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Vol. II, Pages 13-14

[Carl Jung on Organic and Psychic Symptoms (2015-07-26 05:47)

Dear Colleague, 8 August 1951
Heartiest thanks for kindly remembering my birthday!
I see with regret from your letter that you are suffering very much from your noises in the ear.
The unconscious often uses symptoms of this kind in order to make psychic contents audible, i.e., the symptoms are intensified by a psychogenic afflux and only then do they acquire the proper tormenting character that forces your attention inwards, where of course it gets caught in the disturbing noises.

Obviously it should turn inwards but not get caught in the noises; rather it should push on to the contents that are acting on it like a magnet.
The little word ”should” always means that one doesn’t know the way to the desired goal.
But often it is at least helpful to know that on top of the organic symptom there is a psychic Layer that can be lifted off.
I know from experience that the demand of the unconscious for introversion-in your case the ability to listen inwards- is unusually great.
And equally great is the danger that instead of being able to listen inwards one is compelled to listen inwards.
My own otosclerosis has presented me with all manner of noises, so I am fairly well informed on this matter.
You are quite right to remember the storm that interrupted our conversation.
In a quite irrational way we must be able to listen also to the voice of nature, thunder for instance, even if this means breaking the continuity of consciousness.
With best wishes,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 20-21.

Carl Jung and “she is quite an eyeful and beyond.” (2015-07-26 05:57)

To Father Victor White
Dear Victor, Bollingen, 21 September 1951
I have seen Mrs. X. and I assure you she is quite an eyeful and beyond!
We had an interesting conversation and I must admit she is quite remarkable.
If ever there was an anima it is she, and there is no doubt about it.
In such cases one had better cross oneself, because the anima, particularly when she is quintessential as in this case, casts a metaphysical shadow which is long like a hotel-bill and contains no end of items that add up in a marvellous way.

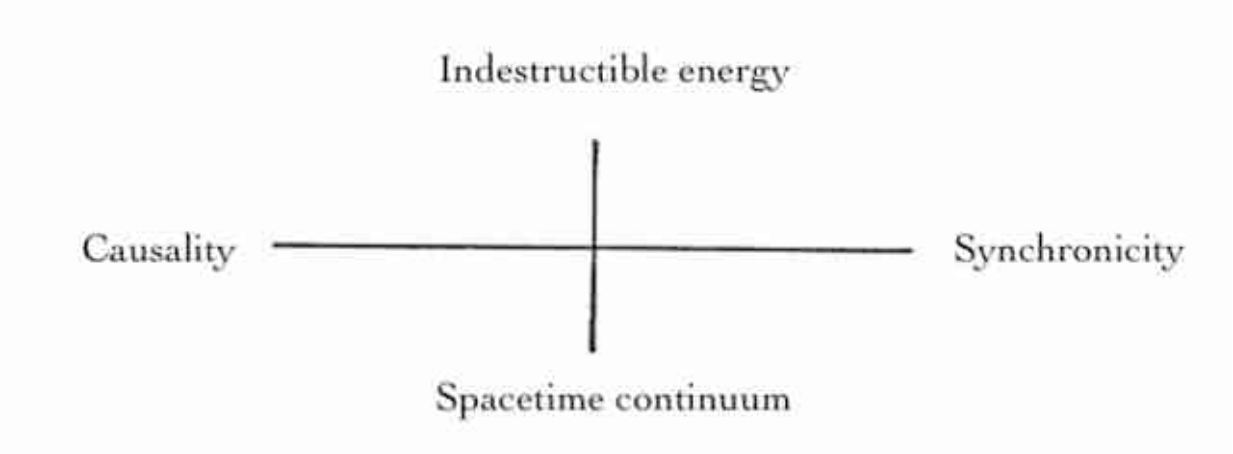
One cannot label her and put her into a drawer.
She decidedly leaves you guessing.
I hadn't expected anything like that.
At least I understand now why she dreams of the Derby winners: it just belongs to her!
She is a synchronistic phenomenon all over, and one can keep up with her as little as with one's own unconscious.
I think you ought to be very grateful to St. Dominicus that he has founded an order of which you are a member.
In such cases one appreciates the existence of monasteries.
It is just as well that she got all her psychology from books, as she would have busted every decent and competent analyst.
I sincerely hope that she is going on dreaming of winners, because such people need money to keep them afloat.
If you see Mrs. X., please tell her how much I've enjoyed her visit-but keep quiet about my other expectorations!
She must not be frightened too soon.
Don't work too much!
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 24-25.

Carl Jung on Astrology, Protons and Synchronicity (2015-07-26 06:07)



To Aniela Jaffe
Dear Aniela, Bollingen, 8 September 1951
Here comes a sign of life!
After Eranos I was very tired.
Have recovered a bit now, and again a though t has caught me, this time with reference to synchronicity.
I must rework the chapter on astrology.
An important change has to be made-Knoll put me on to it.
Astrology is not a mantic method but appears to be based on proton radiation (from the sun).
I must do a statistical experiment in order to be on sure ground.
This preys on my mind but not so much that I forget you.
How are you?
I hope better.
Please let me have a word from you.
After Eranos I missed the daily exchange of ideas and the warmth of life lapping me round.

I’m sorry I have to stop.
My son has just arrived by sailing boat.
Meanwhile with cordial greetings,
C. G . Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 22-23.
Note: According to Knoll, solar proton radiation is strongly influenced by planetary constellations.

Carl Jung and a man's psychology can be undermined by too much motherliness (2015-07-26 09:39)

Anonymous
Dear Mr. N., Bollingen, 1 November 1951

I’m sorry to be so late with my answer.
Your letter arrived while I was away from home for my vacations.
I couldn’t have seen you anyhow during that time.
If you hadn’t this relapse of tuberculosis I should have said that you’d better come once again to Zurich so that one could find out about that snag you seem to run into with your women analysts.
Perhaps it is just that they are women!
While you are in your plaster cast you have time to think and to read and I should advise you to make ample use of it.
Try to find out about yourself as much as possible with the aid of literature.
It could give you some masculine courage which you seem to be in need of.
In the long run the psychological influence of women isn’t necessarily helpful. The more helpless a man is, the more the maternal instinct is called upon, and there is no woman who could resist such a call .
But a man’s psychology gets badly undermined by too much motherliness.
Anything you acquire by your own effort is worth a hundred years with a woman analyst.
Unfortunately I’m unable to interpret your dream.
I wouldn’t dare to let my intuitions handle your material.
But, since I appear in your dream, I cannot refrain from making the remark that I like thick walls and I like trees and green things, and I like many books.
Perhaps you are in need of these three good things.
My best wishes!
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 26-27.

Carl Jung ... something of the human soul remains after death... (2015-07-26 09:53)

To M. Esther Harding
My dear Dr. Harding,
5 December 1951
I a m most awfully sorry to be so late with my answer to your letter of September 6th.
The reason is that I just cannot keep up with my correspondence.
There is simply too much of it.
Moreover I need my time for my own work with the last chapter of the big book on the Mysterium Coniunctionis.

It keeps me so busy that I have to disregard the world as much as I can.
You ask me in your letter about the spook phenomena.
Well, this is a point where I have to give up.
I cannot explain the locally bound spook phenomena.
There is a factor in it that is just not psychological.
We have to look elsewhere for a proper explanation.
I'm inclined to believe that something of the human soul remains after death, since already in this conscious life we have evidence that the psyche exists in a relative space and in a relative time, that is in a relatively non-extended and eternal state.
Possibly the spook phenomena are indications of such existences.
Concerning synchronicity I can tell you that my paper about it will be printed in the course of this winter and is going to appear together with a paper by Professor W. Pauli about the archetypal foundations of Kepler's astronomy.
The title of the book will be Naturanschauung und Psyche.
We hope that it will also appear in an English translation soon.
With kind regards and best wishes also to Dr. Bertine,
Yours cordially,

To Alice Lewisohn Crowley
Dear N., Bollingen, 30 December 1951
Thank you ever so much for your juicy collection of culinary delights!
I arrived here only yesterday and I still feel a bit tired after the labours of Xmas celebrations.
I am practising the gentle art of sleeping.
After a while I will try my hand on the third stage of coniunctio but for the time being I am undergoing the curse of letter-writing.

Only through submission to detestable duties does one gain a certain feeling of liberation which induces a creative mood.
In the long run one cannot steal creation.
I am glad you enjoyed our club-meeting.
It was correctly on the shortest day.
Now the light increases again.
I have greeted it with the ancient slute: Chaire nymphie neon pho!
(Welcome bridegroom new light)
There is great excitement in the Catholic church and much discussion about the new dogma.
I am just reading about it.
The pope has caught them neatly at their own game of fostering creeds that have no foundation in the scriptures.
Best wishes for the New Year,

Carl Jung on the Introvert and University Vice-Chancellor. (2015-07-26 11:21)

To Donald A . Rajapakse
Dear Mr. Rajapakse, 22 January 1952
As you see I am hastening to your rescue hoping that you did not get yourself into too much of a jam by your making yourself particularly obnoxious to your Vice-Chancellor.
You know that one of the unfortunate qualities of introverts is that they so often cannot Help putting the wrong foot forward.
At all events I must say that it is a pretty daring attitude to risk a dispute with the Vice-Chancellor Of your University. Obviously this gentleman is not quite informed about the situation.
Presumably he has never read my book Psychological Types, otherwise he couldn't have made that mistake to assume that it is based upon "a premise" at all.
I'm an alienist and I have an experience of over 50 years with a great number of patients and people in general, and-together with a number of other pioneers in the field of psychology-! couldn't help noticing that there is a very characteristic difference in the attitude and outlook of people.

As a matter of fact the forum of science has accepted not only the facts I described, but also my terminology practically all over the world.
It therefore seems rather preposterous to me that the Vice-Chancellor of your University shouldn't be acquainted with these facts.
Of course the practical application you make is a method that would appeal only to a psychologist, i.e., a man who knows and appreciates the practical value of psychological classification.
That is a thing one cannot expect of everybody.
If your man should belong to a different discipline, then you have to tread softly, because people as a rule are very sensitive when it comes to the recognition of psychological truth.
People don't like psychology and they don't want to be saddled with psychological qualities.
So you can only try to call his attention to certain difficulties people have with their attitudes, i.e., you ought to present it to him as if it were one of your own shortcomings, not his.
Tell him you are an introvert and explain to him what an introvert is and ask for his sympathetic understanding and his patience.
But be careful not to suggest that he ought to know how to handle extraverts and introverts.
No person in authority can be expected to know about psychology or to apply a psychological truth-particularly not when he is a European.
They underrate the human soul in an appalling way.
That's about all I can tell you concerning your question.
I wish you good luck!
Sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 35-36.

Carl Jung on T.S. Elliot and Sartre (2015-07-26 13:39)

To Dr. S.
Dear Colleague, 5 December 1951
Frankly I am surprised at your letting yourself be impressed by T. S. Eliot.

7016

Becoming conscious does not in itself lead to hell by any means.
It leads to this unpleasant place only if you are conscious of certain things and not of others.
You must always ask yourself what ought to become conscious.
In the case of both these two, Eliot and above all Sartre, the talk is always of consciousness, never of the objective psyche, the unconscious.

It is quite natural that if in your consciousness you are always running round in a circle you will finally end up in hell.
And that is just what Sartre is after and what Eliot would like to prevent with obviously ineffective measures.
I have no desire to argue with these two.
I made my position clear long before they did in their writings, so that anybody who wishes to know it can.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 30.

Carl Jung: ...the modern world prefers living en masse... (2015-07-27 05:21)

Dear Herr Galliker, 29 January 1952
I don't think you are seeing too black.
You are quite right when you say that the modern world prefers living en masse and thus forgets the bond with the past which is characteristic of every culture.
The young people are not to blame, for it is quite understandable that they should keep an eye open for what is new and impressive about our so-called cultural achievements.
But one must also realize that the real cultural good, the legacy of the past, is very often presented in such a boring and uninteresting way that it is almost a miracle if anyone can muster any enthusiasm for it.
Those for whom tradition means mere knowledge and book-learning will not be able to interpret the past as the living present.
I myself have experienced as a doctor how one had to brush aside the whole previous presentation of religion; mythology, and history as so much junk in favour of new living things, and how later one can find access again to what was lost if one reflects on its living meaning.
In order to understand what is going on now I had to return to the distant past and dig up the very things I thought were finally buried in the rubbish heap.
It seems to me perfectly possible to teach history in the widest sense not as dry-as-dust, lifeless book-knowledge but to understand it in terms of the fully alive present.
All these things should be presented as coming out of our contemporary experience and not as dead relics of times outlived.
This certainly faces the teacher with a hard and responsible task, but that's what a teacher is for.
A more than specialist education is always useful.
I have never regretted knowing things outside my specialty, on the contrary: renewals never come from over-sophisticated specialized knowledge but from a knowledge of subsidiary subjects which give us new points of view.

A wider horizon benefits all of us and is also more natural to the human spirit than specialist knowledge that leads to a spiritual bottleneck.
Yours very truly,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 36-37.

Carl Jung on Sigmund Freud Correspondence (2015-07-27 05:52)

To Ernest Jones
Dear Jones, 22 February 1952
Freud's letters in my possession are not particularly important.
They chiefly contain remarks about publishers or the organization of the Psychoanalytical Society.
And some others are too personal.
As a matter of fact I don't care for their publication.
On the whole they wouldn't be an important contribution to Freud's biography.
My personal recollections on the other hand are a chapter for itself.
They have very much to do with Freud's psychology, but since there is no witness except myself I prefer to refrain from unsubstantiated tales about the dead.
Hoping you will understand my motives,
I remain,
Very truly yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 40-41.

Carl Jung's Islands of Peace (2015-07-27 06:03)

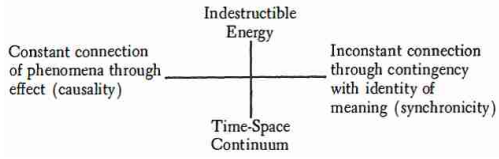
To J. Wesley Neal
Dear Sir, 9 February 1952
It is not so easy to answer your question about the "Island of Peace. "
I seem to have quite a number of them, a sort of peaceful archipelago.
Some of the main islands are: my garden, the view of distant mountains, my country place where I withdraw from the noise of city life, my library.
Also small things like books, pictures, and stones.
When I was in Africa the headman of my safari, a Mohammedan Somali, told me what his Sheik had taught him about Chadir.
He said: "He can appear to thee like light without flame and smoke, or like a man in the street, or like a blade of grass."
I hope this will answer your question.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 40.

Carl Jung: "Psyche = highest intensity in the smallest space." (2015-07-27 15:44)

Or taking into account modern physics:[7]



To John Raymond Smythies
Dear Dr. Srnythies, 29 February 1952
I hardly dare to write a letter to the Editor of the S.P.R. Journal, as you suggest.
I am afraid my English is too poor, too ungrammatical, and too colloquial.
Amongst very learned and illustrious philosophers my simple argumentation would have no show.
Moreover I know from experience that philosophers don't understand my uncouth language.
I prefer therefore, if you allow, to write a letter to yourself, and leave it to you to make that use of it you see fit.
Concerning your own proposition I have already told you how much I welcome your idea of a perceptual, i.e., "subtle" body.
Your view is rather confirmed, as it seems to me, by the peculiar fact that on the one hand consciousness has so exceedingly little direct information of the body from within, and that on the other hand the unconscious (i.e., dreams and other products of the "unconscious") refers very rarely to the body and, if it does, it is always in the most roundabout way, i.e., through highly "symbolized" images.
For a long time I have considered this fact as negative evidence for the existence of a subtle body or at least for a curious gap between mind and body.
Of a psyche dwelling in its own body one should expect at least that it would be immediately and thoroughly informed of any change of conditions therein.
Its not being the case demands some explanation.
Now concerning your critique of the space concept:
I have given a good deal of thought to it.
You know perhaps that the helium atom is characterized by 2 x 3 space factors and 1 time factor.
I don't know whether there is something in this parallel or not.
At all events the assumption of a perceptual body postulates a corresponding perceptual space that separates the mind from physical space in the same way as the subtle body causes the gap between the mind and the physical body.
Thus you arrive logically at two different spaces, which however cannot be entirely incommensurable, since there exists-in spite of the difference-communication between them.
You assume that time is the factor they have in common.
Th us time is assumed to be the same physically as well as perceptually.
Whereas w-phenomena bear out clearly that physical and psychic space differ from each other.
I submit that the factor of time proves to be equally "elastic" as space under ESP conditions.
If this is the case, we are confronted with two four-dimensional systems in a contingent contiguity.
Please excuse the awfully tortuous ways of putting it.
It shows nothing more than my perplexity.
The obviously arbitrary behaviour of time and space under ESP conditions seemingly necessitates such a postulate.

On the other hand one might ask the question whether we can as hitherto go on thinking in terms of space and time, while modern physics begins to relinquish these terms in favour of a time-space continuum, in which space is no more space and time no more time.
The question is, in short: shouldn't we give up the time-space categories altogether when we are dealing with psychic existence?
It might be that psyche should be understood as unextended intensity and not as a body moving with time.
One might assume the psyche gradually rising from minute extensity to infinite intensity, transcending for instance the velocity of light and thus irrealizing the body.
That would account for the "elasticity" of space under ESP conditions.
If there is no body moving in space, there can be no time either and that would account for the "elasticity" of time.
You will certainly object to the paradox of "unextended intensity" as being a contradictio in adiecto.
I quite agree.
Energy is mass and mass is extended. At all events, a body with a speed higher than that of light vanishes from sight and one may have all sorts of doubts about what would happen to such a body otherwise.
Surely there would be no means to make sure of its whereabouts or of its existence at all. Its time would be unobservable likewise.
All this is certainly highly speculative, in fact unwarrantably adventurous.
But >¥-phenomena are equally disconcerting and lay claim to an unusually high jump.
Yet any hypothesis is warrantable inasmuch as it explains observable facts and is consistent in itself.
In the light of this view the brain might be a transformer station, in which the relatively infinite tension or intensity of the psyche proper is transformed into perceptible frequencies or "extensions."
Conversely, the fading of introspective perception of the body explains itself as due to a gradual "psychification," i.e., intensification at the expense of extension.
Psyche = highest intensity in the smallest space.
In my essay on synchronicity I don't venture into such speculation.
I propose a new (really a very old) principle of explanation, viz. synchronicity, which is a new term for the time-hallowed correspondentia.
I go back in a way to Leibniz, the last mediaeval thinker with holistic judgment: he explained the phenomenon by four principles: space, time, causality, and correspondence (harmonia praestabilita).
We have dropped the latter long ago (though Schopenhauer took it up again, disguised as causality).
I hold that there is no causal explanation for 'JI-phenomena.
Terms like thought-transmission, telepathy, clairvoyance, mean nothing.
How can one imagine a causal explanation for a case of precognition?
\ }/-phenomena, I hold, are contingencies beyond mere probability, "meaningful coincidences" (sinngemiisse Koinzidenzen) due to a specific psychic condition, namely, a certain emotional mood called interest, expectation, hope, belief, etc., or an emotional objective situation like death, illness, or other "numinous" conditions.
Emotions follow an instinctual pattern, i.e., an archetype.
In the ESP experiments f.i. it is the situation of the miracle.
It looks as if the collective character of the archetypes would manifest itself also in meaningful coincidences, i.e., as if the archetype (or the collective unconscious) were not only inside the individual, but also outside, viz. in one's environment, as if sender and percipient were in the same psychic space, or in the same time (in precognition cases).
As in the psychic world there are no bodies moving through space, there is also no time.
The archetypal world is "eternal," i.e., outside time, and it is everywhere, as there is no space under psychic, that is archetypal conditions.
Where an archetype prevails, we can expect synchronistic phenomena, i.e., acausal correspondences, which consist in a parallel arrangement of facts in time.
The arrangement is not the effect of a cause.
It just happens, being a consequence of the fact that causality is a merely statistical truth.

I propose, therefore, 4 principles for the explanation of Nature:
Contingency is usually without meaning, but >□□=phenomena prove that occasionally it has meaning.
One can introduce synchronicity as the necessary supplement to a merely statistical causality, which is a negative way of doing it.
A positive demonstration however demands facts, which I cannot provide in a letter.
They are in my book.
Nevertheless I hope that I have succeeded in giving you some idea at least of what I mean by synchronicity.
If you think of i t as being something not unlike Leibniz' harmonia praestabilita you are not far off the truth.
But whereas it is a constant factor with Leibniz, it is a thoroughly inconstant one with me and mostly dependent upon an archetypal psychic condition.
Sorry to be a bit late with my answer.
I had a grippe in the meantime and I still feel somewhat under the weather.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 43-47.

Carl Jung: Carl Jung: “Divine favour and daemonic evil or danger are archetypal.” (2015-07-28 05:34)

\\
To Father Victor White
Dear Victor, Park Hotel, Locarno, 9 April 1952 until 14th
Thank you for your human letter.
It gives me some idea of what is happening inside of you.
The privatio bono does not seem to me such a particular puzzle, but I understand that it is of the greatest importance.
It is perhaps best if I set forth my point of view, so that you can see how I look at it.
At the same time I shall try to consider your standpoint too.
I think you agree with me that within our empirical world good and evil represent the indispensable parts of a logical judgment, like white and black, right-left, above-below, etc.
These are equivalent opposites and it is understood that they are always relative to the situation of the one that makes the statement, a person or a law.
Empirically we are unable to confirm the existence of anything absolute, i.e., there are no logical means to establish an absolute truth, except a tautology.

Yet we are moved (by archetypal motifs) to make such statements, viz. religious or metaphysical assertions such as the Trinity, the Virgin Birth and other exceedingly improbable and physically impossible things.
One of these assertions is the Summum Bonum and its consequence, the privatlo boni.
The latter is logically as impossible as the Trinity.
It is therefore a truly religious statement: prorsus credibile quia ineptum.
Divine favour and daemonic evil or danger are archetypal.
Even if you know that your judgment is entirely subjective and relative you are nevertheless forced to make such statements more than a dozen times every day.
And when you are religious you talk in terms of impossibilities.
I have no arguments against these facts.
I only deny that the privatio boni is a logical statement, but I admit the obvious truth that it is a ”metaphysical” truth based upon an archetypal ”motif.”
The way in which opposites are reconciled or united in God we just don’t know. Nor do we understand how they are united in the self.
The self is transcendental and is only partially conscious.
Empirically it is good and evil.
The same as the ”acts of God” have decidedly contradictory aspects.
This fact however does not justify the theological judgment that God is either good or evil.
He is transcendental, just as much as the self and therefore not subject to human logic.
The supreme powers are assumed to be either indifferent or more often good than evil.
There is an archetypal accent upon the good aspect, but only slightly so.
This is understandable, because there must be some sort of equilibrium, otherwise the world could not exist.
The great difficulty seems to consist in the fact that on the one hand we must defend the sanity and logic of the human mind, and on the other hand we have to accept and to welcome the existence of illogical and irrational factors transcending our comprehension.
We must deal with them as rationally as we can, even if there is no hope of ever getting on top of them.
As we can’t deal with them rationally we have to formulate them symbolically.
A symbol when taken literally is nearly always impossible.
Thus I should say that the privatio boni is a symbolic truth, based on archetypal motivation, not to be defended rationally any more than the Virgin Birth.
Excuse my bad writing.
I am in the garden and there is no table but my knee.
Answer not expected.
I will try to help you as much as possible.
Yours, C.G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 52-53.

Carl Jung: If belief does not come to me as a shock, it would not convince me. (2015-07-28 05:52)

To Father Victor White pro tempore Locarno, Ticino, Park Hotel
Dear Victor, [? Spring, 1952]

7026

Thank you very much for your offprints!
You have been obviously busy.
I have read them all and I think the one about the ”Dying God” is particularly good.
The one about Freud is clever and remarkably open-minded.
Your meditation about the way of the Cross contains nothing I could not subscribe to.
It is psychologically ”correct.”
This amounts to a sincere compliment.
Does the book you are planning contain these articles?
I hope you have received my Antwort auf Hiob.
I had a pretty miserable time throughout March on account of a grippe, from which I am recovering very slowly.
I came down here to pick up again.
Although we are in the sun, the air is still pretty cold and windy.
I have finished the dreaded last chapter of my Mysterium Coniunctionis.
It has knocked me flat, and my head is tired.
Well, I am approaching my 78th year, and complaints are pointless.
My next goal seems to be a thorough contemplation of the spiritual life of lizards and similar cold-blooded animals.
But the world does not let me go so easily.
After this letter I have to write another one about understanding and believing to a Protestant theologus.
I am afraid I cannot conceive of any religious belief which is less than a violation of my ego-consciousness.
Otherwise I would be hardly aware of believing anything at all.
If belief does not come to me as a shock, it would not convince me.
I don’t know whether they are going to like my opinion or not.
The Curator of the Museum of the History of Science in Oxford has sent me a rather long series of dreams which he has unearthed from the Elias Ashmole MSS, the editor of the Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum 1646(?).
They extend over about 5 years and contain the remarkable story of an invasion of unconscious contents aiming at a coniunctio with the unconscious.
The attempt fails, i.e., is superseded by a return of the former one-sided masculine consciousness.
It is an unconscious parallel to Faust.
The attempt culminates in a symbol of the self: Paradise on the North Pole, springs, and on a hill the chapel of Our Lady.
The series begins with Venus in the IX house = Sapientia.
It ends with death, fraud, and murder.
A fine example of an individuation that did not come off.
Hoping to see you in summer again!
Yours cordially,
C.G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 50-51.

Carl Jung: “My aim is to unearth the psychic facts to which religious statements refer.” (2015-07-29 05:55)

To Vera von Lier-Schmidt Emsthausen
Dear Frau Ernsthausen, 25 April 1952
I have read your detailed letter with attention.
I am not a philosopher but a doctor and empiricist.
I practise psychology in the first place as a science, in the second place as an instrument of psychotherapy.
Since neurosis is an attitudinal problem, and the attitude depends on, or is grounded in, certain ”dominants,” i.e., the ultimate and highest ideas and principles, the problem of attitude can fairly be characterized as a religious one.
This is supported by the fact that religious motifs appear in dreams and fantasies for the obvious purpose of regulating the attitude and restoring the disturbed equilibrium.
These experiences compelled me to come to grips with religious questions, or rather to examine the psychology of religious statements more closely.
My aim is to unearth the psychic facts to which religious statements refer.
I have found that, as a rule, when ”archetypal” contents spontaneously appear in dreams, etc., numinous and healing effects emanate from them.
They are primordial psychic experiences which very often give patients access again to blocked religious truths.
I have also had this experience myself.
I am far from thinking of ”self-redemption” since I am wholly dependent on whether such an experience will come my way or not.
I am in the position of Saul, who does not know what will happen to him on the road to Damascus.
If nothing happens, a Paul will never be made of him.
He must then go on persecuting the Christians until the revelation finally smites him.
Thus it happens with my patients and thus it happened with me.
Just as I can hold back or actually stop the influxus divinus (wherever it may come from) with preconceived opinions, so also by suitable behaviour I can draw closer to it and, when it happens, accept it.
I can win nothing by force, but can only try to do everything for and nothing against it.
The psyche for me is something objective that sends up effects into my consciousness.
The unconscious (the objective psyche) doesn’t belong to me; rightly or wrongly I belong to it.

By making it conscious I separate myself from it, and by so objectivating it I can integrate it consciously.
Thus my personality is made complete and is prepared for the decisive experience, but no more than that.
What can, but need not, happen then is the spontaneous action from the unconscious, an action which is symbolized by the alchemists, Paracelsus, Boehme and the modern unconscious as lightning.
(Cf. Gestaltungen des Unbewussten, pp. 102ff.)
I hope the foregoing has answered your question.
I must apologize for the tardiness of my answer.
First I had to recover from flu.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung, Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 56-57.

Carl Jung: The dream of a child prior to contracting infantile paralysis. (2015-07-29 06:03)

To Linda Veladini
Dear Fraulein Veladini, 25 April 1952

7030

I would gladly corroborate your interesting observations if I were in a position to do so.
But I lack the necessary experience in this specialized field.
In my practice I have had only one case of infantile paralysis.
It was that of a young man, who fell ill with severe poliomyelitis at the age of 4.
He still remembered an impressive dream he had shortly before the onset of the illness.
He dreamt he was sitting at his mother's feet, playing with some toy or other.
Suddenly a wasp flew out of the mother, which stung him, and immediately he felt his whole body poisoned and awoke in terror.
I knew the patient's mother and she was a very domineering personality and a burden to her children.
An elder brother of the patient had a formidable mother complex which overshadowed his later life.
The situation was entirely in keeping with your view that the suppression of the child's individuality under the parental influence can at least be a psychic precondition for a paralytic illness.
However, we do not have sufficient documentary evidence at present to conclude that infantile paralysis is psychogenic.
We only know that certain psychic disturbances cause a lowering of the body's resistance and hence a proneness to infections.
We know this quite definitely in the case of tonsilitis, and in the case of tuberculosis there is at least a well-founded suspicion.
I have treated several cases of chronic pulmonary tuberculosis for psychic disturbances and observed, coincidentally so to speak, a complete cure of the tuberculosis without specialist treatment.
For this reason I have long advocated that sanatoria for consumptives be staffed with psychologically trained doctors because these places positively swarm with neuroses.
At all events, psychic treatment would give substantial support to the specific treatment of tuberculosis.
Hoping that these remarks may be of some service to you,
I remain,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 57-58.

Carl Jung on “Answer to Job.” (2015-07-29 06:20)

To Paul Billeter
Dear Herr Billeter, 3 May 1952
I am returning Buri’s article to you with best thanks.
It has already been sent me by various people.

7032

I shall refrain from taking up a position in public.
I have said all that is necessary in my little book and in my experience it is quite hopeless to argue with people who can't or won't see certain simple truths.
Buri imputes false opinions to me and does not understand my epistemological standpoint, although the situation is as simple as could be wished.
When someone talks so long and so emphatically about his 100 thalers this is no proof whatever that he has them in his pocket.
I even do theology the honour of taking its statements perfectly seriously, but I cannot in all conscience know whether they correspond exactly to the metaphysical facts, and anyway it is utterly impossible for us to know these facts.
I do not by any means dispute their existence, but I maintain for good reasons that they are first of all Statements.
Even the Bible was written by human beings.
I cannot possibly suppose that God himself was its author.
Since we cannot know the metaphysical truth, we must be content with statements and at least take them seriously, and this means criticizing them if they contain gross contradictions.
So if I compare the behaviour of the Old Testament God with a Christian conception of God, I must point out that these statements do not agree in many respects and that this can upset a devout heart, which certainly not all theologians possess.
It is a fact that the Jews acknowledged the amorality of Yahweh, as you can see from the Midrashim.
I have cited the relevant passages in Aion (1951, pp. 9 3ff).
These things are generally unknown to theologians, however. I once met a professor of theology who hadn't even read the Book of Enoch.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 62-63.

Carl Jung on the dreams of Ashmole (2015-07-30 08:39)

To C. H. Josten

Dear Mr. Josten, 3 May 1952
Your elucidating remarks about the Ashmolean Dreams have been most welcome.
I was quite particularly interested, of course, to hear that the dream of December 29th is not from Ashmole himself.! (I hadn't understood the note in your report.)
That makes the case particularly interesting.
The dream itself is of an unusual clarity compared with Ashmole's own dreams.
His whole psychological situation then almost demanded the presence of the female, because usually these individuation processes are accompanied by the relationship with a soror mystica.
That is the reason why a number of alchemists are reported to have been related to what I call an anima figure; like Nicolas Flamel and Peronelle, Zosimos and Theosebeia, Mrs. Atwood and her father, John Pordage and Jane Lead, etc.
The royal nuptial in alchemy represents such a relationship.
As it is a common experience that couples have often remarkable coincidences of thought, so they have the same parallelism in dreams.
They can even exchange dreams.
One finds the same between parents and their children.
I have observed the case of a man who had no dreams, but his nine-year-old son had all his father's dreams which I could analyse for the benefit of the father.
In the course of this work the father began to dream and the son ceased to have such adult dreams.
This peculiar phenomenon is at the base of Rhine's famous ESP experiments, as you know.
Such facts point to the relativity of space in the unconscious.
I'm glad to know that my supposition of Lilly being a magician is borne out by the facts.
The obvious identification of Ashmole with Mercury, Mercury being the arch-personification of alchemy, makes it most probable that Mercury was a symbol of the self, with. which Ashmole tried to identify.
Such an attempt, as far as it succeeds, invariably causes an inflation of the ego.
I should assume therefore that Ashmole must have shown signs of a hypertrophied ego.
The allegorical use of Mercury is indeed a symptom of Ashmole's inflation.
Thank you for your explanation about the Negative Oath.
Unfortunately I don't possess a copy of Ashmole's Fasciculus Chemicus.
I only have the Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum.
Your proposition that I should write a paper about Ashmole's dreams is tempting.
I really shouldn't accept it, because I have to be very careful not to overwork and I have to take care of a great amount of mental work already.
But I will consider it, without giving you a formal promise, however, if you don't mind.
Travelling is a somewhat complicated matter for me, unfortunately, and it is not likely that I shall ever go to England again.
But if you should come to Switzerland I would be most interested to see your material.
Thank you again for all the useful information!
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 62-64.

Here are a few Jung-Hesse Letters: (2015-07-30 09:45)

[Carl Jung's letter to Hermann Hesse on "Demian."]
1. To Hermann Hesse
Dear Herr Hesse, 3 December 1919
I must send you my most cordial thanks for your masterly as well as veracious book: Demian.
I know it is very immodest and officious of me to break through your pseudonym; but, while reading the book, I had the feeling that it must somehow have reached me via Lucerne.
Although I failed to recognize you in the Sinclair sketches in the Neue Zurcher Zeitung.
I always wondered what sort of person Sinclair must be, because his psychology seemed to me so remarkable.
Your book came at a time when, once again, I was oppressed by the darkened consciousness of modern man, and by his hopeless bigotry, as Sinclair was by little Knauer.
Hence your book hit me like the beam of a lighthouse on a stormy night.
A good book, like every proper human life, must have an ending.
Yours has the best possible ending, where everything that has gone before runs truly to its end, and everything with which the book began begins over again-with the birth and awakening of the new man.
The Great Mother is impregnated by the loneliness of him that seeks her.
In the shell burst she bears the "old" man into death, and implants in the new the everlasting monad, the mystery of individuality.
And when the renewed man reappears the mother reappears too-in a woman on this earth.
I could tell you a little secret about Demian of which you became the witness, but whose meaning you have concealed from the reader and perhaps also from yourself.
I could give you some very satisfying information about this, since I have long been a good friend of Demian's and he has recently initiated me into his private affairs-under the seal of deepest secrecy.

But time will bear out these hints for you in a singular way.
I hope you will not think I am trying to make myself interesting by mystery-mongering; my amor fati is too sacred to me for that.
I only wanted, out of gratitude, to send you a small token of my great respect for your fidelity and veracity, without which no man can have such apt intuitions.
You may even be able to guess what passage in your book I mean.
I immediately ordered a copy of your book for our Club library.
It is sound in wind and limb and points the way.
I beg you not to think ill of me for my invasion. No one knows of it.
Very sincerely and with heartfelt thanks,
C.G. Jung C.G. Jung, Letters Volume 1, Pages 573-574.
2. To Hermann Hesse
Dear Herr Hesse, 1 October 1934
Best thanks for your detailed answer!
Naturally we shouldn't quarrel about words.
Nevertheless I would note in all humility that the expression "sublimation" is not appropriate in the case of the artist because with him it is not a question of transfom1ing a primary instinct but rather of a primary instinct (the artistic instinct) gripping the whole personality to such an extent that all other instincts are in abeyance, thus giving rise to the work of divine perfection.
Excuse this terminological hair-splitting, but we have to deal with a wicked world in which innumerable flies get caught in the cobwebs of concepts.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung C.G. Jung, Letters Volume 1, Pages 173-174.
3. To: Hermann Hesse 28 January 1922
Heartiest thanks for you beautiful poems, and at the same time congratulations on their publication.
I see from the papers that you have given the Hottingen Literature Fraternitya touch of the horrors with your far-ranging autobiography.
Who is the literary reporter on the N.Z.Z. anyway?
He is the possessor of a truly lamentable style.
In my thoughts I bad to pity you for this, but I hope the sun of Montagnola will rapidly bleach away these cisalpine vulgarities.
For a person like me, who never reads poetry, your poems are simply beautiful.
With best greetings,
Sincerely,
Jung
4. To Hermann Hesse
Dear Herr Hesse, 18 September 1934
Thank you for your letter and enclosures.
I am much amused that you think I have "become professoria."
Evidently have success fully deceived even your eagle eye.
One must have a good exterior "dans ce meilleur des mondes possibles"; for there is no point in having none.
Pearls should not be cast before swine.
You do me an injustice with your remarks on sublimation.
It is not from resentment that I fight this idea, but from copious experience of patients (and doctors too) who shirk the difficulty every time and "sublimate," i.e., simply repress.
Sublimatio is part of the royal art where the true gold is made.
Of this Freud knows nothing, worse still, he barricades all the paths that could lead to the true sublimatio.
This is just about the opposite of what Freud understands by sublimation.

It is not a voluntary and forcible channeling of instinct into a spurious field of application, but an alchymical transformation for which fire and the black prima materia are needed.
Sublimatio is a great mystery. Freud has appropriated this concept and usurped it for the sphere of the will and the bourgeois, rationalistic ethos.
Anathema sit! But who understands any of these things today?
Therefore they remain in darkness,
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
5. To Hermann Hesse
Dear Herr Hesse, 27 October 1936
Best thanks for kindly sending me ”Josef Knecht’s Dream.”
Is it a dream? And who is the dreamer?
Excuse this question of a psychologist who, deeply impressed by the beauty of the form and content, cannot suppress his curiosity.
But you need not answer the question.
With best greetings,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
6. To Emanuel Maier
Dear Professor Maier, 24 March 1950
I must apologize for the long delay in answering your letter of January 16th.
I’m a very busy man and suffer from an overwhelming correspondence which I’m hardly able to cope with.
I know Hesse’s work and I know him personally.
I knew the psychiatrist who treated him.
He died several years ago.
Through him Hesse received some influences originating in my work (which show for instance in Demian, Siddhartha, and Steppenwolf).
It was about that time (1916) that I made Hesse’s personal acquaintance.
The psychiatrist was Dr. J. B. Lang.
He was a very curious, though extremely learned man, who had studied oriental languages (Hebrew, Arabic, and Syrian) and was particularly interested in Gnostic speculation.
He got from me a considerable amount of knowledge concerning Gnosticism which he also transmitted to Hesse.
From this material he wrote his Demian.
The origin of Siddhartha and Steppenwolf is of a more hidden nature.
They are-to a certain extent the direct or indirect results of certain talks I had with Hesse.
I’m unfortunately unable to say how much he was conscious of the hints and implications which I let him have.
I’m not in a position to give you full information, since my knowledge is strictly professional.
I have never done any systematic work on any of Hesse’s novels.
It would be, I admit, an interesting psychological study, particularly from the standpoint of my theoretical conceptions.
It is possible for anyone sufficiently aware of my work to make the necessary applications.
Unfortunately my time doesn’t allow me to go into detail, because this would amount to a new dissertation which would demand an extra amount of work which I’m not able to produce.
I should be very much interested to know about the results of your researches.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung

7. To Hermann Hesse
Dear Herr Hesse, 19 August 1950
Among the many messages and signs my 75th birthday brought me, it was your greeting that surprised and delighted me most.
I am especially grateful for your Morgenlandfahrt,l which I have set aside to read at a quiet moment.
Since my birthday, however, this quiet moment still hasn't arrived, for I am swamped with a flood of letters and visitors beyond my control.
At my age it means going "slow and with care," nor is my working capacity what it was, especially when you have all sorts of things on your programme which you want to bring to the light of day.
I have made a late start with them, which may well be due to the difficulty of the themes that have dropped into my head.
Allow me to reciprocate your gift with a specimen of my latest publications bordering on the domain of literature.
Meanwhile you too have moved up into the higher age bracket and so will be in a position to empathize with my preoccupations.
With best thanks,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung

8. From Hermann Hesse to Emanuel Maier
Dear Mr. Maier, (? April 1950]
Being a friend of discretion, I have not opened Jung's letter.
In 1916 I underwent an analysis with a doctor friend of mine who was in part a pupil of Jung's.
At that time I became acquainted with Jung's early work, the Wandlungen der Libido, which made an impression on me.
I also read later books by Jung, but only until around 1922 because thereafter analysis did not greatly interest me.
I have always had respect for Jung, but his works did not make such strong impressions on me as did those of Freud.
Jung will already have written you that, in connection with an evening of readings I gave as the guest of Jung's Zurich Club, I also had several analytic sessions with him around 1921.
Then too I got a nice impression of him, though at that time I began to realize that, for analysts, a genuine relationship to art is unattainable: they lack the organ for it.
With kind regards,
9. H . HESSE
From Hermann Hesse to Hugo and Emmy Ball Zurich, (? April 1921]
I'm up and down.
City and work are very tiring, but I live in a very beautiful spot high up near the forest on the Zurichberg, and occasionally I see dear people.
But my psychoanalysis is giving me a great deal of trouble, and often Klingsor feels old and incorrigible, the summer is no longer his.
I shall stay here still longer, the fruit I have bitten into has to be eaten to the full. Dr. Jung impresses me very much.
I am so glad to know that waiting for me down in the Ticino are not just chestnut forests and typewriter, but also dear friends.
I send greetings to both of you in Agnuzzo and to forest and lake from the bottom of my heart.
Yours, H. HESSE

I therefore don't quite understand how you can smell "gnostic" arrogance in this attitude. (2015-07-30 10:20)

To Fritz Buri
Dear Professor Buri, 5 May 1952
Since you were kind enough to send me your review, I am taking the liberty of going more closely into a few points in it.
As you know, I apply my method not only to my patients but also to all historical and contemporary products of the mind.
With regard to Yahweh's "cure" it should be noted that anything that happens in our consciousness has a retroactive effect on the unconscious archetype.
Submission to the archetype that appears as an unjust God must bring about a change in this "God."
And this, as subsequent history proves, is what actually happened.
Yahweh's injustice and amorality were known to the Jews and were a source of disquiet and distress.
(Cf. the drastic passages cited in Aion, pp. 93ff)
The transformation of the God of the Old Testament into the God of the New is not my invention but was known long ago in the Middle Ages.

I am in truth concerned with the ”depths of the human psyche,” as I expressly point out.
But I cannot make statements about a metaphysical God, nor do I imagine that with the term ”God” I have ”posited” anything metaphysical.
I speak always and exclusively only of the anthropomorphic God-image.
The verbal inspiration of the Bible seems to me an implausible and unprovable hypothesis.
I do not by any means dispute the existence of a metaphysical God, but I allow myself to put human statements under the microscope.
Had I criticized the chronique scandaleuse of Olympus this would have caused an uproar 2500 years ago.
Today nobody would bat an eyelid.
I do not pretend to know anything tenable or provable about a metaphysical God.
I therefore don’t quite understand how you can smell ”gnostic” arrogance in this attitude.
In strictest contrast to Gnosticism and theology, I confine myself to the psychology of an theriomorphic ideas and have never maintained that I possess the slightest trace of metaphysical knowledge.
Just as the physicist regards the atom as a model, I regard archetypal ideas as sketches for the purpose of visualizing the unknown background.
One would hardly call a physicist a Gnostic because of his atomic models.
Nor should one want to know better than God, who himself regrets his actions and thereby plainly says what he himself thinks of them.
Anyway I am very grateful to you for having expounded my shocking thought-processes so objectively-a rare experience for me!
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on his Personal Mother Complex. (2015-07-30 16:49)

To Dorothee Hoch
Dear Dr. Hoch, 28 May 1952
The conjecture that I have succumbed to a personal complex does indeed spring to mind when one knows that I am a clergyman's son.
However, I had a good personal relationship with my father, so no "father complex" of the ordinary sort.
True, I didn't like theology because it set my father problems which he couldn't solve and which I felt unjustified.
On the other hand, I grant you my personal mother complex.
It is always a risky business to attribute unproven personal motives to an opponent before one has sufficiently weighed or understood the nature of his argument.
It does not seem to be quite clear to you that I am dealing with ideas and images.
God-images, for instance, can be discussed.
I consider it unfortunate that most theologians believe they have named God when they say "God."
The rabbi, for instance, hardly means the Christian God, the Protestant definitely the God who was incarnate, the Catholic the God who has revealed the Assumptio B.V.M. to the Church.
Under these rather distressing circumstances the empiricist, regardless of his religious convictions, has no choice but to deal with the ideas of God, without deciding the metaphysical issue.
He makes no decisions based on faith.
Ideas of God are first of all myths, statements about things that are philosophically and scientifically indeterminable; that is, they are psychological objects which are amenable to discussion.
Anyone who holds that God is named and expressed when he says "God" is hypostatizing Yahweh, Allah, Quetzalcoatl, Jupiter, etc.
That puts an end to all discussion.
All religious objects become taboo.
Not only can Christians not agree among themselves but the denominationally uncommitted layman dare not open his mouth because of the danger of blasphemy.
As a psychologist I have to speak of ideas professionally and if necessary criticize them when they behave too objectionably.
I don't imagine that by so doing I have affected God; I merely try to put my own ideas in order.
I can think about my ideas but not about a metaphysical God who is beyond the range of human understanding.
I move exclusively in the domain of psychological empiricism, not in that of denominational metaphysics.
I don't turn Christ into "the animus" (cf. Aion, ch. V), but Christ can be brought into relation with the concept of the "self," as the symbolism proves.
The "black son" is definitely not "harmless," as you would infer from my Job book.
Everyone is reckless who unleashes a world catastrophe, whatever he may imagine by this.
I know no "most perfect" man but only a relatively complete one.
I have never asserted that God is only an intrapsychic potency.
If I say I am a captain in the Swiss Army Medical Corps, as I have a perfect right to do, you will hardly conclude that this is my only qualification.
I share your opinion entirely that man lives wholly when, and only when, he is related to God, to that which steps up to him and determines his destiny.
My documentation is concerned with the historical development of ideas in Western culture.
It cannot be disputed that the Book of Enoch and other apocrypha were read in the Near East and were not without influence.
The same is true of ancient Egyptian influences as well as of Catholic dogmas.
You ought to have noticed that I don't go in for dogmatics but submit the psychology of Western ideas of God to critical discussion.
Presumably you won't think I am criticizing the metaphysical God?
After all, we are not living in the Middle Ages when people still believed they could do God an injury.
The Protestants will, I hope, not fall into the error of thinking they are the only Christians in the world?
Every real Christian must recognize that he lives in a schism.

One is not just a Protestant or a Catholic but a human being with paganism still ingrained in his very bones.
Hence I write of universally Christian ideas and do not touch the-for meinaccessible question of metaphysical truth.
I don't know, either, why you want to prove that an "irruption into myth" has occurred.
It doesn't look to me that way at all.
The myth goes on, now as before, as the Assumptio proves, which obviously belongs to the Christian world of ideas and not to that of Islam or Buddhism.
If you will conscientiously reread what I have said about individuation you cannot possibly conclude that I mean Nirvana or that I overlook the Resurrection.
It would be too cheap to credit me with such stupidity.
I understand why you are annoyed.
It really is very distressing that the majority of educated people today eschew talk of religious matters.
I hold theologians responsible for this up to a point, because they obstinately refuse to admit that they, as much as the rest of us, are talking of anthropomorphic ideas about which we do not know how exactly or inexactly they depict a possible metaphysical fact.
In this way they slaughter every discussion from the start, so that one is obliged to avoid, politely, any conversation with theologians, very much to the detriment of the religious life!
What good is it to anyone when a theologian "confesses" that he has "met the living Lord"?
The wretched layman can only turn green with envy that such an experience never happened to him.
In my practice I often had to give elementary school lessons in the history of religion in order to eliminate, for a start, the disgust and nausea people felt for religious matters who had dealt all their lives only with confession-mongers and preachers.
The man of today wants to understand and not be preached at.
The need for understanding and discussion is as great as it is unconscious (at least in most cases).
That is why my little Job book has the (unexpected) effect of getting people who know the Bible only from hearsay to turn to it with curiosity.
It is of burning interest for them to hear something understandable about religion, so much so that often I am hard put to it to draw a distinction between myself and a director of conscience.
For me personally religion is a matter of first-rate importance; that is why I accept all the odium that is heaped upon the critic of tabooed area.
And that is also why I disturb the sleep of the just, who won't take the trouble to rouse themselves out of their subjectivism, Their preacher role, and their irresponsibility in the face of the demands of the time.
It would perhaps be worth the effort to make Christianity comprehensible to educated people today instead of leaving this urgent task to the psychiatrist.
To this end I have set forth in my little book what a thoughtful contemporary can read out of the Christian tradition.
Let him forget the arrogance of clerics who deem themselves in possession of the sole truth and who contrive to spread the schism of Christendom still further, and reflect on the only question of importance: What is religion all about?
Only a fraction of white humanity is Christian, and yet Christianity indulges in the luxury of not having any truck with human intelligence.
I don't want to annoy people needlessly, but in this case my conscience compelled me to say out loud what so many think in silence.
I hope I have started the ball rolling.
"Il faut casser les oeufs pour faire une o melette!"
I enclose my reply to M. Buber, who also thinks he can talk of God without saying which, and without proving that this is the only right one.
These absurdities have to be cleared up for once.
This all-too-long letter may clarify for you the standpoint of an empiricist who is doing his best to understand the language of theologians.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 65-68.

Carl Jung: Taken in the spirit of the age, the Malleus Maleficarum is not so gruesome. (2015-07-31 06:17)

Dear Herr Rosen, 16 June 1952
Taken in the spirit of the age, the Malleus Maleficarum is not so gruesome.
It was an instrument whereby it was supposed that one of those great psychic epidemics could be stamped out.
For that age it represented a work of enlightenment which was, admittedly, prosecuted with very drastic measures.
The psychology of the witch-hunting epidemic has never been worked out properly.
There are only rather inept opinions about it.
It can only be understood in the total context of the religious problem of the time and in particular in the context of the German psyche under mediaeval conditions.
The solution of this problem makes unusual demands on our knowledge of the spiritual undercurrents which preceded the Reformation.
Although I have some knowledge of them I would scarcely venture to tackle the problem.
For a German it must be quite particularly difficult because it is connected with specifically German psychological Assumptions.
You can get some idea of them by comparing the women in German literature with those in French and English literature during the past 200 years.
The Rhine forms not only a political frontier but also a psychological one.

Yours very truly,

Carl Jung: “The realm of the psyche is immeasurably great and filled with living reality.” (2015-08-01 05:27)

To R. J. Zwi Werblowsky
Dear Dr. Werblowsky, 17 June 1952
Many thanks for kindly sending me your critical reflections.
For me they are valuable and interesting as the reactions of an (almost) non-participant.
From touching lightly on psychology you have already acquired a ”golden finger” and must now give forthright answers before the world.
This happens even with people who have said ”good day” to me only once.
I don’t know whether I ought to be glad that my desperate attempts to do justice to the reality of the psyche are accounted ”ingenious ambiguity.”
At least it acknowledges my efforts to reflect, as best I can, the ”ingenious ambiguity” of the psyche.
For me the psyche is an almost infinite phenomenon.
I absolutely don’t know what it is in itself and know only very vaguely what it is not.
Also, I know only to a limited degree what is individual about the psyche and what is universal.
It seems to me a sort of all-encompassing system of relationships, in which ”material” and ”spiritual” are primarily designations for potentialities that transcend consciousness.
I can say of nothing that it is ”only psychic,” for everything in my immediate experience is psychic in the first place.
I live in a ”perceptual world” but not in a self-subsistent one.
The latter is real enough but we have only indirect information about it.
This is as true of outer objects as of ”inner” ones, of material existents and the archetypal factors we could also call €t87J.
No matter what I speak about, the two worlds interpenetrate in it more or less. This is unavoidable, for our language is a faithful reflection of the psychic phenomenon with its dual aspect ”perceptual” and ”imaginary.”
When I say ”God” the dual aspect of the ens absolutum and the hydrogen atom (or particle + wave) is already implicit in it.
I try to speak ”neutrally.”
(Prof. Pauli would say: the ”neutral language” between ”physical” and ”archetypal.”)
The language I speak must be ambiguous, must have two meanings, in order to do justice to the dual aspect of our psychic nature.
I strive quite consciously and deliberately for ambiguity of expression, because it is superior to unequivocalness and reflects the nature of life.
My whole temperament inclines me to be very unequivocal indeed.
That is not difficult, but it would be at the cost of truth.
I purposely allow all the overtones and undertones to be heard, partly because they are there anyway, and partly because they give a fuller picture of reality.
Unequivocalness makes sense only in establishing facts but not in interpreting them; for ”meaning” is not a tautology but always includes more in itself than the concrete object of which it is predicated.
I define myself as an empiricist, for after all I have to be something respectable.
You yourself admit that I am a poor philosopher, and naturally I don’t like being something inferior.
As an empiricist I have at least accomplished something.
If a man is a good shoemaker and knows he is one, people will not inscribe on his tombstone that he was a bad Hat-maker because he once made an unsatisfactory hat.
I am, more specifically, simply a psychiatrist, for my essential problem, to which all my efforts are directed, is psychic disturbance: its phenomenology, aetiology, and teleology.
Everything else is secondary for me.
I do not feel called upon to found a religion, nor to proclaim my belief in one.
I am not engaged in philosophy, but merely in thinking within the framework of the special task that is laid upon me: to be a proper psychiatrist, a healer of the soul.
This is what I have discovered myself to be, and this is how I function as a member of society.
Nothing would seem more nonsensical and fruitless for me than to speculate about things I cannot prove, let alone know.

I am quite prepared to grant that others may know more about them than I.
I do not know, for example, how God could ever be experienced apart from human experience.
If I do not experience him, how can I say that he exists?
But my experience is extremely small and narrow, and so, in spite of oppressive intimations of the infinite, what I experience is also small and in the likeness of man-a fact which emerges clearly when one tries to express it.
In our experience everything gets tainted with the ambiguity of the psyche.
The greatest experience is also the smallest and narrowest, and for that reason one hesitates to boast about it, let alone philosophize about it.
One is after all too small and too incompetent to be able to afford any such arrogance.
That is why I prefer ambiguous language, since it does equal justice to the subjectivity of the archetypal idea and to the autonomy of the archetype. ”God,” for example, is on the one hand an inexpressible ens potentissimum, and on the other hand an exceedingly inadequate token and expression of human impotence and perplexity-an experience, therefore, of the most paradoxical nature.
The realm of the psyche is immeasurably great and filled with living reality.
At its brink lies the secret of matter and of spirit.
I do not know whether this schema means anything to you or not.
For me it is the frame within which I can express my experience.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 69-71.

Carl Jung's review of Upton Sinclair's "A Personal Jesus." (2015-08-01 06:02)

To Upton Sinclair
Dear Mr. Sinclair, 3 November 1952
I have read your book A Personal Jesus carefully and with great interest.
It is certainly of great merit and will help your public to appreciate a religious figure from a new angle.

I was curious to see in which way you would tackle such a difficult task as the reconstruction of a Jesus biography.
Being the son of a parson, and having grown up in an atmosphere steeped in theology, I learnt about a number of attempts such as those of Strauss, Renan, Moore etc., and in later years I was an ardent reader of A. Schweitzer's work.
I have repeatedly, i.e., at different phases of my life, tried to realize what kind of personality-explaining the whole effect of its existence could be reconstructed from the scanty historical evidence offered by the New Testament. Having had a good deal of psychological experience, I should have been sufficiently equipped for such a task, but in the end I came to the conclusion that, owing on the one hand to the paucity of historical data, and on the other to the abundance of mythological admixtures, I was unable to reconstruct a personal character free from rather fatal contradictions.
You have certainly succeeded in presenting an acceptable picture of a certain Jesus.
I should venture to say that it is even a likely portrait of such a presumably unique character.
It may even be convincing to a modern American mind, but seen from the standpoint of a European scientist, your modus procedendi seems to be a bit too selective; that is, you exclude too many authentic statements for no other reason than that they do not fit in with your premises, for instance, predestination and esoterism, which cannot be excluded for textual reasons.
They cannot be dismissed as mere interpolations.
There is also incontestable textual evidence for the fact that Jesus foresaw his tragic end.
Moreover, you exclude practically the whole overwhelming amount of eschatology, the authenticity of which is undeniable whether it offends our reason or not.
Then you paint a portrait; though of the highest literary quality, it is subject to the same critique you apply to John the Evangelist (p. 15 5 seq.): "We are going to learn what this Hellenized intellectual thinks about Jesus."
We learn from your book what a modern American writer "thinks about Jesus."
This is not meant to be derogatory; on the contrary, it merely shows my perplexity.
Surely we can draw a portrait of Jesus that does not offend our rationalism, but it is done at the expense of our loyalty to the textual authority.
As a matter of fact, we can omit nothing from the authentic text.
We cannot create a true picture of Hermetic philosophy in the IVth century if we dismiss half of the libelli contained in the Corpus Hermeticum.
The New Testament as it stands is the "Corpus Christianum," which is to be accepted as a whole or not at all.
We can dismiss nothing that stands up to a reasonable philological critique.
We cannot suppress any single contradiction because we have no anterior or better or more reliable evidence.
We have to take the whole and make the best of it.
The "Corpus Christianum" tells the story of a God-Man and of the various ways in which His life and teaching were understood.
If Jesus was, as you portray Him, a rationally understandable teacher of fine morals and a devout believer in a good Father-God, why should the Gospels be stuffed with miracle stories and He Himself saddled with esoteric and eschatological statements, showing Him in the role of a Son-God and cosmological saviour?
If Jesus had indeed been nothing but a great teacher hopelessly mistaken in His messianic expectations, we should be at a complete loss in understanding His historical effect, which is so clearly visible in the New Testament.
If, on the other hand, we cannot understand by rational means what a God-Man is, then we don't know what the New Testament is all about.
But it would be just our task to understand what they meant by a "God-Man."
You give an excellent picture of a possible religious teacher, but you give us no understanding of what the New Testament tries to tell, namely the life, fate, and effect of a God-Man, whom we are asked to believe to be a divine revelation.
These are the reasons why I should propose to deal with the Christian Urphiinomen in a somewhat different way.
I think we ought to admit that we don't understand the riddle of the New Testament.
With our present means we cannot unravel a rational story from it unless we interfere with the texts.
If we take this risk we can read various stories into the texts and we can even give them a certain amount of probability:

1. Jesus is an idealistic, religious teacher of great wisdom, who knows that His teaching would make the necessary impression only if He were willing to sacrifice His life for it.
Thus He forces the issue in complete foreknowledge of the facts which He intends to happen.
2. Jesus is a highly strung, forceful personality, forever at variance with His surroundings, and possessed of a terrific will to power.
Yet being of superior intelligence, He perceives that it would not do to assert it on the worldly plane of political sedition as so many similar zealots in His days had done.
He rather prefers the role of the old prophet and reformer of His people, and He institutes a spiritual kingdom instead of an unsuccessful political rebellion.
For this purpose He adopts not only the messianic Old Testament expectations, but also the then popular ”Son of Man” figure in the Book of Enoch.
But meddling with the political whirlpool in Jerusalem, He gets Himself caught in its intrigues and meets a tragic end with a full recognition of His failure.
3. Jesus is an incarnation of the Father-God. As a God-Man He walks the earth drawing to Himself the iKA£KroF of His Father, Announcing the message of universal salvation and being mostly misunderstood. As the crowning of His short career, He performs the supreme sacrifice in offering Himself up as the perfect host, and thus redeems mankind from eternal perdition.
You can make out a pretty good case from the texts for each of these three highly different variants, with the necessary omissions and violations of scriptural authority.
The first and second variants are ”rational,” i.e., they happen to be within the frame of our contemporary understanding, while the third is definitely outside it; although up to about zoo years ago nobody thought so.
If we avoid violations of the authentic texts, we have to take into consideration the three possibilities, and perhaps some more, and then we must try to find out which theory would fit the complete picture.
Since the Gospels do not give, and do not even intend to give, a biography of the Lord, the mere reconstruction of a life of Jesus could never explain the picture given by the texts.
The little we know of His biography must needs be supplemented by a very careful study of the peculiar mental and spiritual atmosphere of the time and place of the gospel writers.
People at that time were highly Hellenized . Jesus Himself was under the influence of eschatological literature, as v1C.., lw8pw7rov8 bears out. (Cf. also the synagogue of the Dura Europos, which throws a new light on Jewish syncretism.)
That we call ”Jesus Christ” is-I am afraid-much less a biographical problem than a social, i.e., collective, phenomenon, created by the coincidence of an ill-defined yet remarkable personality with a highly peculiar Zeitgeist that has its own no less remarkable psychology.
I must, dear Sir, apologize for the length of my letter.
Having myself given a great deal of thought to the problem of Jesus, and having also done some spadework in this field, I felt I had to give you an account of how and where I slipped up in trying to cope with the challenge of the Christian enigma.
Sure enough, we must believe in Reason.
But it should not prevent us from recognizing a mystery when we meet one.
It seems to me that no rational biography could explain one of the most ”irrational” effects ever observed in the history of man.
I believe that this problem can only be approached through his history and comparative psychology of symbols.
Attempts in this direction have already yielded some interesting results. (Unfortunately there are no English publications yet to which I could refer.)
I am deeply obliged to you for your kind attention and I remain,
Yours sincerely,

[Carl Jung: “Your dream about the word ”Evil” is extraordinarily illuminating and, in a way, most unusual.”]
To Barbara Robb
Dear Mrs. Robb, 19 November 1952
Thank you very much for your kind letter which has given me some valuable information.
My discussion of the privatio boni with Victor was a very unsatisfactory experience.
I am glad, therefore, to have some further news about this problem, this time apparently more positive, if I may assume that the flaw demonstrated in the doctrine of the privatio boni has become visible to Victor too.
Your dream about the word ”Evil” is extraordinarily illuminating and, in a way, most unusual.
It contains in a nutshell practically everything you can say about the problem of evil.
It is certainly worth remembering.
The second dream contains an equally excellent demonstration of the dynamic structure of the moral opposites in general.
Unfortunately, my illness has nothing to do with the weather, or only indirectly, inasmuch as the brilliant summer seduced me into an activity surpassing my actual strength.
I am just about to recover, but slowly, from my prostration.
Thank you again for your kind information,
I remain,
Yours cordially,

Carl Jung on Faith in a Personal Meeting with Christ. (2015-08-01 12:19)

To Dorothee Hoch
Dear Dr. Hoch, 3 July 1952
I am very grateful that this time you have met my endeavour with more friendliness and understanding.
I certainly admit that personal motives creep in everywhere in an exasperating way, but I still think it is a bit too glib to suspect an objective argument of personal resentment without closer and surer knowledge of the circumstances. Only at the end of a discussion, when all objective elements have run out, may one hazard the question whether personal motives have also had a hand in it.
But I won't make any annotations to Knigge's Umgang mit Menschen.
You are surprised at my reaction to your avowed faith in a personal meeting with Christ.
I thought I ought not to conceal from you that such an avowal has a thoroughly intimidating effect on many people, because they feel (with good reason, I think) that this only happens to one of the elect, who has been singled out from the human community of the unblest, the wayward, the unbelievers, the doubters and the God-forsaken, and, especially if they are religious people, it makes them feel inferior.
Many theologians make themselves unpopular on that account and so make the doctor, who is expected to have a better understanding of the ordinary, uninitiated person, appear as a more desirable proposition.
I do, to be sure, maintain that the Bible was written by man and is but modern man?
He has no inkling of the mysteries, which anyway are discredited by Protestant theology, because for it there is only one truth, and whatever else God may have done for man is mere bungling.
Does modern man know what ”water” and ”spirit” signify?

Water is below, heavy and material; wind above and the ”spiritual” breath body. The man of antiquity understood this as a clash of opposites, a complexio oppositorum, and felt this conflict to be so impossible that he equated matter with evil outright.
Christ forces man into the impossible conflict.
He took himself with exemplary seriousness and lived his life to the bitter end, regardless of human convention and in opposition to his own lawful tradition, as the worst heretic in the eyes of the Jews and a madman in the eyes of his family.
But we?
We imitate Christ and hope he will deliver us from our own fate.
Like little lambs we follow the shepherd, naturally to good pastures.
No talk at all of uniting our Above and Below!
On the contrary, Christ and his cross deliver us from our conflict, which we simply leave alone.
We are Pharisees, faithful to law and tradition, we flee heresy and are mindful only of the imitatio Christi but not of our own reality which is laid upon us, the union of opposites in ourselves, preferring to believe that Christ has already achieved this for us.
Instead of bearing ourselves, i.e., our own cross, ourselves, we load Christ with our unresolved conflicts.
We ”place ourselves under his cross,” but by golly not under our own.
Anyone who does this is a heretic, self-redeemer, ”psychoanalyst” and God knows what.
The cross of Christ was borne by himself and was his.
To put oneself under somebody else’s cross, which has already been carried by him, is certainly easier than to carry your own cross amid the mockery and contempt of the world.
That way you remain nicely ensconced in tradition and are praised as devout.
This is well-organized Pharisaism and highly un-Christian.
Whoever imitates Christ and has the cheek to want to take Christ’s cross on himself when he can’t even carry his own has in my view not yet learnt the ABC of the Christian message.
Have your congregation understood that they must close their ears to the traditional teachings and go through the darknesses of their own souls and set aside everything in order to become that which every individual bears in himself as his individual task, and that no one can take this burden from him?
We continually pray that ”this cup may pass from us” and not harm us.
Even Christ did so, but without success.
Yet we use Christ to secure this success for ourselves.
For all these reasons theology wants to know nothing of psychology, because through it we could discover our own cross.
But we only want to talk of Christ’s cross, and how splendidly his crucifixion has smoothed the way for us and solved our conflicts.
We might also discover, among other things, that in every feature Christ’s life is a prototype of individuation and hence cannot be imitated: one can only live one’s own life totally in the same way with all the consequences this entails.
This is hard and must therefore be prevented.
How this is done is shown among other things by the following example.
A devout professor of theology (i .e., a lamb of Christ) once publicly rebuked me for having said ”in flagrant contradiction to the word of the Lord” that it is unethical to ”remain” a child.
The ”Christian” ought to remain sitting on his father’s knee and leave the odious task of individuation to dear little Jesus.
Thus naively, but with unconscious design, the meaning of the gospel is subverted, and instead of catechizing ourselves on the meaning of Christ’s life we prefer, in ostensible agreement with the word of the Lord, to remain infantile and not responsible for ourselves.
Thus an exemplary 8t8auKai\o> roii ’Iupa©\ who can’t even read the New Testament properly.
No one but me protested because it suits everybody’s book.
This is only one of many examples of the way we are cheated in all godliness.

Without anybody noticing it, Protestantism has become a Judaism redivivus.
Denominationalism has likewise become a flight from the conflict: people don't want to be Christians anymore because otherwise they would be sitting between two stools in the middle of the schism of the Church.
Allegiance to a particular creed is-heaven be praised!-unambiguous, and so they can skulk round the schism with a good conscience and fight "manfully" for a one-sided belief, the other fellow alas-being always in the wrong.
The fact that I as a Christian struggle to unite Catholicism and Protestantism within myself is chalked up against me in true Pharisaic fashion as blatant proof of lack of character.
That psychology is needed for such an undertaking seems to be a nuisance of the first order.
The resistance to and devaluation of the soul as "only psychic" has become a yardstick for Pharisaic hypocrisy.
Yet people should be glad that dogmatic ideas have psychological foundations.
If they hadn't, they would remain eternally alien to us and finally wither away, which they are already doing very speedily in Protestantism.
But that is what people unconsciously want, because then they wouldn't be reminded of their own cross and could talk all the more uninhibitedly about Christ's cross, which takes them away from their own reality, willed by God himself.
Therefore, by entrenching themselves behind a creed, they calmly perpetuate the hellish scandal that the so-called Christians cannot reach agreement even among themselves.
Even if you thought there is anything to my reflections you could hardly preach a sermon about them to your congregation.
This "cross" would presumably be a bit too heavy.
But Christ accepted a cross that cost him his life.
It is fairly easy to live a praiseworthy truth, but difficult to hold one's own as an individual against a collective and be found unpraiseworthy.
Is it clear to your congregation that Christ may possibly mean just this?
These reflections came to me as I read the sermon you have kindly placed at my disposal.
I was particularly affected by your thesis of "total surrender."
Is it clear to you what that means: absolute exposure?
A fate without if's and but's, with no assurance that it will turn out harmlessly, for then one would have ventured nothing and risked nothing for God's sake.
It was these rather sombre undertones, so true to reality, that I missed in your sermon.
With best greetings,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 74-78.

Carl Jung: An old German mystic has said: ”God is a sigh in our souls.” (2015-08-01 12:31)

To L. Stehli
Dear Frau Stehli, 31 October 1952
Were I not old and ill I would take the trouble to explain to you personally why human ideas of God are not necessarily right.

7058

God is something unknowable. An old German mystic has said: ”God is a sigh in our souls.”
Paul, as you know, said something similar.
My personal religious convictions are not shaken in the slightest by the fearful contradictions in the Biblical texts.
I just wanted to tell you this to set your mind at rest.
With kind regards,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 86-87.

Carl Jung: To be sure ”Christ” gave the myth a new meaning for the man of antiquity. (2015-08-01 17:15)

To Dorothee Hoch
Dear Dr. Hoch, 23 September 1952
You are quite right: in my last letter I said very much more than was warranted by your sermon.
The theologians pick on me so much and misunderstand me so dismally that it would be unnatural if I didn’t let off steam occasionally.
But it was not meant personally.
If I stress the historical evolution of Christianity this does not mean that I overlook the news it brings.
I only want to smooth the transition so that the meaning of the message can be understood.
People are so different!
Recently an elderly Swiss clergyman wrote me a touching letter emphasizing that through my writings I had at last opened the way to the Bible for him.
I certainly never expected anything like that.

But you can see from this that the figurative language of the Bible is not understood even by a clergyman.
No doubt the archetypes are present everywhere, but there is also a widespread resistance to this ”mythology.”
That is why even the gospel has to be ”demythologized.”
To be sure we are dealing with the meaning and content of mythologems.
To be sure ”Christ” gave the myth a new meaning for the man of antiquity.
But when we still go on stressing the newness 2000 years later, we must point out what exactly is the news for us, which we haven’t yet heard and understood. Then we could feel like primitive Christians again.
But we hear only the same old words and, like Bultmann, get sick of mythology.
How far is the message new for us?
How far is Christ still unknown to us?
We heard ages ago that he exists as a living person exempt from our arbitrariness, and all the rest of it.
What we need is a new point of departure, and this cannot be found without the assignment of new meaning.
The message is alive only if it creates new meaning.
I don’t believe at all that it has run dry, rather that theology has.
Just how do you make it clear to your listeners that ”the death and resurrection of Christ are their death and their resurrection”?
Aren’t you equating Christ with the self of man, and isn’t this a view which is contested when I say it?
If the death and resurrection of Christ are my death and resurrection, i.e., if a = b, then b = a .
That Christ is the self of man is implicit in the gospel, but the conclusion Christ = self has never been explicitly drawn.
This is an assignment of new meaning, a further stage in the incarnation or actualization of Christ.
You are drawing near to this insight with rapid steps; indeed, you have already voiced it.
And with it Christ becomes a formulable psychological experience: the self is a living person and has always been there.
It is an insight upon which Hindu philosophy (the equivalent of Western theology), Buddhism, Taoism, mystical Islamic sects, and Christianity are all agreed.
My psychology is a modest contribution to this illustrious assemblage, and from the Christian standpoint you have formulated the essential psychological principle in the words quoted above.
Thanks to this insight and inner experience the figure of Christ has come alive for you, and means for you an ultimate and unshakable truth, because it issues from a universally disseminated, collective archetype, which is ax£(po7rol71ro>.
Every Christian should rejoice, but I fear the theologians will make a sour face.
I, however, rejoice that the unconscious has put into your mouth the true meaning: (Jappf.m fLVO’Ta(TOV ewv (J’£(J’oO’p.lvov.
As you may know, I have written in detail about this in Aion and Answer to Job and other works.
It goes without saying that I am not of the opinion that insights which only the individual can have should be preached.
I realize that the sermon is a pressing affair for the clergyman, something he has to cope with somehow.
But his psyche is perhaps an even more pressing task, and it is of this I speak.
In this respect there is a general flight outwards, a wrinkling of the nose at ”psychology,” a terrifying ignorance of it, and the cura animarum has reached its nadir.
Instead, one goes in for missions to the heathen.
The first emissaries went into the great centres of civilization, but not to the sources of the Nile.
That came in only with monasticism, which sprang from a disgust with the civilized world from which one had dropped out.
A good example is Albert Schweitzer, who is urgently needed in Europe but prefers to be a touching saviour of savages and to hang his theology on the wall.
We have a justification for missionizing only when we have straightened ourselves out here, otherwise we are merely spreading our own disease.

How is it with God's Kingdom in Europe?
Not even savages are stupid enough not to see our lies.
Shamelessly and childishly we parade our irreconcilable schisms before the wondering eyes of our black "brethren" and preach peaceableness, brotherliness, neighbourly love, etc. etc. through the mouths of Evangelists, Lutherans, High Church, Nonconformists, Baptists, Methodists, Catholics, all of whom are resolved to the death not to communicate with their brother. Is this fulfilling God's will?
These thoughts come to me unbidden when you speak of total commitment, for instance to missionary work.
Of course people can be committed to everything and anything-even to Naziism, as we have seen.
But whether the goal presupposed by us to be "right" also corresponds to God's will is another matter.
About this only a very small, still voice within us gives us any information.
And not infrequently it contradicts our collective ideals (vide the way it called certain of the prophets!).
One of the greatest obstacles to our psychic development, it seems to me, is the drowning out of the inner voice in the interests of some collective, conventional ideal which makes us insensitive to the damage done to our own house and givers us the right to impart good advice to our neighbours.
If we go along with a so-called good cause, we can easily give ourselves the treat of not having to do something to improve our-oh so small and insignificant!-psyches.
But that the right means in the hands of the wrong man then work mischief is something nobody thinks about.
Don't you think we would have more cause to worry about the state of Christianity in Europe than about the hygienic precautions in and around Lambarene?
The first is naturally highly unpopular, but the second is exemplary idealism which guarantees a first-class good conscience and nowhere tarnishes the lordly feelings of the white man.
Please don't take my remarks personally but for what they are footnotes to the religious question of the present.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
P.S. I really owe you an explanation why it is that I bombard you with such long and repellent letters.
I have, you see, to listen to so much idiotic and negative stuff about Christianity on the one hand, and am so grotesquely misunderstood by the theologians on the other, that I do my utmost to bring my criticism to bear only when I can count on goodwill, i.e., on a truly Christian attitude which may have not a little to do with neighbourly love.
Besides that, your last letter has also moved me to show you how closely your religious views touch my own. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 83-86.

Carl Jung: It doesn’t pay not to see the dark side. (2015-08-01 17:26)

To Hans Schar
Dear Dr. Schar, 15 August 1952
Hearty thanks for kindly sending me your review of Job.
I didn’t envy you this difficult task.
But you have done it in a very objective way and have also succeeded in introducing one or two things for the fine-eared.
Your idea of my spiritual affinity or at least sympathy with Jakob Burckhardt is amazingly true.
Burckhardt’s pessimistic forebodings were undoubtedly right.
It doesn’t pay not to see the dark side.
I am glad that such a carefully balanced review got into a theological journal. It may well be the first to have found its way there.
I hear you are coming to visit me sometime in September.
All that month I shall be in Bollingen, where I can receive you at any time if you let me know a few days beforehand.

Meanwhile with kind regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 80-81.

Carl Jung: She should beware of too much activity of an extraverted kind. (2015-08-01 17:37)

To Joseph L. Henderson
Dear Henderson, 9 August 1952
Thank you for your kind letter!
I am glad to have had the chance of talking to X.
She is better ”knitted together” than I expected.
The balance is carefully yet a bit anxiously maintained.
There is much insecurity and uncertainty about the volcanic chaos underneath.
Consciousness ought to be strengthened, as it needs a strong ego to counterbalance the dormant affects.
There is much uncertainty in her whether she will be able to disidentify from the collective unconscious.
She is in need of theoria i.e., of symbolic concepts that would enable her to ”comprehend” the contents of the unconscious.

I would try to get her interested in a general, theoretical knowledge of the basic contents of the unconscious and of their significance for individuation.
I have noticed some spark in her when the conversation touched upon related subjects.
The more she knows and understands, the better are her chances.
She should beware of too much activity of an extraverted kind.
I have the impression that she is not yet congealed but still ”fluid.”
My best wishes,
Yours cordially,

Carl Jung: The Dream is a natural phenomenon. (2015-08-02 04:59)

To 0. Schrenk
Dear Professor Schrenk, 8 December 1952
I greatly enjoyed your interesting letter.
Naturally your ”reaction” made a special impression on me.
It was quite in keeping with the deeper meaning of the dream that you should write to me about it.
The ”teacher” shows you the secret of his ”daughter.”
Perhaps I may draw your attention to a small but, in its consequences, serious technical mistake in your interpretation of the dream. (It plays a greater role in the dream that follows.)
The dream’s extremely negative criticism of your ”product” may be connected with this.
The conscious starting-point of the dream is the reading of my book, or rather its affective impact which evokes the image of your one-time teacher.

The dream leads away from me to Prof. Gaub, who is entirely your memory.
Gaub didn't write Job, also he has no daughter, but he is an ideal teacher.
Contrary to all expectations, the dream has concealed me and replaced me by Gaub.
Why does the dream make such an arrangement?
Why does it say "eagle"instead of Schrenk or Jung?
The dream quite obviously means Gaub and eagle.
It is only we who think it must actually mean Schrenk or Jung.
In this respect your colleague has already corrected you, only to make the same mistake himself of wanting to know better than the dream.
It is as if a doctor found sugar in a patient's urine and told him, "The sugar really means albumen," and then treated the patient for nephritis on the basis of a mere opinion.
Freud himself made this fundamental mistake.
It is the simplest way of killing the dream's meaning.
Of course we look round for figures in our world of experience to explain dreams.
But the first thing to be established is that a dream is a natural phenomenon which we cannot interpret with a flick of the wrist, otherwise we are doing alchemy instead of chemistry.
Since the second dream obviously means eagle, and neither you nor I are eagles circling round concentration camps, this interpretation is purely arbitrary.
But what, then, is the eagle?
The eagle is here meant as a threatening factor which has to be "shot down."
It is all-seeing, spying out its prey from above with a telescopic eye which nothing escapes.
Understandably enough, this invigilation is particularly disagreeable to the rationalistic and atheistic Jew as it reminds him of the eyes of Yahweh, which "run to and fro through the whole earth" (mentioned in my Job!) and from which nothing remains hidden.
The eagle "seizes" and "snatches up" (Ganymede and the eagle of Zeus).
Your colleague is reminded that he is still stuck in an intellectualistic concentration camp and feels the liberator as an enemy.
Here we are dealing with an archetype and not with the writer Jung.
The same is true of the teacher and even more so of the daughter.
Here the figure of Sophia insinuates herself, divided into the "Wise Old Man" and his daughter, who stands for the virgin soul.
The two dreams do not point back to the daytime impressions, but forwards into the world of living archetypal figures, which apparently or in fact we have long forgotten but which are always there if only we would think scientifically and not be satisfied with mere opinions.
Please don't take these remarks as schoolmasterish criticism; I only thought they might help you to understand my apparently very difficult and so often misunderstood psychology.
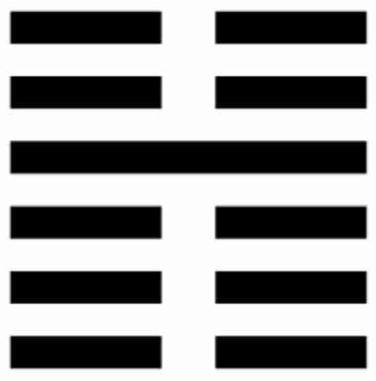
With best thanks for your stimulating letter,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 98-100.

Carl Jung: I forgot to tell you that I Ching 16 place 1 refers to ”putting in music” (2015-08-02 05:09)



To Father Victor White
Dear Victor! Bollingen, 7 August 1952
I forgot to tell you that I Ching 16 place 1 refers to ”putting in music” the problem of priv. boni, i.e., understanding it as a feeling problem.
You would get a more complete picture if you contemplate such ideas not only from an intellectual but also from a feeling standpoint.
In this case you could feel the ”contrapunctum” very clearly.
You were followed by a letter which I have re-addressed to Blackfriars.
Greetings!
Yours cordially,
C.G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 79.

Carl Jung on the doctrine of privatio Boni (2015-08-02 05:31)

To Father Victor White
Dear Victor, 30 June 1952
First of all I should like to know whether the doctrine of privatio boni ranks as a dogma or as a sententia communis.
In the latter case it could be a disputable subject so far as I understand the ways of ecclesiastical thinking.
At all events I have started the discussion on this assumption.
If on the other hand it should be a defined and declared truth, I will not discuss it anymore, but I shall try to understand the deeper reasons for its existence, as I have already tried at least tentatively.
The crux seems to lie in the contamination of the two incongruous notions of Good and of Being.
If you assume, as I do, that Good is a moral judgment and not substantial in itself, then Evil is its opposite and just as non-substantial as the first.
If however you assume that Good is Being, then Evil can be nothing else than Non-Being.
In my empirical thinking the tertium quid is always the observer, i.e., the one who makes the statement.
Your example of light and darkness is a subjective and relative statement, inasmuch as light is equal to motion and darkness equal to rest, that is, more or less frequency or more or less standstill.
Darkness is certainly a decrease of light, as light is a decrease of darkness.
Thus it amounts to a play of words to say that only Good is, i.e., has substance and Evil not.
Standstill is just as real for an observer as movement.
You could not even have a notion of movement if there were not standstill to compare it with.
Things are quite simple if you could only admit that Good and Evil are judgments, having nothing to do with the incommensurable concept of Being.
It is true that motion is everything, since all things move, but it is equally true that certain things are less moving for a certain observer than other things.

From this fact you form the notion of standstill, which in itself, as far as we know, does not occur in our empirical world.
Thus you can hold that everything is good, but certain things are less good for a certain observer.
But this argument also depends upon an observer and his statement, which is always subjective.
What you call fixed stars, for instance, may move much faster in reality than our sun, and what you call good may be in other respects a great evil, that is, for another observer.
The whole question may be a case like that of the earth , around which the sun revolved for the better part of 1900 years.
In recent times only it became an admissible truth that the earth is moving round the sun.
If the privatio boni is merely a doctrine and not a dogma, it can be discussed or is that not so?
St. Thomas is not infallible.
His views about the Assumptio for instance don't seem to agree with the new dogma.
Whereas Being is obviously a concept of + ,
Non-Being is one of -.
But Evil is as substantial as Good, as the devil and his hell are substantial.
If Evil should be a very small Good, it would nevertheless be good, however little, and not at all bad.
If I am condemned to hell I am still nothing but good, in spite of the fact that I have lost 99 % of goodness because Evil is not.
Is it quite impossible for a theologian to admit the obvious fact of Good and Evil being moral judgments and as such relative to an observer?
There is not the faintest evidence for the identity of Good and Being.
God is certainly Being itself and you call Him the Summum Bonum.
Thus all Being is good, and even Evil is a minute Good, even Satan's disobedience is still good to a small degree and nothing else.
For that small Good he is in hell.
Why should Good be thrown into hell?
And at which percentage of goodness are you liable to get condemned?
Moreover there is no darkness in God and God is All where in hell is the absence of light then, where the host of fallen angels, where the "evil-doers" (i.e., those having done a little good) and Satan himself?
Why should a little good be against God?
It is still with God, even Satan is.
Whatever he is doing, it is always a little good and nothing else.
That is how the Christian doctrine gets out of its inherent dualism, i.e., Manicheism, by denying the existence of Evil.
You do deny it by calling Evil a decreasing Good.
Absolute Evil is for you a merely neutral condition, in which there is nothing at all, a p.□5□v, but inasmuch as Satan exists, he is nothing but good, because Being = Good.
It reminds me of St. Mad's baptism of the penguins and St. Catherine's advice: Donnez-leur une arne, mais une petite!
I'm looking forward to seeing you on the 16th or the 17th.
I shall be in Bollingen then.
Cordially yours,

Carl Jung on the development of the Kabbalah. (2015-08-02 05:53)

To James Kirsch
Dear Kirsch, 18 November 1952
I am sending you an English letter this time as I am still unable to write longhand letters myself.
I had another attack of arrhythmia and tachycardia due to overwork.
I am now slowly recovering and my pulse is normal again for almost a week, but I am still tired and have to go slowly.
Your question is a very important one and I think I can understand its full import.
I would not be able to give you a satisfactory answer, yet having studied the question as far as is possible, I can call your attention to the extraordinary development in the Kabbalah.
I am rather certain that the sefiroth tree contains the whole symbolism of Jewish development parallel to the Christian idea.
The characteristic difference is that God's incarnation is understood to be a historical fact in the Christian belief, while in the Jewish Gnosis it is an entirely pleromatic process symbolized by the concentration of the supreme triad of Kether, Hokhmah, and Binah in the figure of Tifereth.
Being the equivalent of the Son and the Holy Ghost, he is the sponsus bringing about the great solution through his union with Malkhuth.
This union is equivalent to the assumptio beatae virginis, but definitely more comprehensive than the latter as it seems to include even the extraneous world of the Kelipoth.
X. is certainly all wet when he thinks that the Jewish Gnosis contains nothing of the Christian mystery. It contains practically the whole of it, but in its unrevealed pleromatic state.
There is a very interesting little Latin mediaeval book written either by Knorr von Rosenroth or at least under his direct influence.
It is called Adumbratio Kabbalae Christianae, Id est Syncatabasis Hebraizans, Sive Brevis Applicatio Doctrinae Hebraeorum Cabbalisticae Ad Dogmata Novi Foederis. Francofurti, 1684.
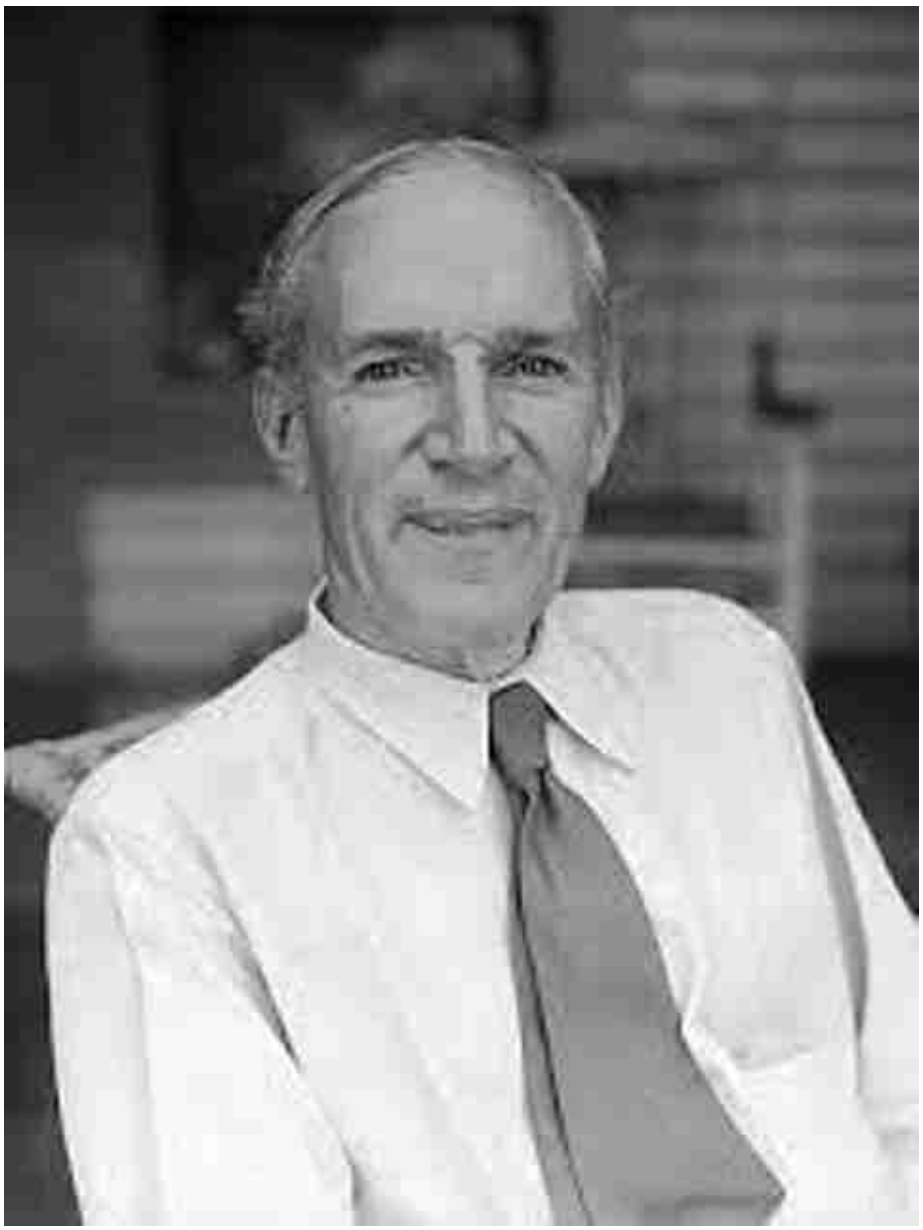
This little book is highly worthwhile; it contains a very useful parallel to the Christian and the Kabbalistic mystery and might give you much help as it has helped me in understanding this all-important problem of the Jewish religious development.
It would be highly commendable to translate the book.
I am pretty certain that the extraordinary and venomous response of the orthodox rabbis against the Kabbalah is based upon the undeniable fact of this most remarkable Judeo-Christian parallelism.
This is hot stuff, and since the 17th century, as far as my knowledge goes, nobody has dared to touch it, but we are interested in the soul of man and therefore we are not blindfolded by foolish confessional prejudices.
Sincerely yours,

C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 91-93.

Carl Jung: Thank you for letting me see Professor Einstein's highly complementary letter. (2015-08-02 07:12)

To Upton Sinclair
Dear Mr. Sinclair, 24 November 1952

Thank you ever so much for the kind reception you gave to my letter and to my apparent criticism.
I do not feel quite happy about my way of using the English language, since I seem to cause many misunderstandings.



I want, therefore, to make it quite clear that I fully appreciate not only your masterful portrait of a personal Jesus, but also the laudable tendency of your work to show an apathetic world the possibility of a personal approach to a highly debatable religious figure.

My letter has obviously given you cause to analyse the mental condition of its perpetrator.
Since it is a rule of thumb never to analyse any given subject without the pertinent association material (if there is any!), I want to support your analytic attempt by giving you some more necessary information: I have a certain picture of a personal Jesus.
It has been dimly suggested to me through certain New Testament data.
Yet the strongest impression carne to me from the Linceul de Turin, the Saint Suaire.
Its stern and august countenance has confirmed my formerly vague expectations.
I am, as a matter of fact, so profoundly impressed by the superiority of this extraordinary personality that I would not dare to reconstruct its psychology.
I am not at all sure that my mental capacity would be up to such a task.
That is why I must personally refrain from a biographical attempt.
You are quite right in contending that the world is entitled to demand something more positive from me than mere criticism.
As a matter of fact (since 1948) I have published everything sustainable which I have thought about the documentary phenomenon of Christ and its psychological reconstruction.
There are three essays:
1 . Symbolik des Geistes, 1948, p. 32 3-446 : ”Versuch einer psychologischen Deutung des Trinitatsdogmas.”
2 . Aion, 1951, p. 15-379 : ”Beitrage zur Symbolik der Selbst.”
3· Antwort auf Hiob, 1952.
People mostly don’t understand my empirical standpoint: I am dealing with psychic phenomena and I am not at all concerned with the naive and, as a rule, unanswerable question whether a thing is historically, i.e., concretely, true or not.
It is enough that it has been said and believed.
Probably most history is made from opinions, the motives of which are factually quite questionable; that is, the psyche is a factor in history as powerful as it is unknown.
In dealing with Christ, my point de depart is the Corpus Christianum in the first place.
It consists of the canonical writings exclusively.
From this source we learn not only of a personal and rational Jesus, but also and even foremost of an eschatological Christ.
I use (as others) the term ”eschatology” in the wider sense (i.e., not only with reference to the parousia) viz. oneness with God, sonship, messianic mission, identity with the Anthropos (”Son of Man”), the glorified resurrected Christ, the Kvpwnov ayy□Áwv Kat rwv oatjMlvtwv and the iudex vivorum et mortuorum, not forgetting the pre-existent ,\6yo□Ļ
[Greek letters not cut and pasted properly]
This irrational aspect is inseparable from the evangelical picture of Christ.
In the second place, in dealing with Christ’s historical effects, I have to take into account not only the dogmata of the Church but the Gnostics, and the later heretics also, right down to late mediaeval alchemy.
No wonder people don’t understand what it’s all about.
The trouble is they are still stuck with the silly question as to whether a metaphysical assertion is true or not, or whether a mythologem refers to a historical fact or not.
They don’t see, and they don’t want to see, what the psyche can do.
But there-alas-is the key.
Thank you for letting me see Professor Einstein’s highly complementary letter.
I am duly impressed and feel quite low.
Yours very truly,
C.G. Jung
P.S. I would have gladly sent you a copy of my books but they are not translated. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 95-98

How Dr. Jung met Albert Einstein (2015-08-02 13:41)

To Carl Seelig
Dear Dr. Seelig, 25 February 1953
I got to know Albert Einstein through one of his pupils, a Dr. Hopf if I remember correctly.
Professor Einstein was my guest on several occasions at dinner, when, as you have heard, Adolf Keller was present on one of them and on others Professor Eugen Bleuler, a psychiatrist and my former chief.
These were very early days when Einstein was developing his first theory of relativity.
He tried to instill into us the elements of it, more or less successfully.
As non-mathematicians we psychiatrists had difficulty in following his argument.
Even so, I understood enough to form a powerful impression of him.
It was above all the simplicity and directness of his genius as a thinker that impressed me mightily and exerted a lasting influence on my own intellectual work.
It was Einstein who first started me off thinking about a possible relativity of time as well as space, and their psychic conditionality.
More than thirty years later this stimulus led to my relation with the physicist Professor W. Pauli and to my thesis of psychic synchronicity.
With Einstein's departure from Zurich my relation with him ceased, and I hardly think he has any recollection of me.
One can scarcely imagine a greater contrast than that between the mathematical and the psychological mentality.
The one is extremely quantitative and the other just as extremely qualitative.
With kind regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages108-109.

Carl Jung on ”The Philosophical Tree.” (2015-08-02 16:29)

To James Kirsch

My dear Kirsch, 29 January 1953
I would like to thank you personally for the great honour you have destined for me and the great pleasure this has given me.
I hope and wish all the best for the future of your Society.
If I had a Doctor honoris causa to bestow I would place the well-earned academic hat on your head in recognition of your truly remarkable and meritorious activity on behalf of ”my” psychology, with regard to which, however, I presume to no proprietary rights.
It represents a movement of the spirit which took possession of me and which I have had the privilege of serving all my life.
It illuminates the evening of my days and fills me with joyful serenity that I was granted the favour of putting my best abilities at the service of a great cause.
What you write about the effect of Job on analysts accords with my own experience: the number of individuals capable of reacting is relatively very small and analysts are no exception.
A second edition is already on the way, in which I have made the corrections you suggested.
I will send you a copy.
I am recuperating slowly, but now things are getting positively better.
Today I finished a long essay on the ”Philosophical Tree,” which kept me company during my illness.
I have discovered some interesting things.
Writing it was an enjoyable substitute for the fact that so few of my contemporaries can understand what is meant by the psychology of the unconscious.
You should have seen the press reviews of Job! The naive stupidity of it all is beyond imagination.
Again with cordial thanks and kindest regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 104.

Carl Jung on Zen (2015-08-03 03:06)

To Stanislaw Komorowski
Dear Colleague, 19 December 1952
Many thanks for your friendly letter.
I know Suzuki personally.
I have studied Zen not in the practical sense but only from the psychological angle.
I have had much more to do with the European developments that tend in the same direction.
Many paths lead to the central experience.
But the nearer one gets to the centre the easier it is to understand the other paths that lead there.
I have no doubt that this study is the most important in our time.
With best wishes for the natalis Solis invicti,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Martin Buber and Soren Kierkegaard (2015-08-03 03:26)

To Mitchel Bedford
Dear Dr. Bedford, 31 December 1952
Concerning Mr. Buber, I can tell you that to my knowledge there has never been the slightest personal friction between us and I do not think that Buber has ever been impolite to me.
The only trouble with him is that he does not understand what I am talking about.
Concerning Kierkegaard, I am convinced that for many people it is an excellent thing to read him, because he gives voice to many deliberations which prove to be of great value inasmuch as they help people to think about such questions.
I myself, quite personally, do not find a sufficient amount of meat in him.
One hears too damn much of himself, but very little of that voice which I would prefer to hear.
I have no personal opinion of Buber since I have met him only a few times and I dislike forming opinions on insufficient grounds.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 101-102.

Carl Jung on Buddha and Reincarnation (2015-08-03 03:35)

To William Hamilton Smith
Dear Mr. Smith, 26 January 1953

Everybody is free to believe anything which seems to fit about things of which we know nothing.
Nobody knows whether there is reincarnation, and equally one does not know that there is none.
Buddha himself was convinced of reincarnation, but he himself on being asked twice by his disciples about it, left it quite open whether there is a continuity of your personality or not.
Certainly we do not know where we come from, nor where we are going, or why we are here at the present time.
I think it is right to believe that having done the best we could do here, we are also best prepared for things to come.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung and Smoking (2015-08-03 04:01)

To Ignaz Tauber
Dear Colleague, 23 January 1953
Thanks for your friendly visit!
I passed a good night.
One Quidinal was enough to stop the tachycardia.
Everything fine today, I am up again.
Yesterday I quite forgot to ask you what you think about smoking.
Until now I have smoked 1 pipe with water condensation on beginning work in the morning, a miniature cigar after lunch, equal to 1-2 cigarettes, another pipe at 4 o'clock, after supper another little cigar, and generally another pipe about 9:30.
A little tobacco helps me to concentrate and conduces to my peace of mind.

Please do send me your bill.
You were kind enough to bring the Corhomon along.
I've already had an injection today.
With many thanks for your advice,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung: "If causality is axiomatic, i.e., absolute, there can be no freedom." (2015-08-03 09:22)

To Elisabeth Metzger
Dear Frau Metzger, 7 January 1953
Man is notoriously not God, to whom alone is given the power to preserve and destroy life.
Man has only very limited possibilities amongst which-so far as his consciousness extends-he can choose with practical freedom.
If causality is axiomatic, i.e., absolute, there can be no freedom.
But if it is only a statistical truth, as is in fact the case, then the possibility of freedom exists.
The paradoxical God-image is not an innovation in the sense that it is a novum in the world's history.
The God of the Old Testament as well as all non-Christian deities are inwardly contradictory, and the non-Christians must also live and have always lived with the paradox.
It is certainly true that a paradoxical God-image forces man to come to grips with his own paradoxicality.
This is in fact our task which we have hitherto avoided.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 102.

Carl Jung's Letter to a Catholic Analyst. (2015-08-04 05:26)

To Paul Campbell
Dear Mr. Campbell, 19 December 1952
Thank you very much for your kind letter and the programme of your Conference.
I fully realize that Catholic analysts are faced with very particular problems which, on the one hand, are an aggravation of the work which is difficult in itself already, yet on the other hand, an asset, since you start within a world of thought and feeling based upon archetypal realities.

I have had a number of TB patients in my time and some really excellent results with psychotherapy, but it is true that the average somatic case generally has a resistance to a psychological approach, particularly the TB patients, since TB is, in a way a ”pneumatic” disease, that is, affecting the life-giving breath.
It is in such cases often as if the patient had a pride and obstinacy in defending the achievement of a somatic answer to an insoluble psychological problem.
With every good wish for Christmas and the New Year,
I remain,
Yours cordially,

Carl Jung on Abstinence from Smoking his Pipe (2015-08-04 05:38)

[Carl Jung on abstinence from smoking]
To Ignaz Tauber
Dear Colleague, 4 February 1953
For a time I faithfully observed the rigorous rules of abstinence until my impatience drove me again to a few pipes.
Of the 2 evils the pipe seems to me the lesser.
Everything went very well from the moment I gave up the digitalis . . . .

Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Human Artificial Insemination (2015-08-04 05:54)

To E . Roenne-Peterson
Dear Sir, 16 March 1953

Inseminatio artificialis could indeed become a public and legal problem in a society where a merely rationalistic and materialistic point of view has become predominant, and where the cultural values as to the freedom of human thoughts and of human relations have been suppressed.
This danger is not so remote that one could disregard it.
It is therefore a legitimate question when one asks what the possible consequences of the practice of the said procedure might be.
From the standpoint of psychopathology, the immediate effect would be an ”illegitimate,” i.e., fatherless pregnancy, in spite of the fact that the fertilization took place in wedlock and under legalized circumstances.
It would be a case of unknown paternity.
Since human beings are individual and not exchangeable, the father could not be artificially substituted.
The child would suffer inevitably from the handicaps of illegitimacy, or of being an orphan, or of adoption.
These conditions leave their traces in the psyche of the infant.
The fact that artificial insemination is a well-known cattle-breeding device lowers the moral status of a human mother to the level of a cow, no matter what she thinks about it, or what she is talked into.
As any bull having the desired racial characteristics can be a donor, so any man appreciated from the breeder standpoint is good enough for anonymous procreation.
Such a procedure amounts to a catastrophic devaluation of the human individual, and its destructive effect upon human dignity is obvious.
Having no practical experience in this matter, I do not know what the psychological effect is of a conception brought about in such a cold-blooded ”scientific” way, and what a mother who had to carry the child of a total stranger would feel.
I can imagine that the effect would be like that of rape.
It seems to me to be in itself an ominous symptom of the mental and moral condition of our world that such problems have to be discussed at all.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 110-111.

Carl Jung: Man is the mirror which God holds up to himself, or the sense organ with which he apprehends his being. (2015-08-04 14:31)

To Jakob Amstutz
Dear Pastor Amstutz, 28 March 1953
Excuse the delay in answering your kind letter of 9 March.
It is indeed a pleasant exception.
For there are exceptions.
Otherwise dismal darkness reigns.
My criticism of the Yahwistic God-image is for you what the experience of the book was for me: a drama that was not mine to control.
I felt myself utterly the causa ministerialis of my book.
It came upon me suddenly and unexpectedly during a feverish illness.
I feel its content as an unfolding of the divine consciousness in which I participate, like it or not.
It was necessary for my inner balance that I made myself conscious of this development.
Man is the mirror which God holds up to himself, or the sense organ with which he apprehends his being.

So-called progress makes possible a tremendous multiplication of man and leads simultaneously to a spiritual inflation and to an unconsciousness of God (genetivus accusativus!).
Man confuses himself with God, is identical with the demiurge and begins to usurp cosmic powers of destruction, i .e., to arrange a second Deluge.
He should become conscious of the tremendous danger of God becoming man, which threatens him with becoming God, and learn to understand the mysteria Dei better.
In the Catholic Church, faith is not so dangerous in practice.
The Church stands on two feet, Protestantism only on sola fide, therefore faith is so important to it but not to the Catholic.
Sometimes semel credidisse is sufficient for him since he has the ritual graces.
With best greetings,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 111-112.

Carl Jung: The breaking loose of the elements, tempest and flood, is a symbol of the possible end of our world. (2015-08-05 04:42)

To G. van Schravendijk-Berlage
Dear Frau Schravendijk-Berlage, 11 February 1953
I can only confirm the impression you have formed of the worldwide readiness to help.
Here in Switzerland we are all deeply affected by the terrible catastrophe that has befallen your country.
On a superficial view, one must regard this response as a positive sign of the feeling of human solidarity.
But as you have quite rightly seen there is something more behind it: the pressure weighing on all Europe and the more or less open fear of a still greater catastrophe.
The present political situation is historically unique in that an Iron Curtain has split the world into two halves which virtually balance each other.

Nobody knows the answer to this problem.
But whenever man is confronted with an unanswerable question or situation, corresponding archetypes are constellated in his unconscious.
The first thing this produces is a general unrest in the unconscious which manifests itself as fear and makes people seek closer union in order to ward off the danger.
But when a catastrophe like the Dutch one occurs, they are reminded of the far greater danger under the threat of which they live.
The breaking loose of the elements, tempest and flood, is a symbol of the possible end of our world.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 105.

Carl Jung: I have observed a great many ESP cases with my patients in the course of time. (2015-08-05 04:59)

To J. B . Rhine
Dear Professor Rhine: 18 February 1953
Thank you for your kind letter.
My state of health is unfortunately not so good as to allow me much work.
The work I am planning on ESP does not concern the fact itself (which you have demonstrated up to the hilt), but rather the peculiar emotional factor that seems to be a very important condition deciding the success or failure of the ESP experiment.
As a rule (though not always) spontaneous cases of ESP happen under emotional circumstances (accidents, death, illness, danger, etc.) which usually arouse the deeper archetypal and instinctual layers of the unconscious. I should like to examine the state of the unconscious in cases of minor or major events occurring not so rarely with our patients.

I have observed a great many ESP cases with my patients in the course of time.
The only trouble is to find suitable methods by which the state of the unconscious can be established objectively.
We have begun to try out such methods.
They are difficult and unorthodox, and need a very special training.
I am most obliged to you for offering your help, but in the actual state of our research I would not know where the statistical method would come in, although I hope once to get to a point where statistics can be applied.
It is annoying that my recent works are not yet published in English.
But what can you do when there are at least two committees occupied with the publication of my collected works?
I have tried to kick them into life, but they have taken more than five years over one single book, and it is not yet out.
I have written to Mr. Barrett of the Bollingen Press concerning my essay on synchronicity.
It could easily be translated and published.
Thanking you for your kind interest, I remain,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung

Carl Jung: The book ”came to me” during the fever of an illness. (2015-08-05 05:10)

To Henry Corbin
Dear M. Corbin, 4 May 1953
A few days ago I received an offprint of your essay ”La Sophie Eternelle.”
Unfortunately it is impossible for me to express all the thoughts and feelings I had upon reading your admirable presentation of your subject.
My French is so rusty that I cannot use it to formulate exactly what I want to say to you.
Yet I must tell you how delighted I was by your work. It was an extraordinary joy to me, and not only the rarest of experiences but even a unique experience, to be fully understood.
I am accustomed to living in a more or less complete intellectual vacuum, and my Answer to Job has done nothing to diminish it.
On the contrary, it has released an avalanche of prejudice, misunderstanding, and, above all, atrocious stupidity.
I have received hundreds of critical reviews, but not a single one that comes anywhere near yours in its lucid and penetrating understanding.
Your intuition is astounding: Schleiermacher really is one of my spiritual ancestors.
He even baptized my grandfather-born a Catholic-who by then was a doctor.
This grandfather became a great friend of the theologian de Wette,who had connections of his own with Schleiermacher.
The vast, esoteric, and individual spirit of Schleiermacher was a part of the intellectual atmosphere of my father’s family.
I never studied him, but unconsciously he was for me a spiritus rector.
You say you read my book as an ”oratorio.”
The book ”came to me” during the fever of an illness.
It was as if accompanied by the great music of a Bach or a Handel.
I don’t belong to the auditory type.
So I did not hear anything, I just had the feeling of listening to a great composition, or rather of being at a concert.
I should mention that de Wette had a tendency, as he said, to ”mythize” the ”marvellous” Bible stories (that is, the shocking ones).
Thus he preserved their symbolic value.
This is exactly what I have been forced to do not only for the Bible but also for the misdeeds in our dreams.
I don’t know how to express my gratitude but, once again,
I must tell you how much I appreciate your goodwill and your unique understanding.
My compliments to Madame Corbin.
The caviar is not forgotten.
With grateful regards,
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 115-116.

Carl Jung: I quailed at the prospect of answering you yet again (2015-08-05 10:50)

Dear Dr. Hoch, 30 April 1953
It was very kind of you to write to me again in spite of the fact that I never answered your letter of s .XII. 52.
Since I have not been in the best of health for some time, and you are evidently not in a position to follow my line of thought.
I quailed at the prospect of answering you yet again.
It is simply a question of something that the primitive Christians understood and that was understood again and again even in the Middle Ages and that the whole of India has understood from time immemorial.
How very much you misunderstand me is evident from your remark that ”psychanalysis (!) tries to lead man to the discovery of his self as the ultimate goal.”
Maybe ”psychanalysis” aims at something of the sort, but I intend no such futility, for the self is by definition a transcendental entity with which the ego is confronted.
It is a total misunderstanding (and the opposite of what I have always emphasized) to say that the self is a ”concentration On the Me.”
That is just what it is not.
Whatever the ultimate fate of the self may be (and the Christian mystics have something to say here), it means at any rate first the end of the ego.

Indeed, you yourself say (as Orelli said and I have always said) that Christ is ”the self of all selves.”
This is the correct definition of the self and means that just as Christ is related to all individuals, so all individuals are related to Christ.
Every self has the quality of belonging to the ”self of all selves,” and the self of all selves consists of individual selves.
The psychological concept fully agrees with this.
I have nothing against your theological formulations, and if I wanted to criticize them I would first have to acquire a lot more theological knowledge.
You treat psychology cavalierly and do not notice how very much you misunderstand it.
My aim was therefore to give you a fairer conception of my psychology.
This is evidently not possible, as I must admit to my regret.
It is really not easy to talk with theologians: they don’t listen to the other person (who is wrong from the start) but only to themselves (and call this the Word of God).
Perhaps this comes from their having to preach down from the pulpit, with nobody allowed to answer back.
This attitude, which I met practically everywhere, has shooed me out of the Church like so many others.
I like discussions with theologians, Protestant and Catholic, who understand and want to understand what I am talking about.
But the discussion comes to an end when you bang your head against the walls of Church and credo, for there contumaciousness begins and the power-drive that countenances nothing except itself.
That is why the devil laughs in the face of the 400 feuding Protestant sects and the great reformatory schism.
If even the Christian Churches can’t agree!
What an infernal scandal!
You have not exactly encouraged my attempt to build bridges.
But I won’t molest you any further with my paradoxes, rather I must ask your forgiveness for what must inevitably appear to you as unjustified aggressiveness.
I have no wish whatever to offend or annoy you pointlessly, and therefore I repeat that I have nothing against your theological formulations but, on the contrary, find them justified in their fashion.
My hope was only that I might inculcate into you a somewhat more reasonable and less distorted view of my psychology.
I am evidently a bad advocate in my own cause and would therefore like to take leave of you with many apologies.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 113-114.

Carl Jung on the ”Spectacle of eternal Nature.” (2015-08-05 13:05)

To Aniela Jaffe
Dear Aniela, 29 May 1953
The spectacle of eternal Nature gives me a painful sense of my weakness and perishability, and I find no joy in imagining an equanimity in conspectu mortis.
As I once dreamt, my will to live is a glowing daimon, who makes the consciousness of my mortality hellish difficult for me at times.
One can, at most, save face like the unjust steward, and then not always, so that my Lord wouldn’t find even that much to commend.
But the daimon reeks nothing of that, for life, at the core, is steel on stone.

Carl Jung the Shadow sometimes appears as a Duality (2015-08-05 13:18)

To R. J. Zwi Werblowsky
Dear Dr. Werblowsky, 21 May 1953
Best thanks for kindly sending me your two lectures.
I have read them with great interest; the second even twice, as Father White came to Zurich the day before yesterday.

Your critique is most interesting but not exactly easy reading.
When I saw Father White he hadn't yet read it.
But I hope I shall have an opportunity to discuss certain points with him.
You are absolutely right about the hornet's nest.
The two dark figures in Kafka are a duplication of the shadow or of the self (the two white balls).
This duality attaches, for instance, to the messengers from the underworld (Apocalypse of Peter) or the "helpful animals."
As a rule the shadow appears only in the singular.
If it occasionally appears as a duality this is, so to speak, a "seeing double": a conscious and an unconscious half, one figure above the horizon, the other below.
So far as I know anything definite about it, the duplication seems to occur when the split-off figure is real in a special sense-real as a ghost.
Duplications also occur in dreams, but less frequently than in fairy tales and legends.
The duplication is the origin of the motif of the hostile brothers.
I read the Ibn Ezra passage in a book I can't remember the name of for the moment. I hope to locate the quotation sometime.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 116-117.

Carl Jung: Best thanks for kindly sending me R. Gikatilla's text on dreams. (2015-08-05 17:03)

To R . J. Zwi Werblowsky
Dear Dr. Werblowsky, 2 September 1953
Best thanks for kindly sending me R. Gikatilla's text on dreams.

The identification of Chalom and Cholem with Kether is very interesting for all its scurrility.
When I read that, I had to think of the question recently raised by a mathematician, as to whether it was possible to produce absolute chance groupings.
The same statements have to be made about each unit qua unit.
To that extent all units are identical.
The unit is necessarily the “beginning” and the origin of multiplicity.
Because it is undifferentiated the unconscious is a unit and hence the “great beginning” and indistinguishable from God.
I can understand that South Africa has no attractions for you.
A colony nowadays is about the most disagreeable thing one can imagine.
With best regards,
,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on the difficulties in creating a Dream Symbol Lexicon (2015-08-05 17:12)

To Maria Folino Weld
Dear Madam, 6 September 1953
A lexicon of dream symbols is a nightmare to me, as I see this task from the standpoint of responsible science and I know its enormous difficulties.

We have a large collection of material in our Institute in Zurich, but it is far from being a lexicon of symbols.
It would be a well-nigh gigantic undertaking to work out the comparative significance of dream motifs.
It should be done in the way of monographs.
But this would cover only the archetypal background of dreams and would tell nothing of the actual meaning of dreams.
Such a collection would indeed be helpful to professional psychologists trained in comparative psychology, but to the layman it would be a limitless jungle in which he would lose all orientation in no time.
Last winter I worked out a sketchy and incomplete monograph about the Tree-well, nobody will do more than a few of the kind.
A superficial collection of interpretations would be the worst as well as completely worthless.
But the monographic study of the structure and objective meaning of motifs (mythologemata or archetypes) would be of highest importance, although it is a highly difficult and ambitious task.
If you should intend to do some work over here, I am sure our Institute would gladly give you help and expert advice.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 123.

Carl Jung: To give body to one's thoughts means that one can speak them, paint them... (2015-08-06 04:59)

The creative aspect of suspension—also the creative aspect of the hunger and fasting is also a sort of symptom or a necessary accompaniment of a creative condition.
The creator will necessarily identify with what he wants to bring forth.
He will identify with the condition of the contents of the unconscious, which are in status nascendi, in the state of being born.

They are suspended, they are in the labor pains of birth, and the creative consciousness is identified with that condition.
Therefore, the creator will put himself into the state of suspension, of torment, in order to embody or incarnate the unconscious contents....
Our unconscious contents are potentialities that may be but are not yet, because they have no definiteness.
Only when they become definite can they appear....
To give body to one's thoughts means that one can speak them, paint them, show them, make them appear clearly before the eyes of everybody.... Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Pages 193-194.

Carl Jung: To have arms is an evil; to have no arms is a still greater evil. (2015-08-06 05:20)

To Pastor Fritz Pfaffiin
Dear Pastor Pfaffiin, 22 March 1951
I was very glad to hear from you again. Unfortunately I cannot fulfill your wish.
I have so many other things to do and I can't do nearly as much as I did before.
Nor am I allowed to overwork.
I don't know what kind of dream material you could mean, and how it is supposed to link up with the unarmed neutrality of Germany.
The disarmament of Germany is itself a dream which could only occur in a sleeping nation-the very nation which has overrun its neighbours twice in a quarter of a century.
It is the dream of a profoundly warlike nation that consciously considers itself harmless and peace-loving.
It must indeed be dreaming if one thinks one can live unarmed in an anarchic world where only guile and force count.
Every German who is not asleep and dreaming knows that it is time, highest time to rearm, and the more consciously he does so the better it will be for peace.
The really dangerous ones are the harmless dreamers who don't know that they want to perish gloriously yet again through their accursed playing the saviour. One time they strike their fellow men dead in order to convert them to the new religion of Naziism; the next time they preach disarmament in order to hand over their own country to Russian tyranny.

How would it have gone with us in Switzerland if we had had no army!
People like Herr Noack would have got a pension for doing useful preparatory work, and the rest of us would simply have been stood up against the wall by the culture-bringers.
And that's how it would be for you too with the Russians, for they also are universal saviours who want to cure the whole world with their own disease, just as the Nazis did.
Do you seriously believe that any robber would be scared off by German disarmament?
You know very well: " I feel provoked," said the wolf to the lamb.
One can also be neutral when armed, without falling a victim to militarism.
But unarmed neutrality seems to me, and probably to all non-Germans as well, the acme of failed instinct, to which I would add, from my intimate acquaintance with the German national character, German crankiness, which is something out of this world.
The dangerous thing about Noack's proposal is that it represents yet another attempt at national suicide.
Whence comes the recklessness or "intemperance" of the Germans, whence their love of national downfall?
When Jacob Burckhardt heard of the declaration of Empire at Versailles, he exclaimed: "That means the downfall of Germany."
Since then there has been no let-up in these down falling attempts.
One might, it seems to me, try to be reasonable for a change.
I hope, my dear Pastor, you will pardon these humble opinions.
They may make it clear to you why it seems to me quite out of the question-even if it were possible on other grounds-to give serious consideration to your proposal.
Please regard this letter as a private expression of my views. I have no wish to insult the German nation in the shape of its individual representatives.
To have arms is an evil; to have no arms is a still greater evil.
The reasonable man is modestly content with the lesser evil; he prefers to look at heroic Gotterdammerungen and suchlike Herostratic gestures in the theatre, to lock up madmen betimes and not worship them as leaders and saviours.
My words and warnings in this connection are as futile and useless as Jacob Burckhardt's.
"Si non crediderunt tibi neque a udierunt sermonem signi prioris," then only God speaks the word.
But let man, mindful of his hybris, be content with the lesser evil and beware of the Satanic temptation of the grand gesture, which is only intended for show and self-intoxication.
Best regards,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Psychic Health (2015-08-06 05:40)

To Carleton Smith
Dear Sir, 9 September 1953
It is very kind of you to invite me to become an adviser to the National Arts Foundation.
Your plan to establish prizes in the fields of human activity not yet covered by the Nobel Prize is indeed a very fine idea.
Whereas the Nobel Prize only considers discoveries or merits concerning natural sciences and medicine(with the exception of the political ”peace prize”) the psychic and spiritual welfare of man has been completely disregarded. Man’s peace of mind, his mental balance and even his health largely depend upon mental and spiritual factors that cannot be substituted by physical conditions. If man’s psychic health and happiness depended upon the proper food and other physical conditions of living, then all wealthy people should be healthy and happy, and all poor people mentally unbalanced, physically ill, and unhappy.
But the contrary is true.
The great dangers threatening the life of millions are not physical factors, but mental folly and diabolical schemes causing mental epidemics in the mentally defenseless masses.
There is no comparison between even the worst disease or the greatest natural catastrophe (such as earthquakes, floods, and epidemics) and that which man can do to man today.
A prize should be given to people who successfully suppress the outburst of political madness, or of panic (Churchill), or who produce great ideas enlarging the mental and spiritual horizon of man.
Great discoveries concerning the origin of man (palaeontology and archaeology), or about the structure of the universe (astronomy and astrophysics) , or the nature of the psyche (for instance J. B. Rhine for his extra-sensory perception experiments), should be rewarded.

What you need above all are good advisers, namely representatives of the said spheres of knowledge and research, who are not mere specialists, but who have a wide horizon.
The great trouble is that new ideas are rarely recognized by contemporaries.
Most of them fight blindly all creative attempts in their special field.
They thrive on things already known and therefore ”safe.”
Universities are the worst in this respect.
Yet one can find independent and intelligent personalities even among professors.
The best thing you could do would be to travel about and talk to the main representatives of the departments of history, archaeology, philology (theology?), psychology, biology, comparative religion, ethnology (anthropology), politics, and sociology.
I don’t mention philosophy as its modern variety does not include a corresponding way of life any more, and therefore consists of mere words.
Albert Schweitzer, by the way, would have deserved a reward for his most important and courageous book on the Jesus biography research, but not for his African romance, which any little doctor could take care of just as well without being made into a saint.
It is a mere escape from the problem called Europe.
This is an unofficial letter, giving you my subjective and private thoughts and opinions about your great enterprise.
My best wishes!
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 124-125.

Carl Jung: To my terror I was forced into a pulpit... (2015-08-06 08:57)

To Pastor L. Memper
Dear Pastor Memper, 29 September 1953
Please excuse the lateness of my answer.
Your letter was a great joy and brought back memories of old, long vanished times.
It is now 59 years since I left the vicarage in Klein-Hiiningen.
I thank you kindly for your invitation.
Formerly I would have accepted it without a qualm, because I feel a bond with all the stations of my way, but now I am too old and for reasons of health can no longer take on the responsibility of giving a difficult public address.
It is a difficult art to speak to a simple public about a complicated matter.
Anyway I would not have mounted the pulpit.
This happened to me only once, at a teachers' congress in Bern, which without my previous knowledge was held in a church.
To my terror I was forced into a pulpit, which gave me such a shock that I have never spoken in a church again.
I hadn't realized how much a sacred and hallowed precinct meant to me.
The profane use Protestants make of their churches I regard as a grave error.
God may be everywhere, but this in no way absolves believers from the duty of offering him a place that is declared holy, otherwise one could just as well get together for religious purposes in the 3rd class waiting-room of a railway station.
The Protestant is not even granted a quiet, pious place where he can withdraw from the turmoil of the world.
And nowhere does there exist for God a sanctified temenos which serves only one and a sacred purpose.
No wonder so few people attend church.

Formerly, in spite of my willingness to oblige, I would also have had to stipulate that the meeting should not in God's name be held in a church, as I am a practising anti-profanist.
I hope you will forgive me for taking your kind invitation as a pretext for voicing my subjective protest.
But I know from my many years of psychological practice how painful the rationalistic profanation of our churches is for very many educated people.
I have heard that my father's tombstone was set up near the church.
Unfortunately I did not know at the time when the stone was made that my father was described as Dr. theol. instead of Dr. phil.
He graduated as an Orientalist, in Arabic.
I was very glad to hear once again of my old home where I spent at least 16 years of my youth.
I hope you won't mind my scruples.
I found a magnificent temple in India now standing derelict in the desert.
It was desecrated by the Moslems 400 years ago, which resulted in permanent desacralization.
It gave me some idea of the strength of this feeling for a sacred precinct, and for the emptiness which arises when the profane breaks in.
With kindest regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 128-129.

Carl Jung: The all-important aspect of ESP is that it relativizes the space as well as the time factor. (2015-08-06 10:47)

To J. B . Rhine
Dear Dr. Rhine, 25 September 1953
I am indeed very sorry to be so late in answering your letter.
I am no longer efficient.
Everything takes its time, usually a long one.
I am not sure whether I can get together all my reminiscences concerning para-psychical events.
There were plenty.
The accumulation of such tales does not seem to be profitable.
The collection by Gurney, Myers and Podmore has produced very little effect.
People who know that there are such things [para-psychical] need no further confirmation, and people not wanting to know are free, as hitherto, to say that one tells them fairy tales.
I have encountered so much discouraging resistance that I am amply convinced of the stupidity of the learned guild.
A propos-you have probably heard that in Brussels a young mathematician, a Mr. Brown (?) ventilated his view that since your ESP is a fact, the foundations of your probability-calculation must be wrong, inasmuch as there are no real chance groupings or series.
Everything seems to be arranged to a certain (small) extent.
Well, I would not know it, but it would suit my synchronicity concept not at all badly.
The mescalin-man in Canada is Dr. Smythie from Queen's Hospital in London.
He is the originator of this enormous hypothesis of a 7-dimensional universe, the subject of a symposium in the Proc. Of the SPR. I could not ascertain what the good of such a hypothesis with reference to ESP might be.
I think the attempt to link up ESP with any personalistic psychology is absolutely hopeless.
I don't even think that the emotional factor has any causal, i.e., aetiological importance.
As you say, personal factors can only hinder or help, but not cause.
The all-important aspect of ESP is that it relativizes the space as well as the time factor.
This is far beyond psychology.
If space and time are psychically relative, then matter is too (telekinesis!) and then causality is only Statistically true, which means that there are plenty of acausal exceptions, q.e.d.
As nobody knows what telepathy or precognition or clairvoyance are (except names for ill-defined groups of events), we could just as well designate them as x, y, z, i.e., 3 unknowns of which you could not give a definition, which means that you could not differentiate x from y and z, etc.
Their only obvious characteristic would be that they are arbitrary designations of an unknown factor.
It may even be x = y = z and probably is: principia explicandi praeter necessitatem non sunt multiplicanda!!
But nobody seems to be aware of this snag.
Hoping you are always in good health,
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 126-127.

Carl Jung: It is the reign of darkness, which is also God, but an ordeal for Man. (2015-08-06 11:12)

To Father Victor White
Dear Victor, 24 November 1953
Forget for once dogmatics and listen to what psychology has to say concerning your problem: Christ as a symbol is far from being invalid although he is one side of the self and the devil the other.
This pair of opposites is contained in the creator as his right and left hand, as Clemens Romanus says.
From the psychological standpoint the experience of God the creator is the perception of an overpowering impulse issuing from the sphere of the unconscious.
We don't know whether this influence or compulsion deserves to be called good or evil, although we cannot prevent ourselves from welcoming or cursing it, giving it a bad or a good name, according to our subjective condition.
Thus Yahweh has either aspect because he is essentially the creator (primus motor) and because he is yet unreflected in his whole nature.
With the incarnation the picture changes completely, as it means that God becomes manifest in the form of Man who is conscious and therefore cannot avoid judgment.
He simply has to call the one good and the other evil.
It is a historical fact that the real devil only came into existence together with Christ.
Though Christ was God, as Man he was detached from God and he watched the devil falling out of heaven, removed from God as he (Christ) was separated from God inasmuch as he was human.
In his utter helplessness on the cross, he even confessed that God had forsaken him.
The Deus Pater would leave him to his fate as he always "strafes" those whom he has filled before with this abundance by breaking his promise.
This is exactly what S. Joannes a cruce describes as the "dark night of the soul."
It is the reign of darkness, which is also God, but an ordeal for Man.
The Godhead has a double aspect, and as Master Eckhart says: God is not blissful in his mere Godhead, and that is the reason for his incarnation.
But becoming Man, he becomes at the same time a definite being, which is this and not that.
Thus the very first thing Christ must do is to sever himself from his shadow and call it the devil (sorry, but the Gnostics of Irenaeus already knew it!).

When a patient in our days is about to emerge from an unconscious condition, he is instantly confronted with his shadow and he has to decide for the good, otherwise he goes down the drain.
Nolens volens he ”imitates” Christ and follows his example.
The first step on the way to individuation consists in the discrimination between himself and the shadow.
In this stage the Good is the goal of individuation, and consequently Christ represents the self.
The next step is the problem of the shadow: in dealing with darkness, you have got to cling to the Good, otherwise the devil devours you.
You need every bit of your goodness in dealing with Evil and just there.
To keep the light alive in the darkness, that’s the point, and only there your candle makes sense.
Now tell me how many people you know who can say with any verisimilitude that they have finished their dealings with the devil and consequently can chuck the Christian symbol overboard?
As a matter of fact, our society has not even begun to face its shadow or to develop those Christian virtues so badly needed in dealing with the powers of darkness.
Our society cannot afford the luxury of cutting itself loose from the imitatio Christi, even if it should know that the conflict with the shadow, i.e., Christ versus Satan, is only the first step on the way to the far-away goal of the unity of the self in God.
It is true however that the imitatio Christi leads you into your own very real and Christ-like conflict with darkness, and the more you are engaged in this war and in these attempts at peacemaking helped by the anima, the more you begin to look forward beyond the Christian aeon to the Oneness of the Holy Spirit.
He is the pneumatic state the creator attains to through the phase of incarnation.
He is the experience of every individual that has undergone the complete abolition of his ego through the absolute opposition expressed by the symbol Christ versus Satan.
The state of the Holy Spirit means a restitution of the original oneness of the unconscious on the level of consciousness.
That is alluded to, as I see it, by Christ’s logion: ”Ye are gods.”
This state is not quite understandable yet.
It is a mere anticipation.
The later development from the Christian aeon to the one of the S. spiritus has been called the evangelium aeternum by Gioacchino da Fiori in a time when the great tearing apart had just begun.
Such vision seems to be granted by divine grace as a sort of consolamentum, so that man is not left in a completely hopeless state during the time of darkness.
We are actually in the state of darkness viewed from the standpoint of history. We are still within the Christian aeon and just beginning to realize the age of darkness where we shall need Christian virtues to the utmost.
In such a state we could not possibly dismiss Christ as an invalid symbol although we clearly foresee the approach of his opposite.
Yet we don’t see and feel the latter as the preliminary step toward the future union of the divine opposites, but rather as a menace against everything that is good, beautiful, and holy to us.
The adventus diabolic does not invalidate the Christian symbol of the self, on the contrary: it complements it.
It is a mysterious transmutation of both.
Since we are living in a society that is unconscious of this development and far from understanding the importance of the Christian symbol, we are called upon to hinder its invalidation, although some of us are granted the vision of a future development.
But none of us could safely say that he has accomplished the assimilation and integration of the shadow.
Since the Christian church is the community of all those having surrendered to the principle of the imitatio Christi, this institution (i.e., such a mental attitude) is to be maintained until it is clearly understood what the assimilation of the shadow means.
Those that foresee, must-as it were-stay behind their vision in order to help and to teach, particularly so if they belong to the church as her appointed servants.
You should not mind if some of your analysands are helped out of the church.

It is their destiny and adventure.
Others will stay in it anyhow.
It does not matter whether the ecclesiastical powers-that-be approve of your vision or not.
When the time is fulfilled a new orientation will irresistibly break through, as one has seen in the case of the Conceptio Immaculata and the Assumptio which both deviate from the time-hallowed principle of apostolic authority a thing unheard of before.
It would be a lack of responsibility and a rather autoerotic attitude if we were to deprive our fellow beings of a vitally necessary symbol before they had a reasonable chance to understand it thoroughly, and all this because it is not complete if envisaged from an anticipated stage we ourselves in our individual lives have not yet made real.
Anybody going ahead is alone or thinks he is lonely at times, no matter whether he is in the church or in the world.
Your practical work as directeur de conscience brings to you individuals having something in their character that corresponds with certain aspects of your personality (like the many men fitting themselves as stones into the edifice of the tower in the Shepherd of Hermas).
Whatever your ultimate decision will be, you ought to realize beforehand that staying in the church makes sense as it is important to make people understand what the symbol of Christ means, and such understanding is indispensable to any further development.
There is no way round it, as little as we can eliminate from our life old age, illness, and death, or Buddha's Nidana-chain of evils.
The vast majority of people are still in such an unconscious state that one should almost protect them from the full shock of the real imitatio Christi.
Moreover we are still in the Christian aeon, threatened with a complete annihilation of our world.
As there are not only the many but also the few, somebody is entrusted with the task of looking ahead and talking of the things to be.
That is partially my job, but I have to be very careful not to destroy the things that are.
Nobody will be so foolish as to destroy the foundations when he is adding a n upper storey to his house, and how can he build it really if the foundations are not yet properly laid?
Thus, making the statement that Christ is not a complete symbol of the self, I cannot make it complete by abolishing it.
I must keep it therefore in order to build up the symbol of the perfect contradiction in God by adding this darkness to the lumen de lumine.
Thus I am approaching the end of the Christian aeon and I am to take up Gioacchino's anticipation and Christ's prediction of the coming of the Paraclete.
This archetypal drama is at the same time exquisitely psychological and historical.
We are actually living in the time of the splitting of the world and of the invalidation of Christ.
But an anticipation of a faraway future is no way out of the actual situation.
It is a mere consolamentum for those despairing at the atrocious possibilities of the present time.
Christ is still the valid symbol.
Only God himself can "invalidate" him through the Paraclete.
Now that is all I can say.
It is a long letter and I am tired.
If it is not helpful to you, it shows at least what I think.
I have seen X.
She is as right as she can be and as she usually is, and just as wrong as her nature permits, altogether as hopeful as a hysterical temperament ever can be.
You have probably heard of the little celebration we had here round the Nag-Hamadi Gnostic Codex given to the Institute by a generous donor.
There was even a note in the Times.
It was a disproportionate affair and neither my doing, nor liking.

But I was manoeuvred into saying in the end a few words about the relation between Gnosticism and psychology.
My best wishes!
Yours cordially,

Carl Jung on Jones book about Freud. (2015-08-06 14:07)

To E . A. Bennet
My dear Bennet, 2 1 November 1953

7112

Thank you very much for kindly sending me Jones's book about Freud.
The incident on page 348 is correct, only the setting in which it occurred is entirely distorted.
It was a discussion about Amenophis IV and the fact that he scratched out his father's name on the monuments to put his own in its place, and in the famous manner this was explained as a negative father-complex owing to which everything Amenophis created-his art, his religion and his poetry-was nothing but resistance against the father.
No notice was taken of the fact that other Pharaohs have done the same.
Now, this derogatory way of judging Amenophis IV got my goat and I expressed myself pretty strongly.
That was the immediate cause of Freud's accident.
Nobody ever asks me how things really were; one only gives a one-sided and twisted representation of my relation to him.
I notice with great interest that the Royal Society of Medicine begins to get interested in my "contributions to the medical science."
Hoping to see you again in the future, not too far away,
I remain,
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 133.

Carl Jung on Albert Schweitzer (2015-08-06 14:31)

To Pastor Willi Bremi
Dear Pastor Bremi, 11 December 1953
My very best thanks for the great and joyful surprise you have given me with your splendid book.
I am already reading it eagerly and have learnt much from it that I did not know very well before or even at all.

You know how to present a synoptic view without glossing over essentials.
I am now about a third of the way through.
It is interesting and positively thrilling to see how it comes to grips with the problems of our time.
So far I can follow and agree with you everywhere, only Albert Schweitzer raises a few questions.
I rate this man and his scientific achievements very highly and admire his gifts and versatility.
But I can see no particular merit in his recognition that Christ and the apostles erred in their expectation of the parousia and that this disappointment had repercussions on the development of ecclesiastical dogma.
We have known this for a long time.
That he said it out loud was no more than scientific decency.
This fact appears in such a glaring light only because it contrasts so strongly with the pusillanimity and dishonesty of others who knew it all along but did not want to admit it.
So far as I know, Schweitzer has given no answer to the conclusion that Christ is thereby irremediably relativized.
What has he to say to that?
What does he do with this shattering admission that Christ was wrong and therefore, perhaps, didn't see clearly in other matters too?
For him Christ is the "supreme authority," primus inter pares, and one of the best founders of religion along with Pythagoras, Zarathustra, Buddha, Confucius, etc.
But that was not how it was originally meant; at any rate no Christian creed and least of all Karl Barth would subscribe to such a judgment.
Every well-meaning rationalist and even the Freemasons and anthroposophists with their mental sloppiness could endorse the formula "supreme authority" without hesitation.
Faced with the truly appalling afflictio animae of the European man, Schweitzer abdicated from the task incumbent on the theologian, the cura anirnarum, and studied medicine in order to treat the sick bodies of natives.
For the native this is very gratifying, and I am the first to laud those doctors in the tropics who risked their lives, and frequently lost them, on lonely outposts and under more dangerous circumstances.
Yet none of these dead who rest in African earth is surrounded by the halo of a Protestant saint.
Nobody speaks of them.
Schweitzer is doing no more than his professional duty, like any other medical missionary.
Every doctor in the tropics would like nothing better than to build his own hospital on his lonely outpost, but unhappily he hasn't Schweitzer's talent for using money-making lectures and soul-stirring organ recitals for this purpose.
To put it the other way round: What would one think of a highly gifted surgeon and almost irreplaceable specialist who, coming upon a medical enigma, suddenly got himself trained as a Franciscan Father in order to read the Mass to peasants in the remotest corner of Lotschental and hear their confessions?
The Catholic Church would perhaps beatify him and after a few hundred years canonize him ad maiorem ecclesiae gloriam.
But what would Protestant reason, not to mention the Medical Association, have to say about it?
I'm afraid I can only feel it as painful that Schweitzer found the answer to catastrophic conclusion of his Quest of the Historical Jesus in abandoning the cura animarum in Europe and becoming a white saviour to the natives.
A fatal analogy with Nietzsche springs to mind: "God is dead" and the Superman is born, fully iii accordance with the old rule that people who repudiate the gods become gods themselves (example on a grand scale: Russia!).
A relativized Christ is no longer the same as the Christ of the gospels.
Anyone who relativizes him is in danger of becoming a saviour himself.
And where can that best be done? Well, in Africa.
I know Africa and I also know how the white doctor is worshipped there, how touchingly and how seductively!
Schweitzer has left it to the Christians in Europe to find out what can be done with a relativized Christ.
Allow me a few words on the ideal of caritas christiana.
It is a gift or a charisma like faith.
There are people who by nature are loving and kind, just as there are people who by nature believe and trust.
For them love and faith are a natural expression of life which also benefits their fellow men.
For the others, less gifted or not gifted at all, they are barely attainable ideals, a convulsive effort which is felt by their fellows too.

Here we come up against the question that is always overlooked: Who does the loving and who does the believing?
In other words, everything may very well depend on who performs a certain activity or how the agent of a function is constituted, for "the right means in the hands of the wrong man" works mischief, as Chinese wisdom rightly says.
How induce the necessary metanoia if a relativized Christ grips us as much as or as little as a Lao-tse or Mohammed?
Does the religious relationship really mean nothing but submission to an authority declared to be infallible?
Should we all, following Schweitzer's banner, emigrate to Africa and cure native diseases when our own sickness of soul cries to heaven?
When you write "from Luther to Schweitzer" this raises the question: Do you put Luther and Schweitzer for comparison on the same plane?
If yes, then the further question arises: What innovation or guidance has Schweitzer brought to the world?
He is an eminent scholar and researcher, a brilliant organist, and a medical benefactor to the natives in Lambarene.
He has voiced the well-known fact that Christ was deceived about the parousia and has thus presented the world with a relativized and locally conditioned Christ.
The same honour could also be accorded to Prof. Volz, who has given an impressive account of Yahweh's daemonism.
Is this Yahweh also the God of the New Testament?
It seems to me that the fate of Protestantism depends in large measure on the answer to these two questions.
In point of charity, Schweitzer's philanthropic activity hardly bears comparison with the achievements of Pastor von Bodelschwingh, General Booth, and countless other Sancti minores of Protestantism.
It seems to me, also, that the metaphysical foundations of belief as well as of ethical demands are not a matter of indifference.
What one usually hears, "You should want to believe and love," stands in direct contrast to the charismatic character of these gifts.
The doctor may occasionally tell a demoralized patient, "You can also want to get well," without seriously supposing that the illness is thereby cured and his knowledge and skill are superfluous.
The sermon is utterly inept as a cura animarum since the sickness is an individual affair and cannot be cured in a lecture hall.
The doctor has to take account of individual dispositions even when treating only the body.
In even higher degree the cura animarum is an individual affair that cannot be dealt with from the pulpit.
The answer to the above questions seems to me urgent because no one interested in religion can help seeing in the long run that the Protestant conception of God is unclarified and the Reedemer a dubiousauthority.
How can one pray to relativized gods when one is no longer a pre-Christian?
I beg you, my dear Pastor, not to take my layman's questions amiss.
I am not out to criticize Schweitzer personally.
I am personally not acquainted with him.
But I am concerned about religious problems since they affect not only me myself but also my professional activity.
The book I have sent you as a return gift may elucidate for you the points of contact between psychology and theological questions.
As a parallel to your mandala I enclose a clipping from the BBC Journal.
Again with best thanks,
Very sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung
P.S. Perhaps you will allow me to draw your attention to p. 525.
There you derive myth from rational reflections.
This viewpoint is superseded.
All mythological ascents and descents derive from primitive psychic phenomena, i.e., from the trance states of sorcerers as found in the universal dissemination of shamanism.
The trance is regularly bound up with the recitation of journeys to heaven or hell.
Other regular features are the climbing of the tree (world-tree, world mountain, world-axis), reaching the heavenly abode (village, city), winning the heavenly bride (nuptiae coelestes, hierosgamos), or the descent to the underworld or world of the dead, or to the ”Mother of Animals” at the bottom of the sea.

All these are genuine psychic phenomena which can still be observed today in modified form.
In the Christian tradition you find the same mythologem in St. Augustine (Serm. Suppos. 1 20,8):
”Procedit Christus quasi sponsus de thalamo suo, praesagio nuptiarum exiit ad campum saeculi . . . pervenit usque ad crucis torum et ibi firmavit ascendendo coniugium; ubi cum sentiret anhelantem in suspiriis creaturam commercia pietatis se pro coniuge dedit ad poenam . . . et copulavit sibi perpetuo iure matronam.”
The arbor crucis11 is here interpreted as ”marriage bed” (torus).
The most recent and perhaps most complete collection of shamanistic phenomenology is M. Eliade’s Le Chamanisme, 1951.
Here we have an archetypal psychic experience which can crop up spontaneously everywhere.
The archetype is part of the psychic substructure and has nothing to do with astronomical or meteorological phenomena. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 139-144.

Carl Jung on “Free Will. (2015-08-06 19:24)

To the Rev. S.C.V. Bowman
Dear Sir, 10 December 1953
Your problem of the liberum arbitrium has of course many aspects which I wouldn’t know how to deal with in the frame of a letter.
I only can say that as far as consciousness reaches, the will is understood to be free, i.e., that the feeling of freedom accompanies your decisions no matter if they are really free or not.
The latter question cannot be decided empirically.
Where you are not conscious, there can obviously be no freedom.
Through the analysis of the unconscious, you increase the amount of freedom.
A complete consciousness would mean an equally complete freedom and responsibility.
If unconscious contents approaching the sphere of consciousness are not analysed and integrated, then the sphere of your freedom is even diminished through the fact that such contents are activated and gain more compelling influence upon consciousness than when they were completely unconscious.

I don't think that there are any great difficulties in this line of approach.
The actual difficulty, as I see it, begins with the problem of how to deal with the integrated formerly unconscious Contents.
This, however, cannot be dealt with by correspondence.
Hoping to see you in spring,
I remain,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 139.

Carl Jung and the relativized authority of the Christ figure (2015-08-07 05:02)

To Pastor Willi Bremi
Dear Pastor Bremi, 26 December 1953
Well knowing how numerous and exacting the duties of a clergyman are during feast days, I had not expected such a prompt and comprehensive answer.
There was no hurry at all.
It was very kind of you to explain what is the subjective significance of Schweitzer for you.
The volte face he made is unquestionably impressive.
But I must confess that nihilism was never a problem for me.
I had enough and more than enough reality on my own doorstep.
What interests me much more in the case of Schweitzer is the problem his critique has left behind for the religious-minded layman: the relativized authority of the Christ figure.

What does Protestant theology say about that?
I know Bultmann's answer.
It doesn't enlighten me.
Karl Barth, like the Catholic Church, can overlook this problem (and for the same reasons).
Reading your detailed account of Kierkegaard, I was once again struck by the discrepancy between the perpetual talk about fulfilling God's will and reality: when God appeared to him in the shape of "Regina" he took to his heels.
It was too terrible for him to have to subordinate his autocratism to the love of another person.
Nevertheless K. saw something very essential and at the same time very terrifying: that it is God's "passion to love and be loved."
Naturally it was just this quality that struck K. most forcibly.
One could ascribe plenty of other passions to God which are just as obvious and emphasize his old Jewish character even more strongly-which brings us back to Question: Is Yahweh identical with the God of the New Testament?
Please don't let yourself be rushed by my letters.
I am quite content to hope for an occasional short answer.
It is not intellectual curiosity that prompts such questions; I myself am asked so many things that I seize every favourable opportunity to be taught better.
With best wishes for the New Year,
Very sincerely yours,

Carl Jung: Midrashim the symbol of the eagle is ascribed to the prophet Elijah (2015-08-07 13:44)

To 0. Schrenk
Dear Professor Schrenk, 18 November 1953
Thank you very much for your friendly letter which I received in the spring of this year.
I was ill then and unable to attend to my correspondence, so unfortunately your letter has remained unanswered.
But I would like to take it up again now because it contains many things of importance.
The ”professor and his daughter” is a well-known modern image for the archetype of the Old Man and his daughter in Gnosis: Bythos and Sophia.
You will surely remember the interesting love-story of Sophia in the Adversus Haereses of Irenaeus.
Of course it is unavoidable, if you read archetypal material, that the primordial images in your unconscious will be affected.

When you read books that address you personally there is always the danger of mimicry, and there are far too many people who think that's all there is to it. But if you have an honest and critical attitude towards yourself, you will soon see how bogus this is.
Everything wants to be lived, positively or negatively.
As for your colleague's dream, I have since discovered that in the Midrashim the symbol of the eagle is ascribed to the prophet Elijah, who soars like an eagle over the earth and spies out the secrets of the human heart.
I know from experience that for most Jews these old traditions have passed into oblivion, but come alive again at the slightest provocation and sometimes release the most intense feelings of anxiety.
Your remark about the Swabian vicarage is on the right track in so far as my maternal grandmother was a Faber (Germanization of Favre du Faure) and, I think, came from Tuttlingen.
She married my grandfather, Samuel Preiswerk, head of the reformed clergy in Basel.
I have always suspected that my blessed grandfather laid a very strange egg into my mixture.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung: It (Bollingen Foundation) is a shining beacon in the darkness of the atomic age. (2015-08-07 14:03)

To John D. Barrett
Dear Barrett, 11 February 1954

Many thanks for kindly sending me my royalty statements.
Recently I saw Kurt Wolff and his wife; we talked about many things although not exactly about the things I want to mention in this letter.
From a number of mutually independent American reactions to the general purpose and activity of the Bollingen Foundation, I concluded that the said Foundation must be an unusual exception in the United States.
I got the impression of a small island in an infinite sea of misunderstanding and flatness.
I didn't realize what it means for the level of education when there is an almost complete absence of the humanities, and now can more appreciate the genius of Mrs. Mellon who planned the Bollingen Foundation with Paul Mellon's generous aid.
I just wanted to let you know that it is difficult for a European to size up such a mental condition which he does not know from his own country.
When I hear of the difficulties of my pupils in the States whose main task is teaching, I am profoundly impressed by the effects of a one-sided education in natural sciences; all the more I know how to appreciate the cultural importance of your Foundation.
It is a shining beacon in the darkness of the atomic age.
I heard that my books are well on the way, and I am quite overwhelmed by the speed with which they are turned out from the press.
Thank you personally for all the trouble you have had in getting the things on the way, and your patience with my impatience.
Hoping you have begun this new year with an optimistic outlook, I remain,
Yours cordially,

Carl Jung on children who invented fairy tales (2015-08-07 15:39)

To John Symonds
Dear Sir, 13 October 1953

The quotation you have kindly sent me is indeed very interesting.
Thank you very much for it.
I know a case in my own experience where children who have been brought up in a too rationalistic way, that is have been deprived of a proper knowledge of the fairy world, have invented fairy tales all by themselves, obviously to fill the gap left by the stupid prejudices of the adults.
I know the book about The Great Beast.
It is indeed beastly beyond words, and very good reading for people who have too optimistic a view of man.
Thanking you,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 131.

Carl Jung on the “Debacle of Old Age.” (2015-08-07 16:22)

To Aniela Jaffe
Dear Aniela, Bollingen, 16 September 1953
Forgive me for answering your last letter only now.
I was swamped with proof-reading and correspondence.
On top of that the English proofs of ”Synchronicity” with a lot of questions about terminology.
I have at least 3 hours of writing to do 4 days a week.
That is the maximum I can accomplish without having to pay for the excess with disturbed sleep and heart symptoms.
I have about 5 MSS to read here and besides that a lot of little jobs to do in and about the house.
Everything goes slow, and I have to spare myself as my heartbeat is still arrhythmical.
In general I’m getting better, as I can sleep properly again.
Luckily the weather in the last weeks has been wonderfully kind to me.
Nothing doing with the mountains.

It’s all too complicated.
I can walk only for an hour at most and you get nowhere with that.
I see to my horror that I talk only of myself.
Please excuse this senile egoism.
The 79th year is 80 - 1, and that is a terminus a quo which you can’t help taking seriously.
The provisionalness of life is indescribable.
Everything you do, whether watching a cloud or cooking soup, is done on the edge of eternity and is followed by the suffix of infinity.
It is meaningful and futile at once.
And so is oneself, a wondrously living centre and at the same time an instant already sped.
One is and is not.
This frame of mind encompasses me and hems me in.
Only with an effort can I look beyond into a semi-self-subsistent world I can barely reach, or which leaves me behind.
Everything is right, for I lack the power to alter it.
This is the debacle of old age: ”Je sais bien qu’a la fin vous me mettrez a bas.”
Cordially,

Carl Jung: The dream of the horse represents the union with the animal soul... (2015-08-07 16:50)

To E . L. Grant Sharon Watson
Dear Mr. Watson, 25 January 1954
Your dream is remarkable.
The dream of the horse represents the union with the animal soul, which you have missed for a long time.
The union produces a peculiar state of mind, namely an unconscious thinking that enables you to realize the natural progress of the mind in its own sphere. You can understand it as the natural thought process in the unconscious or as an anticipation of post-mortal mental life.
(This is a serious possibility inasmuch as the psyche is, at least partially, independent of space and time. Cf. Rhine's experiments with ESP.)
The feet represent "standpoint"; Hindus = eastern standpoint.
The dream shows your transmutation from the Western outlook to the Eastern realization of the atman = self and its identity with the universal atman.
You proceed beyond the ego to ever-widening horizons, where the atman gradually reveals its universal aspect.
You integrate your animal, your parents, all the people you love (they all live in you and you are no more separated from them).
This is the secret of John XVI I: 20 sqq. and at the same time the essential Hindu doctrine of the atman-purusha.
Our unconscious definitely prefers the Hindu interpretation of immortality.
There is no loneliness, but all-ness or infinitely increasing completeness.
Such dreams occur at the gateway of death.
They interpret the mystery of death.

They don’t predict it but they show you the right way to approach the end.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 145-146

Carl Jung: Not in vain Christ insists upon ”becoming like unto children,”.. (2015-08-08 03:50)

To John Weir Perry
Dear Perry, 8 February 1954
I am sorry that you had to wait so long until you got my answer to your question.
All sorts of things have intervened in the meantime, and my health also has misbehaved.
I will try to answer your question as simply as possible; it is a difficult problem as you probably realize.
First of all, the regression that occurs in the rebirth or integration process is in itself a normal phenomenon inasmuch as you observe it also with people that don’t suffer from any kind of psychopathic ailment.
When it is matter of a schizoid condition, you observe very much the same, but with the difference that there is a marked tendency of the patient to get stuck in the archetypal material.
In this case, the rebirth process is repeated time and again.
This is the reason why the classical schizophrenia develops stereotype conditions.
Up to a certain point, you have the same experience with neurotic individuals.
This is so because the archetypal material has a curious fascinating influence which tries to assimilate the individuals altogether.
They are tempted to identify with any of the archetypal figures characteristic of the rebirth process.
For this reason schizophrenic cases retain nearly always a certain markedly childish behaviour.
You can observe approximately the same with neurotic patients; either they develop inflations on account of identification with the archetypal figures, or they develop a childish behaviour on account of the identity with the divine child.
In all these cases the real difficulty is to free the patients from the fascination.

Schizoid cases as well as neurotic ones very often repeat their personal infancy story.
This is a favourable sign in so far as it is an attempt to grow up into the world again as they had done before, viz. in their infancy.
They are children again after rebirth exactly as you say happened in the Taurobolia.
As a rule, you haven't to take care of making patients revive their infantile reminiscences; generally they produce it all by themselves, because it is an unavoidable mechanism, and, as I said, a teleological attempt to grow up again.
If you go quietly along with the material the patients produce, you will see that they can't help getting into their infantile reminiscences and habits and ways, and that they project particularly the parental images.
Wherever there is a transference, you get unavoidably involved and integrated into the patient's family atmosphere.
The insistence of the Freudians upon making people revive their past simply shows that in the Freudian analysis people don't naturally take to living their past again, simply because they have resistance against the analyst.
If you let the unconscious have its natural way, then you may be sure everything the patient needs to know will be brought up, and you may be equally sure that everything you bring out from the patient by insistence on theoretical grounds will not be integrated into the patient's personality, at least not as a positive value, but maybe as a lasting resistance.
Did it never occur to you that in my analysis we talked very little of "resistance," while in the Freudian analysis it is the term that most frequently occurs?
When it comes to schizoid patients, there of course the difficulty of liberating them from the grip of the unconscious is much greater than in ordinary neurotic cases.
Often they can't find their way back from their archetypal world to the equivalent personal infantile world where there would be a chance for liberation.
Not in vain Christ insists upon "becoming like unto children," which means a conscious resolution to accept the attitude of the child as long as such an attitude is demanded by the circumstances.
Since it is always the problem of accepting the shadow, it needs the simplicity of a child to submit to such a seemingly impossible task.
So when you find that the rebirth process shows a tendency to repeat itself, you must realize that the fascination of the archetypal material has still to be overcome, perhaps because your help has been insufficient or the patient's attitude was unfavourable to it.
But this aetiological question matters little.
You simply must try again to convert the archetypal fascination into a child-like simplicity.
There are of course many cases where our help is insufficient or comes too late, but that is so in all branches of medicine.
I always try to follow the path of nature and I avoid as much as possible the application of theoretical viewpoints, and I have never regretted this principle.
I include a charming example of a particularly enlightened American doctor just for your amusement or as a sort of consolation in case you don't get the desired understanding from your contemporaries.
Hoping you are in good health,
I remain,
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung
P.S. I think we underrate in Europe the difficulties you have to put up with in America as soon as you try to communicate something to your audience that demands a certain humanistic education.
I am afraid that your educational system produces the same technological and scientific one-sidedness and the same social welfare idealism as Russia.
Most of your psychologists, as it looks to me, are still in the XVIIIth century inasmuch as they believe that the human psyche is tabula rasa at birth, while all somewhat differentiated animals are born with specific instincts.
Man's psyche seems to be less [differentiated] than a weaver bird's or a bee's. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 148-150.

Carl Jung: I would abandon the term ”Gnostic” without compunction were it not a swearword in the mouths of theologians. (2015-08-08 16:56)

To Erich Neumann

7130

Dear Neumann, 30 January 1954
Best thanks for your friendly letter.
I was just writing to Hull, who is to insert a passage on your work in the English edition of Symbole der Wandlung.
The transition to the New Year has not passed without difficulties: liver and intestine revolted against the too oily hotel cooking in Locarno, though this had its good side in that my holiday was 1-1/2 weeks longer than expected.
I have already penetrated a good way into your ”Kulturentwicklung” and shall be able to read further as soon as the mountain of letters that have accumulated during my absence is cleared away.
I would abandon the term ”Gnostic” without compunction were it not a swearword in the mouths of theologians.
They accuse me of the very same fault they commit themselves: presumptuous disregard of epistemological barriers.
When a theologian says ”God,” then God has to be, and be just as the magician wants, without the latter feeling in any way impelled to make clear to himself and his public exactly which concept he is using.
He fraudulently offers his (limited) God-concept to the naive listener as a special revelation.
What sort of God is Buber talking about, for instance? Yahweh? With or without privatio boni?
And if Yahweh, where does he say that this God is certainly not the God of the Christians?
This underhand way of doing holy business I fling in the teeth of theologians of all colours.
I do not maintain that my ”gnostic” images are a faithful reflection of their transcendental background, binding on everyone, or that this is conjured up by my naming it.
It is evident that Buber has a bad conscience, as he publishes only his letters and does not represent me fairly, since I am a mere Gnostic, though he hasn’t the faintest idea of what the Gnostic was moved by.
Meanwhile with best regards and wishes,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung and the relativized authority of the Christ figure. (2015-08-08 23:08)

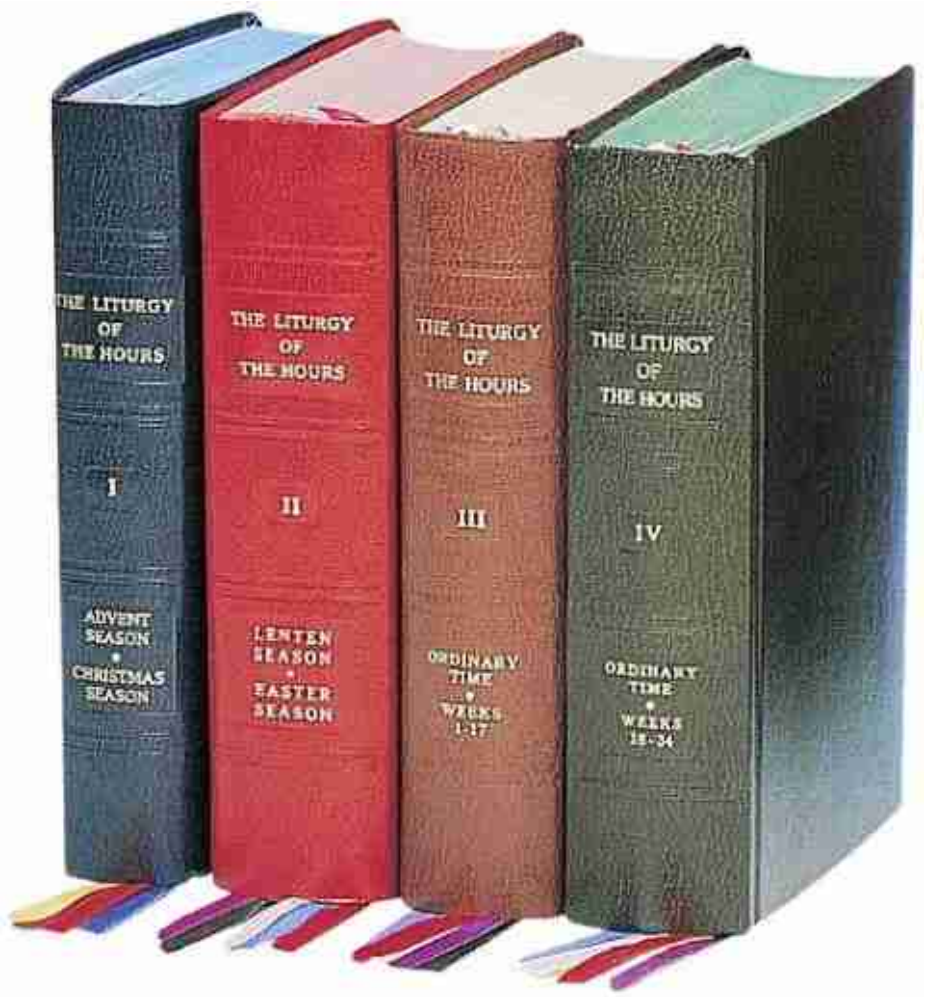
Carl Jung: But theologians suffer from the fact that when they say ”God,” then that God is.
(2015-08-08 23:19)



To G . A . van den Bergh von Eysinga
Dear Sir, 13 February 1954
In the meantime, somebody helped me to a careful excerpt of your critique.
There seems to me some misunderstanding of my basic ideas.
First of all, I am not a philosopher and my concepts are not philosophical and abstract, but empirical, viz. biological.
The concept generally misunderstood is that of the archetype, which covers certain biological facts and is not a hypostatized idea at all.
The ”archetype” is practically synonymous with the biological concept of the behaviour pattern.
But as the latter designates external phenomena chiefly, I have chosen the term ”archetype” for ”psychic pattern.”

We don't know whether the weaver-bird beholds a mental image while it follows an immemorial and inherited model in building its nest, but there is no doubt that no weaver-bird in our experience has ever invented its nest.
It is as if the image of nest-building were born with the bird.
As no animal is born without its instinctual patterns, there is no reason whatever to believe that man should be born without his specific forms of physiological and psychological reactions.
As animals of the same kind show the same instinctual phenomena all over the world, man also shows the same archetypal forms no matter where he lives.
As animals have no need to be taught their instinctive activities, so man also possesses his primordial psychic patterns and repeats them spontaneously, independently of any kind of teaching.
Inasmuch as man is conscious and capable of introspection, it is quite possible that he can perceive his instinctual patterns in the form of archetypal representations.
As a matter of fact, these possess the expected degrees of universality (cf. the remarkable identity of shamanistic Structures).
It is also possible to observe their spontaneous reproduction in individuals entirely ignorant of traditions of this sort.
Such facts prove the autonomy of the archetypes.
The pattern of behaviour is autonomous also inasmuch as it enforces its own application as soon as the general conditions allow.
Nobody would assume that the biological pattern is a philosophical assumption like the Platonic idea or a Gnostic hypostasis.
The same is true of the archetype.
Its autonomy is an observable fact and not a philosophical hypostasis.
I am a physician and I am practising as a psychiatrist, thus having plenty of opportunity to observe mental phenomena which are unknown to philosophy in spite of the fact that Pierre Janet's Automatisme psychologique was published almost 70 years ago.
Your critique of my poetic license: the night surrounding the mulier amicta sole is correct in so far as the text does not mention the night.
But it isn't so far away when you can see the dragon removing one third of the stars from heaven.
My mythologem obviously points to Leto, to the heroes' mothers in general, and to the matriarchal mother goddesses and their chthonic and nocturnal associations.
But this is hardly of any importance.
To mention another point: if Yahweh was not influenced by Satan, as you apparently assume, then he tortured Job against his own better conviction, which makes his case only worse.
Yahweh's amorality has nothing to do with a moral differentiation of the believers.
It exists still today and is recognized even by theological textbooks although his uncontrolled affects and his injustice are swallowed without the consequences even drawn by the Midrashim long ago. (F.i. the admonition to the Lord to remember his better qualities; the sounding of the shofar to remind him of murderous attempt against Isaac, etc.)
It is regrettable that you did not read my introductory remarks.
You might have discovered there my empirical standpoint without which-I grant you-my little book makes no sense at all.
Envisaged from a philosophical point of view without consideration of its psychological premise, it is sheer idiocy, from a theological angle nothing but downright blasphemy and from the standpoint of rationalistic commonsense a heap of illogical and feeble-minded phantasmata.
But psychology has its own proposition and its own working hypotheses based upon the observation of facts, i.e. (in our case) of the spontaneous reproduction of archetypal structures appearing in dreams as well as in psychoses.
If one doesn't know of these facts, it will be difficult to understand what is meant by "psychic reality" and "psychic autonomy."
I agree with you that my statements (in Antwort auf Hiob) are shocking, but not more, rather less so, than the manifestations of Yahweh's demonic nature in the OT.
The Midrashim are quite aware of it, and the Christian church had to invent that awful syllogism, the privatio boni, in order to annihilate the original ambivalence of the Jewish God.

But while the Catholic Church has at least a sort of sententia communis explaining the transmutation of Yahweh, who ad instar rhinocerotis had upset the world in the OT, into the God of love in the NT, Protestantism clings to an identity of the two gods and does not allow of a transformation of the One God. This is a scandalum.
But theologians suffer from the fact that when they say ”God,” then that God is.
But when I say ”God,” I know I have expressed my image of such a being and I am honestly not quite sure whether he is just like my image or not, even if I believe in God’s existence.
When Martin Buber speaks of God, he does not tell us which God, but he assumes that his God is the only one.
My God-image corresponds to an autonomous archetypal pattern.
Therefore I can experience God as if he were an object, but I need not assume that it is the only image.
I know I am dealing, as Kant says, with a ”symbolical anthropomorphism” which concerns ”language” (and mimic Representation in general) but not the object itself.
To criticize intentional or unintentional anthropomorphism is neither blasphemy, nor superstition, but wholly within the province of psychological criticism.
I remain, dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 151-154.

Carl Jung: For the first time man's cosmic responsibility is acknowledged. (2015-08-09 05:12)

To James Kirsch
Dear Kirsch, 16 February 1954
I scarcely think that the Jews have to accept the Christ symbol.

They need only understand its meaning.
Christ wanted to change Yahweh into a moral God of goodness, but in so doing he tore apart the opposites (Satan falling from heaven, Luke 1 0:1 8) that were united in him (God) though in an inharmonious and unconscious way; hence the suspension between the opposites at the crucifixion.
The purpose of the Christian reformation through Jesus was to eliminate the evil moral consequences that were caused by the amoral divine prototype. One cannot ”strain at a gnat and swallow a camel” (Matt. 23:24) or ”serve two masters” (Matt. 6:24) at the same time.
This moral differentiation is a necessary step on the way of individuation.
Without thorough knowledge of ”good and evil,” ego and shadow, there is no recognition of the self, but at most an involuntary and therefore dangerous identification with it.
The Jew has roughly the same moral development behind him as the Christian European, consequently he has the same problem.
A Jew can recognize the self in that hostile pair of brothers, Christ and Satan, as well as I can or perhaps even better, and with it the incarnation or Yahweh’s assimilation to man.
Naturally the status of man is profoundly altered because of this.
The Jew has the advantage of having long since anticipated the development of consciousness in his own spiritual history.
By this I mean the Lurianic stage of the Kabbalah, the breaking of the vessels and man’s help in restoring them.
Here the thought emerges for the first time that man must help God to repair the damage wrought by the Creation.
For the first time man’s cosmic responsibility is acknowledged.
Naturally it is a question of the self and not the ego, although the latter will be deeply affected.
That is the answer I would give a Jew.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 154-155.

Carl Jung on a review of Answer to Job. (2015-08-10 04:51)

To the Rev. Erastus Evans
Dear Mr. Evans, 17 February 1954
Allow me to tell you that I am profoundly grateful to you for your most remarkably objective review of my uncouth attempt to disturb the obnoxious somnolence of the guardians.
That is the way in which this damnable little book looks to me.
Habent sua fata libelli!
I would not have written this thing.
I had kept away from it studiously.
I had published before the volume Aion in polite language and as much man-made as possible.
It was not sufficient apparently, because I got ill and when I was in the fever it caught me and brought me down to writing despite my fever, my age, and my heart that is none too good.
I can assure you I am a moral coward as long as possible.
As a good little bourgeois citizen, I am lying low and concealed as deeply as possible, still shocked by the a mount of the indiscretions I have committed, swearing to myself that there would be no more of it because I want peace and friendly neighbourhood and a good conscience and the sleep of the just.
Why should I be the unspeakable fool to jump into the cauldron?
\Veil, I don't want to be melodramatic.
This is just for your personal information.

I have no merit and no proper guilt since I got to it ”like a dog to a kick,” as we say.
And the little moral coward I am goes on whining: why should I be always the one that collects all available kicks?
I tell you these things because you have been nice, just, and lenient with me.
The attribute ”coarse” is mild in comparison to what you feel when God dislocates your hip or when he slays the firstborn.
I bet Jacob’s punches he handed to the angel were not just caresses or polite gestures.
They were of the good hard kind; as you rightly say, ”with the gloves off.”
That is one side of my experiences with what is called ”God.”
”Coarse” is too weak a word for it. ”Crude,” ”violent,” ”cruel,” ”bloody,” ”hellish,” ”demonic” would be better.
That I was not downright blasphemous I owe to my domestication and polite cowardice.
And at each step I felt hindered by a beatific vision of which I’d better say nothing.
You have interpreted my thoughts most admirably.
There is only one point where it seems to me you slipped up, viz. in attributing the traditional, dogmatic, and ”colloquial” picture of Christ to me.
This is not my personal idea of Christ at all, as I am quite in sympathy with a much darker and harsher image of the man Jesus.
The dogmatic and traditional conception of Christ however must be and is made as bright as possible-lumen del umine-and the black substance all in the other corner.
You have probably been shocked by the idea of the ”hostile brethren” and the incomplete incarnation.
If it had been complete, the logical consequence, the parousia, would have taken place.
But Christ was in error about it.
Practically, it makes no difference whether the Christ of the gospels is undergoing an enantiodromia into the relentless judge of the Revelations, or the God of love becoming the Destroyer.
Christ has an opposite-the Antichrist or (and) the Devil.
If you see a bit too much darkness in his picture, you make him too much into the likeness of his father, and then it becomes difficult to understand why he taught a God so very different from the one of the OT.
Or you disown the whole Christian tradition of the better part of 1900 years.
Christ is most decidedly not the whole Godhead as God is lv ro 7T’iiv.
Christ is the Anthropos that seems to be a prefiguration of what the Holy Ghost is going to bring forth in the human being.
(I wish you would read my volume Aion, where you find most of the material behind Answer to Job.)
In a tract of the Lurianic Kabbalah, the remarkable idea is developed that man is destined to become God’s helper in the attempt to restore the vessels which were broken when God thought to create a world.
Only a few weeks ago, I came across this impressive doctrine which gives meaning to man’s status exalted by the incarnation.
I am glad that I can quote at least one voice in favour of my rather involuntary manifesto.
Or don’t you think that mankind should produce some adequate reflections before it blows itself up into eternity?
I realized something when fire was raining upon German cities and Hiroshima was flashed out of existence.
I thought it is a rather drastic world in which we live.
There is a proverb that says: a coarse block wants a coarse wedge.
No time for niceties!
This is one of the troubles of our Christianity.
I remain, dear Mr. Evans,
Yours gratefully,

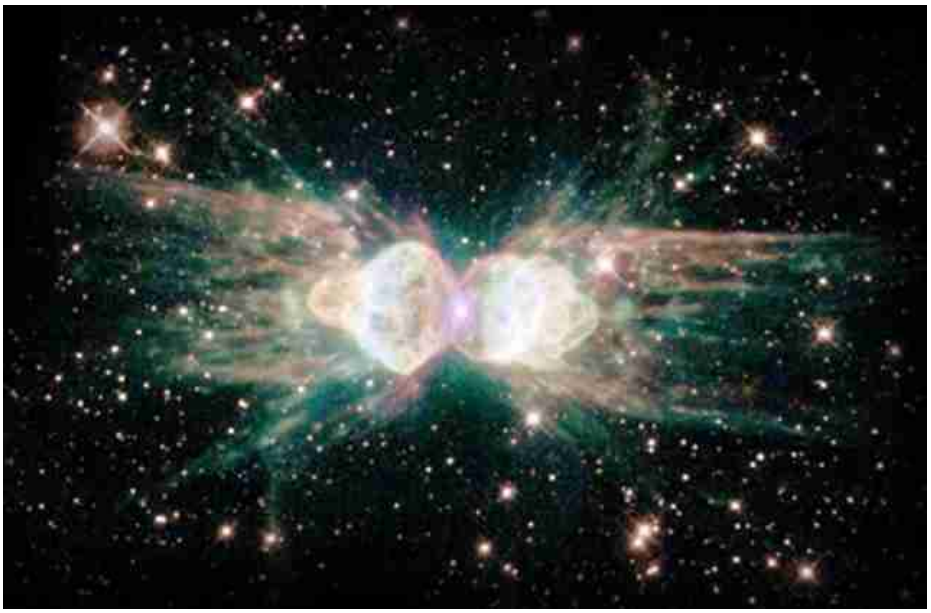
Carl Jung on ”Causality.” (2015-08-10 05:01)



Dear Dr. Schwarz, 2 March 1954
The concept of finality seems to me a logical complement of causality, and I therefore think that only the two aspects make up the sum total of causality.
Just as the connection between cause and effect is a necessity, so is the connection of the so-called final cause with the result.
Without necessity there is neither causality nor finality, although there are not a few people nowadays who treat the concept of causality very incautiously.
Finality shows itself in the teleological character of biological phenomena; but I would not know where finality could be pointed out in the realm of the inorganic.
The 4 aspects of causality make possible a homogeneous causal viewpoint but not a total one.
For this purpose, it seems to me, causality (in all its aspects) has to be complemented by acausality.
Not simply because freedom also is guaranteed in a law-bound world, but because freedom, i .e., acausality, does in fact exist.
In order to express such a proposition, however, one must have a ”rigorous” concept of causality, using the term ”causality” only when it is really a matter of necessary connections, and ”acausality” only when a causal connection is not even thinkable, e.g., in hysteronproteron, where an event in the present appears to be caused by a future event.
As for your question about faith, I must emphasize that there are apparently two realities: objective and subjective, by reason of the fact that objective reality can be established as being nonpsychic, whereas psychic reality cannot be established as being objective in the same sense.
But this is due primarily to the unavoidable premise that perception and judgment are themselves psychic, and that Consequently one cannot jump over one’s own head.
Nevertheless, the reality of the psyche can be established by means of verified statements or objectively verifiable symptoms.
Hoping I have answered your questions,
I remain,

Yours sincerely,

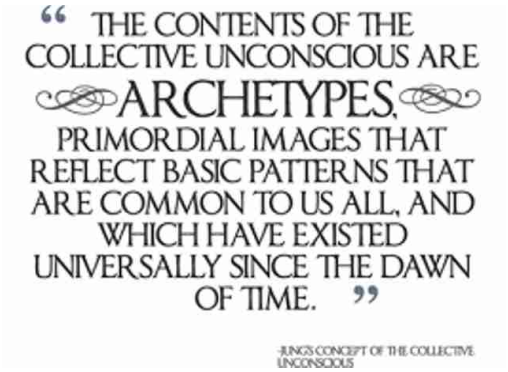
Carl Jung on the Collective Unconscious (2015-08-10 05:14)

To James Kirsch
Dear Kirsch, 5 March 1954

The integration of the collective unconscious amounts roughly to taking cognizance of the world and adapting to it.
This does not mean that one would have to learn to know the whole world, or that one must have lived in all climates and continents of the world.
The integration of the unconscious is always, of course, only a very relative affair, and refers only to the constellated material, not to its total theoretical scope.
John of the Cross's "Dark Night of the Soul" has nothing to do with this.
Rather, integration is a conscious confrontation, a dialectical process such as I have described in my essay "The Relations between the Ego and the Unconscious."
A great deal of fog seems to have spread itself over this point.
With best regards,
Yours very sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 159.

Carl Jung on the physical substratum of mental facts like archetypes (2015-08-10 08:30)



To D . Cappon
Dear Doctor Cappon, 15 March 1954
Concerning your question about the physical substratum of mental facts like archetypes, this is a problem I hardly dare to touch.
It invites all sorts of funny speculations, and that is exactly what I try to avoid.
If you say they repose on the genes, you can't go wrong.
Everything depends upon them.
The same question would arise with instincts.
Where are they localized?
With the vertebrates, one would assume that they are based upon the brain and its annexes, but where are they localized in an insect that has no brain?
Obviously, in the sympathetic nervous system.
You can also hold that an instinctual pattern being identical with an archetype is based upon our sympathicus.
But all this is mythology, quite unwarrantable from an epistemological standpoint, and just as inadmissible as these ridiculous fantasies about intra-uterine psychological experiences.
I am personally convinced that our mind corresponds with the physiological life of the body, but the way in which it is connected with the body is for obvious reasons unintelligible.
To speculate about such unknowable things is mere waste of time.
If you want to be quite accurate, both statements, viz. that the psyche is founded upon an organic process of the body, or that the psyche is independent of the body, are unanswerable.
The question of brain localization is an extremely delicate one, because when you destroy a certain part of the brain you destroy a certain function.

Yet you do not know whether you have really destroyed the function because it is quite possible that you have only destroyed the transmitter of that function, as if you have taken away the telephone apparatus which does not mean that you have killed its owner.
There is even no absolute certainty about the psyche being definitely dependent upon the brain since we know that there are facts proving that the mind can relativize space and time, as the Rhine experiments and general experience have proved sufficiently.
As I have already pointed out, the archetypes are the psychological representations of instinctual patterns, and behave exactly like these.
How did the instincts get into an individual?
Instincts have been inherited since time immemorial, and presumably have developed with the different species.
Thus, they are certainly in most cases millions of years old.
Also with regard to instincts, it is questionable if they continue to exist when you have destroyed their transmitter, i.e., whether they have been killed themselves.
It is quite obvious that it is not at all necessary to uncover the archetypes in every treatment of neurosis.
One can get along successfully with far less, but it is equally true that it is sometimes not at all in your hand to decide whether you will go into archetypes or not, since they turn up all by themselves, sometimes with a vehemence you wouldn't like.
I never look for archetypes and don't try to find them; enough when they come all by themselves.
This is almost regularly the case when an analysis lasts a bit long or when it is matter of a person with a somewhat vivacious mind.
1. There is no point in trying to make the patient understand archetypal material as long as he has not yet gained some insight into his personal complexes, and particularly into the nature of his shadow.
2. The patient may be practically cured without ever having heard of an archetype.
3. One has cured neurosis by the most astonishing means long before our modern psychology.

If there are no technical means, it is the sincerity of the doctor's attitude and his willingness to help that restore the impaired wholeness of the patient, but if you withhold a better technical knowledge, you wouldn't be able to get any proper result with less.
The successful therapeutic attitude always expects of you that you really do your best, no matter how good or how bad it is, or what kind of technique you apply.
Only you must be sure that you do the best you know.
I should not worry about all this localization talk.
It's practically all foolishness, and a remnant of the old brain mythology like the explanation of sleep through the contraction of the ganglia, which is by no means more intelligent than the localization of the psyche in the pituitary gland.
Hoping I have answered your question,
I remain, dear Doctor
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on the psychic cause of a car accident (2015-08-10 19:14)

To Philip Metman
Dear Mr. Metman, 27 March 1954
Many thanks for your kind letter, which interested me very much.
I gather with great concern that you have had a hair-breadth escape from a car accident.
The accident has affected only the outer shell, but evidently you and your wife were not affected physically by this broad hint.
Naturally this may have an inner connection with what you are writing, for experience shows that accidents of this sort are very often connected with creative energy which turns against us because somehow it is not given due heed.
This may easily happen, for we always judge by what we already know and very seldom listen to what we don't yet know.
Therefore we can easily take a step in the wrong direction or continue too long on the right path until it becomes the wrong one.
Then it may happen that in this rather ungentle way we are forced to change our attitude.
I shall soon turn to your manuscript for just now I am once again preoccupied willy-nilly with the question of synchronicity and astrology.
I have had to suppress the chapter on astrology altogether in the English edition, since apparently no one can understand it.
I am now reducing it to a few pages without any tables.
Maybe I shall succeed this time in making the risque joke of an acausal arrangement accessible to my public.
Meanwhile with best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
P.S. I would be glad to welcome you here on October 10th, but you know how it is in old age:
one promises something and knows that everything is only provisional. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 161-162.

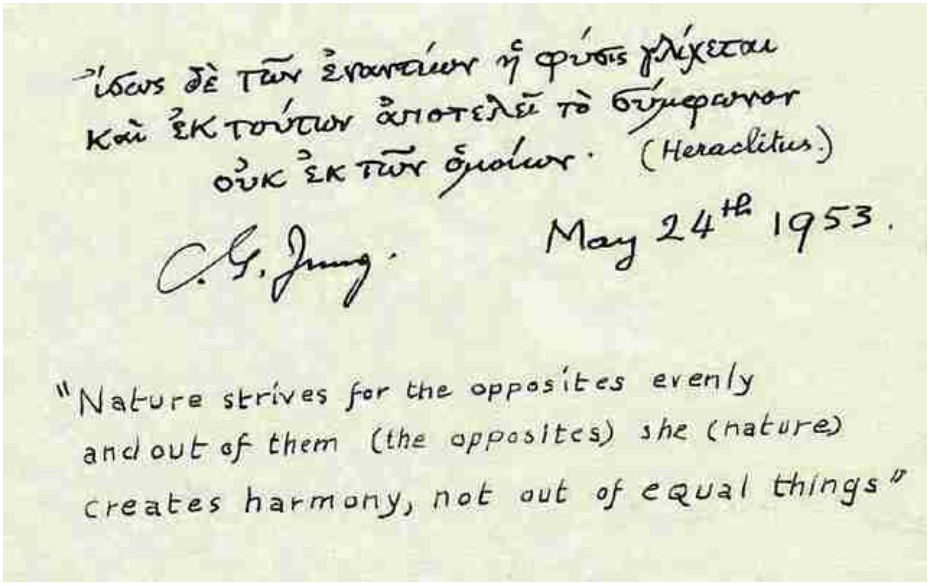
Carl Jung on his unfriendly and unobjective ”critics.” (2015-08-11 05:44)



To Aniela Jaffe
Dear Aniela, Bollingen, 6 April 1954
Best thanks for your excellent review = I have nothing to correct in it!
After all the rubbish that gets delivered to my house on my work, it is such a pleasure to find something understanding and friendly for once.
I often ask myself why by far the most of my ”critics” are so unfriendly and unobjective?
Is my style so irritating, or what is it in me that the world finds so offensive?
This is understandable with Job, for that was its purpose.
Now I have been irritated enough.
Your pious wishes for good weather were fulfilled only on Sunday, but then totally.
Now the weather is beastlier than ever, so that one can only huddle behind the stove.
I busy myself chiefly with cooking, eating and sleeping.
In between I am writing a long letter to Pater White.
He has-thanks be to God-chosen the better course of facing his difficulties with complete honesty.
I now see clearly what a fatal challenge my psychology is for a theologian but, it seems, not only for him.
I observe myself in the stillness of Bollingen and with all my experience of nearly eight decades must admit that I have found no rounded answer to myself.
I am just as much in doubt about myself as before, the more so the more I try to say something definite.
It is as though familiarity with oneself alienated one from oneself still further.
Cordially,
Yours ever,
C.G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 162-163.

Carl Jung's Letter to Calvin S. Hall (2015-08-11 07:34)

To Calvin S. Hall
Dear Sir, 6 October 1954
Thank you for kindly giving me an opportunity to glimpse into the psychology of an American psychologist.

Above all I am much encouraged by the fact that you were able to get something positive out of my incompetent work and I am deeply obliged to you
1) for your willingness to hear my impressions,
2) for the honesty and sincerity of your purpose, and
3) for your serious attempt to be impartial and to lay aside your prejudices.
You have left me however with a puzzle from which I can hardly extricate myself.
In the first place I cannot understand the peculiar way in which you present my work.
In order to make myself clear, I should like to use the following example:
Somebody sets out to present Mr. Evans' work in Crete to an ignorant audience.
In order to do so he talks almost exclusively of Evans' conjectures with reference to Minoan history and culture.
But why doesn't he mention what he has dug up in Knossos?
His conjectures are irrelevant in comparison with the facts and results of his excavations, and moreover his audience not knowing about his main merit is in no way prepared to understand what his conjectures are all about.
Thus you chiefly deal with words and names instead of giving substance.
I am thoroughly empirical and therefore I have no system at all.
I try to describe facts of which you merely mention the names.
I got the funny impression that, while you claim to present myself, you restrict yourself to my suit of clothes, which is altogether indifferent to me and is certainly not essential.
I have never claimed f.i. to know much about the nature of archetypes, how they originated or whether they originated at all, whether they are inherited or planted by the grace of God in every individual anew.
You even adduce the old-fashioned sophism of the non-inheritance of acquired peculiarities.
What about a mutation that maintains itself in the subsequent generations?
What about the funny things you can see on the Gahipagos?
If no change gets inherited, then nothing gets changed unless there is an infinite series of creative acts.
But I don't insist, as you can easily see, upon such sophistications.
Your harping on such utterly irrelevant conjectures probably hangs together with another puzzle which I should like to explain again by an example: Somebody tries to present Mr. Plato's philosophical work.
We in Europe should expect that anybody trying to carry out such a plan would read all of Plato's writings and not only barely half and chiefly the earlier part of them.
Such a procedure would not qualify and could hardly be called responsible or reliable.
One could not even advocate it with an author as insignificant as myself.
The last and greatest puzzle is the funny prejudice which reminds me vividly of that vulgar idea that an alienist must be necessarily crazy because he deals with lunatics.
If you call me an occultist because I am seriously investigating religious, mythological, folkloristic and philosophical fantasies in modern individuals and ancient texts, then you are bound to diagnose Freud as a sexual pervert since he is doing likewise with sexual fantasies, and a psychologically inclined criminologist must needs be a gaol-bird.
A typical example of my later work is Psychology and Alchemy.
It is not my responsibility that alchemy is occult and mystical, and I am just as little guilty of the mystical delusions of the insane or the peculiar creeds of mankind.
Perhaps you have noticed that I follow the well-known method of comparative anatomy or of comparative history of religions or that of deciphering difficult ancient texts, as you can easily see in Psych. And Alch.
Dealing with such fantasies I have to adduce analogous material, which is to be found in mystical texts or in myths and religions.
Or do you assume that psychopaths have no fantasies of this kind?
Please cf. my book: Symbols of Transformation.
I cannot understand at all how dealing with sex fantasies should be more objective or more scientific than dealing with any other kind of fantasy, f.i. the religious one.
But obviously the sex fantasy must be true and real, while the religious fantasy is not true, it is an error and should not be, and whoever deals with it is highly unscientific.
Such logic transcends my horizon.

Being a physician and citizen I am not only justified but morally bound to warn or advise publicly when I see fit.
I am not inclined to preach, but I feel socially responsible and I have made up my mind not to participate in the arch-sin of the intellectual, namely the Trahison des clercs as a French author calls this particular form of infantile autoeroticism.
This is the reason why I am interested in the social aspects of psychology.
It is most surprising to me that almost none of the critiques of my work ever mentions the facts I am producing.
As a rule they ignore them completely.
But I should like to know how they would explain the astounding parallelism of individual and historical symbolism not reducible to tradition.
This is the real problem.
To deny the facts is too simple and too cheap.
It never pays to underrate new ideas or facts.
I hope you don't mind my giving you my impressions without polite detours.
You can dismiss them as irrelevant, but it won't be to the advantage of the progress of science.
I shall always remember the time when Freud disturbed the peaceful slumber of the medical and philosophical faculties by his shocking discoveries, which are now taken into serious consideration.
A professor once repudiated my statements saying: "But your argument collides with the doctrine of the unity of Consciousness.
Therefore you are wrong." This is an answer worthy of the XII Ith century, but unfortunately it happened in the XXth century.
Your typescript with my notes follows.
Hoping that my criticism does not offend you,
I remain,
Yours respectfully,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 184-187.

Carl Jung on ”Freedom.” (2015-08-11 07:46)

Dear Dr. Rudin, 1 October 1954
My very best thanks for kindly sending me your interesting essay on freedom.
The latest developments of scientific thinking, especially in physics, but recently also in psychology, make it clear that ”freedom” is a necessary correlate to the purely statistical nature of the concept of causality.

In particular it comes into the category of meaningful coincidences, which I have discussed in my book on synchronicity.
Freedom could be put in doubt only because of the one-sided and uncritical overvaluation of causality, which has been elevated into an axiom although-strictly speaking-it is nothing but a mode of thought.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 182-183.

Carl Jung on ”Our Daily Bread.” (2015-08-11 09:56)

Dear Frau Loos, 7 September 1954
It was unexpectedly kind of you to remember my birthday.
I am not surprised you forgot it at first, but I am astonished that you remembered.
With regard to the lack of appreciation of writers in Switzerland, one must never forget that Switzerland is a very small country and has never trusted its own taste in spite of cultural philistinism and the vogue for art, and anyway you can’t expect publishers to be idealists.
Rascher for instance wastes his money on idiotic picture-books, but only because this is his hobby and not a well-founded artistic judgment.
As you wish, I am sending you a copy of my book Von den Wurzeln des Bewusstseins.
The petition for ”daily bread” is appropriate under all circumstances, although in Matthew 6:11 it reads:
”Panem nostrum supersubstantialis da nobis hodie” (Give us this day our super-substantial bread).

At least that is how St. Jerome translated the Greek word, which occurs only in Matthew and has undergone various interpretations, banal or otherwise.
But Jerome will have known what he was doing, especially when you see what is said in the ensuing verses, where Christ admonishes his disciples not to worry about their daily needs, which is naturally very much easier in a warm country than in our climate, of which Zola rightly said: "Mais notre misere a froid."
With best wishes,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 182.

Carl Jung: ... man will be essentially God and God man. (2015-08-11 10:31)

To Father Victor White
Dear Victor, Bollingen, 10 April 1954
Your letter has been lying on my desk waiting for a suitable time to be answered.
In the meantime I was still busy with a preface I had promised to P. Radin and K. Kerenyi.
They are going to bring out a book together about the figure of the trickster.
He is the collective shadow. I finished my preface yesterday.
I suppose you know the Greek-Orthodox priest Dr. Zacharias?
He has finished his book representing a reception, or better-an attempt-to integrate Jungian psychology into Christianity as he sees it.
Dr. Rudin S.J. from the Institute of Apologetics did not like it.
Professor Gebhard Frei on the other hand was very positive about it.
I am puzzled about your conception of Christ and I try to understand it.
It looks to me as if you were mixing up the idea of Christ being human and being divine.
Inasmuch as he is divine he knows, of course, everything, because all things macrocosmic are supposed to be microcosmic as well and can therefore be said to be known by the self. (Things moreover behave as if they were known.)

It is an astonishing fact, indeed, that the collective unconscious seems to be in contact with nearly everything.
There is of course no empirical evidence for such a generalization, but plenty of it for its indefinite extension.
The sententia, therefore: animam Christi nihil ignoravisse etc. is not contradicted by psychological experience.
Rebus sic stantibus, Christ as the self can be said ab initio cognovisse omnia etc.
I should say that Christ knew his shadow-Satan-whom he cut off from himself right in the beginning of his career.
The self is a unit, consisting however of two, i.e., of opposites, otherwise it would not be a totality.
Christ has consciously divorced himself from his shadow.
Inasmuch as he is divine, he is the self, yet only its white half.
Inasmuch as he is human, he has never lost his shadow completely, but seems to have been conscious of it.
How could he say otherwise: ”Do not call me good . . . ” ?
It is also reasonable to believe that as a human he was not wholly conscious of it, and inasmuch as he was unconscious he projected it indubitably.
The split through his self-made him as a human being as good as possible, although he was unable to reach the degree of perfection his white self already possessed.
The Catholic doctrine cannot but declare that Christ even as a human being knew everything.
This is the logical consequence of the perfect union of the duae naturae.
Christ as understood by the Church is to me a spiritual, i.e., mythological being; even his humanity is divine as it is generated by the celestial Father and exempt from original sin.
When I speak of him as a human being, I mean its few traces we can gather from the gospels.
It is not enough for the reconstruction of an empirical character.
Moreover even if we could reconstruct an individual personality, it would not fulfil the role of redeemer and Godman who is identical with the ”all-knowing” self.
Since the individual human being is characterized by a selection of tendencies and qualities, it is a specification and not a wholeness, i.e., it cannot be individual without incompleteness and restriction, whereas the Christ of the doctrine is perfect, complete, whole and therefore not individual at all, but a collective mythologem, viz. an archetype.
He is far more divine than human and far more universal than individual.
Concerning the omniscience it is important to know that Adam already was equipped with supernatural knowledge according to Jewish and Christian tradition, all the more so Christ.
I think that the great split in those days was by no means a mistake but a very important collective fact of synchronistic correspondence with the then new aeon of Pisces.
Archetypes, in spite of their conservative nature, are not static but in a continuous dramatic flux.
Thus the self as a monad or continuous unit would be dead.
But it lives inasmuch as it splits and unites again.
There is no energy without opposites!
All conservatives and institutionalists are Pharisees, if you apply this name without prejudice.
Thus it was to be expected that just the better part of Jewry would be hurt most by the revelation of an exclusively good God and loving Father.
This novelty emphasized with disagreeable clearness that the Yahweh hitherto worshipped had some additional, less decorous propensities.
For obvious reasons the orthodox Pharisees could not defend their creed by insisting on the bad qualities of their God.
Christ with his teaching of an exclusively good God must have been most awkward for them.
They probably believed him to be hypocritical, since this was his main objection against them.
One gets that way when one has to hold on to something which once has been good and had meant considerable progress or improvement at the time.
It was an enormous step forward when Yahweh revealed himself as a jealous God, letting his chosen people feel that he was after them with blessings and with punishments, and that God's goal was man.

Not knowing better, they cheated him by obeying his Law literally.
But as Job discovered Yahweh's primitive amorality, God found out about the trick of observing the Law and swallowing camels.
The old popes and bishops succeeded in getting so much heathendom, barbarism and real evil out of the Church that it became much better than some centuries before: there were no Alexander VI, no auto-da-tes, no thumbscrews and racks anymore, so that the compensatory drastic virtues (asceticism etc.) lost their meaning to a certain extent.
The great split, having been a merely spiritual fact for a long time, has at last got into the world, as a rule in its coarsest and least recognizable form, viz. as the iron curtain, the completion of the second Fish.
Now a new synthesis must begin.
But how can absolute evil be connected and identified with absolute good?
It seems to be impossible.
When Christ withstood Satan's temptation, that was the fatal moment when the shadow was cut off.
Yet it had to be cut off in order to enable man to become morally conscious.
If the moral opposites could be united at all, they would be suspended altogether and there could be no morality at all.
That is certainly not what synthesis aims at.
In such a case of irreconcilability the opposites are united by a neutral or ambivalent bridge, a symbol expressing either side in such a way that they can function together.
This symbol is the cross as interpreted of old, viz. as the tree of life or simply as the tree to which Christ is inescapably affixed.
This particular feature points to the compensatory significance of the tree: the tree symbolizes that entity from which Christ had been separated and with which he ought to be connected again to make his life or his being complete.
In other words, the Crucifixus is the symbol uniting the absolute moral opposites.
Christ represents the light; the tree, the darkness; he the son, it the mother. Both are androgynous (tree = phallus).
Christ is so much identical with the cross that both terms have become almost interchangeable in ecclesiastical language (f.i. "redeemed through Christ or through the cross" etc.).
The tree brings back all that has been lost through Christ's extreme spiritualization, namely the elements of nature.
Through its branches and leaves the tree gathers the powers of light and air, and through its roots those of the earth and the water.
Christ was suffering on account of his split and he recovers his perfect life at Easter, when he is buried again in the womb of the virginal mother. (Represented also in the myth of Attis by the tree, to which an image of Attis was nailed, then cut down and carried into the cave of the mother Kybele. The Nativity Church of Bethlehem is erected over an Attis sanctuary!)
This mythical complex seems to represent a further development of the old drama, existence becoming real through reflection in consciousness; Job's tragedy.
But now it is the problem of dealing with the results of conscious discrimination.
The first attempt is moral appreciation and decision for the Good.
Although this decision is indispensable, it is not too good in the long run.
You must not get stuck with it, otherwise you grow out of life and die slowly.
Then the one-sided emphasis on the Good becomes doubtful, but there is apparently no possibility of reconciling Good and Evil.
That is where we are now.
The symbolic history of the Christ's life shows, as the essential teleological tendency, the crucifixion, viz. the union of Christ with the symbol of the tree.
It is no longer a matter of an impossible reconciliation of Good and Evil, but of man with his vegetative = unconscious) life.
In the case of the Christian symbol the tree however is dead and man upon the Cross is going to die, i.e., the solution of the problem takes place after death.

That is so as far as Christian truth goes.
But it is possible that the Christian symbolism expresses man's mental condition in the aeon of Pisces, as the ram and the bull gods do for the ages of Aries and Taurus.
In this case the post-mortal solution would be symbolic of an entirely new psychological status, viz. that of Aquarius, which is certainly a oneness, presumably that of the Anthropos, the realization of Christ's allusion: "Dii estis."
This is a formidable secret and difficult to understand, because it means that man will be essentially God and God man.
The signs pointing in this direction consist in the fact that the cosmic power of self-destruction is given into the hands of man and that man inherits the dual nature of the Father.
He will [mis] understand it and he will be tempted to ruin the universal life of the earth by radioactivity.
Materialism and atheism, the negation of God, are indirect means to attain this goal.
Through the negation of God one becomes deified, i .e., god-almighty-like, and then one knows what is good for mankind.
That is how destruction begins.
The intellectual schoolmasters in the Kremlin are a classic example.
The danger of following the same path is very great indeed.
It begins with the lie, i.e., the projection of the shadow.
There is need of people knowing about their shadow, because there must be somebody who does not project.
They ought to be in a visible position where they would be expected to project and unexpectedly they do not project!
They can thus set a visible example which would not be seen if they were invisible.
There is certainly Pharisaism, law consciousness, power drive, sex obsession, and the wrong kind of formalism in the Church.
But these things are symptoms that the old showy and easily understandable ways and methods have lost their significance and should be slowly replaced by more meaningful principles.
This indeed means trouble with the Christian vices.
Since you cannot overthrow a whole world because it harbours also some evil, it will be a more individual or "local" fight with what you rightly call avidya.
As "tout passe," even theological books are not true forever, and even if they expect to be believed one has to tell them in a loving and fatherly way that they make some mistakes.
A true and honest introverted thinking is a grace and possesses for at least a time divine authority, particularly if it is modest, simple and straight.
The people who write such books are not the voice of God.
They are only human.
It is true that the right kind of thinking isolates oneself.
But did you become a monk for the sake of congenial society?
Or do you assume that it isolates only a theologian?
It has done the same to me and will do so to everybody that is blessed with it.
That is the reason why there are compensatory functions.
The introverted thinker is very much in need of a developed feeling, i .e., of a less autoerotic, sentimental, melodramatic and emotional relatedness to people and things.
The compensation will be a hell of a conflict to begin with, but later on, by understanding what nirdvandva means, they1become the pillars at the gate of the transcendent function, i.e., the transitus to the self.
We should recognize that life is a transitus.
There is an old covered bridge near Schmerikon with an inscription: "Alles ist Uebergang."
Even the Church and her sententiae are only alive inasmuch as they change.
All old truths want a new interpretation, so that they can live on in a new form.
They can't be substituted or replaced by something else without losing their functional value altogether.
The Church certainly expects of you that you assimilate its doctrine.
But in assimilating it, you change it imperceptibly and sometimes even noticeably.

Introverted thinking is aware of such subtle alterations, while other minds swallow them wholesale.
If you try to be literal about the doctrine, you are putting yourself aside until there is nobody left that would represent it but corpse.
If, on the other hand, you truly assimilate the doctrine, you will alter it creatively by your individual understanding and thus give life to it.
The life of most ideas consists in their controversial nature, i.e., you can disagree with them even if you recognize their importance for a majority.
If you fully agreed with them you could replace yourself ust as well by a gramophone record.
Moreover, if you don't disagree, you are no good as a directeur de conscience, since there are many other people suffering from the same difficulty and being badly in need of your understanding.
I appreciate the particular moral problem you are confronted with.
But I should rather try to understand why you were put into your actual situation of profound conflict before you think it is a fundamental mistake.
I remember vividly your charta geomantica that depicts so drastically the way you became a monk.
I admit there are people with the peculiar gift of getting inevitably and always into the wrong place.
With such people nothing can be done except get them out of the wrong hole into another equally dubious one.
But if I find to think that it makes sense somehow.
There may be some work for him to do.
Much work is needed where much has gone wrong or where much should be improved. That is one of the reasons why the Church attracts quite a number of intelligent and responsible men in the secret (or unconscious?) hope that they will be strong enough to carry its meaning and not its words into the future.
The old trick of law obedience is still going strong, but the original Christian teaching is a reminder.
The man who allows the institution to swallow him is not a good servant.
It is quite understandable that the ecclesiastical authorities must protect the Church against subversive influences.
But it would be sabotage if this principle were carried to the extreme, because it would kill the attempts at improvement also.
The Church is a "Durchgang" [passage] and bridge between representatives of higher and lower consciousness and as such she quite definitely makes sense.
Since the world is largely sub principatu diaboli, it is unavoidable that there is just as much evil in the Church as everywhere else, and as everywhere else you have got to be careful.
What would you do if you were a bank-clerk or a medical assistant at a big clinic?
You are always and everywhere in a moral conflict unless you are blissfully unconscious.
I think it is not only honest but even highly moral and altruistic to be what one professes to be as completely as possible, with the full consciousness that you are making this effort for the weak and the unintelligent who cannot live without a reliable support.
He is a good physician who does not bother the patient with his own doubts and feelings of inferiority.
Even if he knows little or is quite inefficient the right persona medici might carry the day if seriously and truly performed for the patient.
The grace of God may step in when you don't lose your head in a clearly desperate situation.
If it has been done, even with a lie, in favour of the patient, it has been well done, and you are justified, although you never get out of the awkward feeling that you are a dubious number.
I wonder whether there is any true servant of God who can rid himself of this profound insecurity balancing his obvious rightness.
I cannot forget that crazy old Negro Mammy who told me: "God is working in me like a clock-funny and serious."
By "clock" seems to be meant something precise and regular, even monotonous; by "funny and serious" compensating irrational events and aspects-a humorous seriousness expressing the playful and formidable nature of fateful experiences.
If I find myself in a critical or doubtful situation, I always ask myself whether there is not something in it, explaining the need of my presence, before I make a plan of how to escape.

If I should find nothing hopeful or meaningful in it, I think I would not hesitate to j ump out of it as quick as possible.
Well, I may be all wrong, but the fact that you find yourself in the Church does not impress me as being wholly nonsensical.
Of course huge sacrifices are expected of you, but I wonder whether there is any vocation or any kind of meaningful life that does not demand sacrifices of a sort.
There is no place where those striving after consciousness could find absolute safety.
Doubt and insecurity are indispensable components of a complete life.
Only those who can lose this life really, can gain it.
A ”complete” life does not consist in a theoretical completeness, but in the fact that one accepts, without reservation, the particular fatal tissue in which one finds oneself embedded, and that one tries to make sense of it or to create a cosmos from the chaotic mess into which one is born.
If one lives properly and completely, time and again one will be confronted with a situation of which one will say: ”This is too much. I cannot bear it any more.”
Then the question must be answered: ”Can one really not bear it?”
Fidem non esse caecum sensum religionis e latebris subconscientiae erump entem, etc., indeed not!
Fides in its ecclesiastical meaning is a construction expressed by the wholly artificial credo, but no -spontaneous product of the unconscious.
You can swear to it in all innocence, as well as I could, if asked.
Also you can teach, if asked, the solid doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas, as I could if I knew it.
You can and will and must criticize it, yet with a certain discrimination, as there are people incapable of understanding your argument.
Quieta movere is not necessarily a good principle.
Being an analyst, you know how little you can say, and sometimes it is quite enough when only the analyst knows.
Certain things transmit themselves by air when they are really needed.
I don’t share at all X.’s idea that one should not be so finicky about conscience.
It is definitely dishonest and-sorry-a bit too Catholic.
One must be finicky when it comes to a moral question, and what a question!
You are asked to decide whether you can deal with ambiguity, deception, ”doublecrossing” and other damnable things for the love of your neighbor’s soul.
If it is a case of ”the end justifying the means,” you had better buy a through ticket to hell.
It is a devilish hybris even to think that one could be in such an exalted position to decide about the means one is going to apply.
There is no such thing, not even in psychotherapy.
If you don’t want to go to the dogs morally, there is only one question, namely ”Which is the necessity you find yourself burdened with when you take to heart your brother’s predicament?”
The question is how you are applied in the process of the cure, and not at all what the means are you could offer to buy yourself off.
It depends very much indeed upon the way you envisage your position with reference to the Church.
I should advocate an analytical attitude, which is permissible as well as honest, viz. take the Church as your ailing employer and your colleagues as the unconscious inmates of a hospital.
Is the LSD-drug mescalin?
It has indeed very curious effectsvide Aldous Huxley!-of which I know far too little.
I don’t know either what its psychotherapeutic value with neurotic or psychotic patients is.
I only know there is no point in wishing to know more of the collective unconscious than one gets through dreams and intuition.
The more you know of it, the greater and heavier becomes your moral burden, because the unconscious contents transform themselves into your individual tasks and duties as soon as they begin to become conscious.
Do you want to increase loneliness and misunderstanding?
Do you want to find more and more complications and increasing responsibilities?
You get enough of it.

If I once could say that I had done everything I know I had to do, then perhaps I should realize a legitimate need to take mescalin.
But if I should take it now, I would not be sure at all that I had not taken it out of idle curiosity.
I should hate the thought that I had touched on the sphere where the paint is made that colours the world, where the light is created that makes shine the splendour of the dawn, the lines and shapes of all form, the sound that fills the orbit, the thought that illuminates the darkness of the void.
There are some poor impoverished creatures, perhaps, for whom mescalin would be a heaven-sent gift without a counter-poison, but I am profoundly mistrustful of the ”pure gifts of the Gods.”
You pay very dearly for them. Quidquid id est, timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.
This is not the point at all, to know of or about the unconscious, nor does the story end here; on the contrary it is how and where you begin the real quest.
If you are too unconscious it is a great relief to know a bit of the collective unconscious.
But it soon becomes dangerous to know more, because one does not learn at the same time how to balance it through a conscious equivalent.
That is the mistake Aldous Huxley makes : he does not know that he is in the role of the ”Zauberlehrling,” who learned from his master how to call the ghosts but did not know how to get rid of them again:
Die ich rief, die Geister, Werd ich nun nicht los
It is really the mistake of our age.
We think it is enough to discover new things, but we don’t realize that knowing more demands a corresponding development of morality.
Radioactive clouds over Japan, Calcutta, and Saskatchewan point to progressive poisoning of the universal atmosphere.
I should indeed be obliged to you if you could let me see the material they get with LSD.
It is quite awful that the alienists have caught hold of a new poison to play with, without the faintest knowledge or feeling of responsibility.
It is j ust as if a surgeon had never learned further than to cut open his patient’s belly and to leave things there.
When one gets to know unconscious contents one should know how to deal with them.
I can only hope that the doctors will feed themselves thoroughly with mescaline, the alkaloid of divine grace, so that they learn for themselves its marvellous effect.
You have not finished with the conscious side yet.
Why should you expect more from the unconscious?
For 35 years I have known enough of the collective unconscious and my whole effort is concentrated upon preparing the ways and means to deal with it.
Now to end this very long epistle I must say how much I have appreciated your confidence, frankness, courage and honesty.
This is so rare and so precious an event that it is a pleasure to answer at length.
I hope you will find a way out to Switzerland.
The winter, though very cold, has dealt leniently with me.
Both my wife and myself are tired, though still active, but in a very restricted way.
I am spending the month of April in Bollingen procul negotiis and the worst weather we have known for years.
Cordially yours,

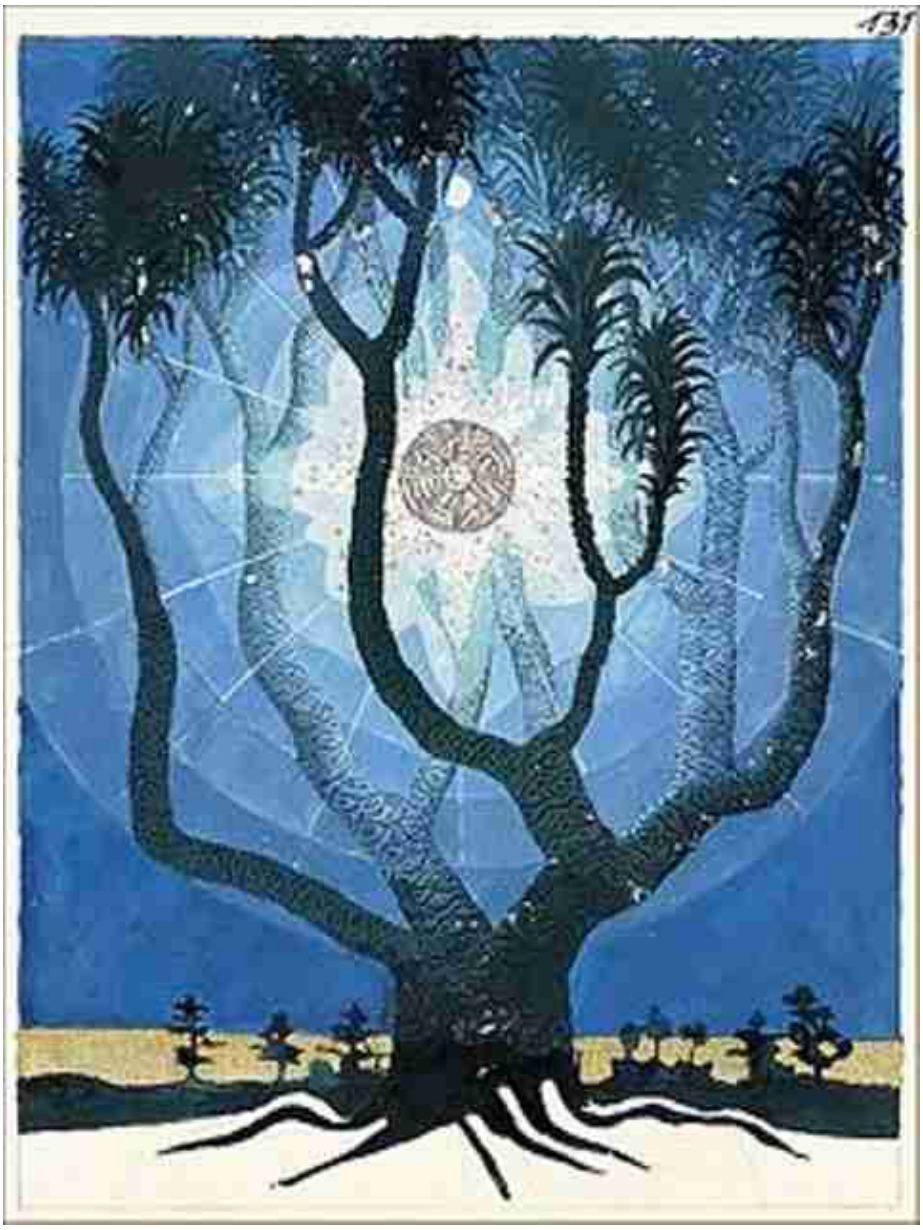
Carl Jung on “Trees” – Anthology (2015-08-11 11:44)



The tree brings back all that has been lost through Christ’s extreme spiritualization, namely the elements of nature. Through its branches and leaves the tree gathers the powers of light and air, and through its roots those of the earth and the water. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 163-174

The symbolic history of the Christ's life shows, as the essential teleological tendency, the crucifixion, viz. the union of Christ with the symbol of the tree. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 163-174
The tree of life may have been, in the first instance, a fruit-bearing genealogical tree, and hence a kind of tribal mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 321.
Today I finished a long essay on the "Philosophical Tree," which kept me company during my illness. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 104
Writing it [Philosophical Tree] was an enjoyable substitute for the fact that so few of my contemporaries can understand what is meant by the psychology of the unconscious. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 104
I am rather certain that the sefiroth tree contains the whole symbolism of Jewish development parallel to the Christian idea. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 91-93.
But, since I appear in your dream, I cannot refrain from making the remark that I like thick walls and I like trees and green things, and I like many books. Perhaps you are in need of these three good things. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 26-27.
Christ's redemptive death on the cross was understood as a "baptism," that is to say, as rebirth through the second mother, symbolized by the tree of death... The dual-mother motif suggests the idea of a dual birth. One of the mothers is the real, human mother, the other is the symbolical mother. Carl Jung, CW 5, para 494-495.
Trees in particular were mysterious and seemed to me direct embodiments of the incomprehensible meaning of life. For that reason the woods were the place where I felt closest to its deepest meaning and to its awe-inspiring workings. Carl Jung, MDR, Page 68.
Adam and Eve would indeed have been inadequate people if they had not noticed which tree the right apples grew on. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 48.
... at any time in my later life, when I came up at a blank wall, I painted a picture or hewed stone. Each such experience proved to be a "rite d 'entree" for the ideas and works that followed hard upon it. Carl Jung, MDR, Page 175.
The ancients said: it is terrible to fall into the hands of the living God. They spoke thus because they knew, since they were still close to the ancient forest, and they turned green like the trees in a childlike manner and ascended far away toward the East. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 281.
This new world appears weak and artificial to me. Artificial is a bad word, but the mustard seed that grew into a tree, the word that was conceived in the womb of a virgin, became a God to whom the earth was subject. Carl Jung to his Soul, Liber Novus, Pages 242-243.
The Christian-my Christian-knows no curse formulas; indeed he does not even sanction the cursing of the innocent fig-tree by the rabbi Jesus" Carl Jung, CW 18, §1468.
I wait, secretly anxious. I see a tree arise from the sea. Its crown reaches to Heaven and its roots reach down into Hell. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 300.
As I look into its reflection, the images of Eve, the tree, and the serpent appear to me. After this I catch sight of Odysseus and his journey on the high seas. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.
Good and evil unite in the growth of the tree. In their divinity life and love stand opposed. Diahmon, Liber Novus, Page 351.
The growing one is the TREE OF LIFE. It greens by heaping up growing living matter. Diahmon, Liber Novus, Page 351.
"One is the beginning, the Sun God.
"Two is Eros, for he binds two together and spreads himself out in brightness.
"Three is the Tree of Life, for it fills space with bodies.
"Four is the devil, for he opens all that is closed. He dissolves everything formed and physical; he is the destroyer in whom everything becomes nothing. Philemon, Liber Novus, 351.

Parents must realize that they are trees from which the fruit falls in the autumn. Children don't belong to their parents, and they are only apparently produced by them. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 217-218.
You must go in quest of yourself, and you will find yourself again only in the simple and forgotten things. Why not go into the forest for a time, literally? Sometimes a tree tells you more than can be read in books… Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 479.

It is even very important that the anima is projected into the earth, that she descends very low, for otherwise her ascent to the heavenly condition in the form of Sophia has no meaning…She is the one that is rooted in the earth as well as in the heaven, both root and branch of the tree. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 533.

No tree, it is said, can grow to heaven unless its roots reach down to hell. Carl Jung, Aion, Page 43.

At times I feel as if I am spread out over the landscape and inside things, and am myself living in every tree, in the splashing of the waves, in the clouds and the animals that come and go, in the procession of the seasons. Carl Jung; Memories, Dreams and Reflections; Pages 225-226.

The divine primordial power is blind, since its face has become human. The human is the face of-the Godhead. If the God comes near you, then plead for your life to be spared, since the God is loving horror. The ancients said: it is terrible to fall into the hands of the living God. They spoke thus because they knew, since they were still close to the ancient forest, and they turned green like the trees in a childlike manner and ascended far away toward the East. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 281.

Oh master of the garden! I see your dark tree from afar in the shimmering sun. My street leads to the valleys where men live. I am a wandering beggar. And I remain silent. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 316.

If I accept death, then my tree greens, since dying increases life. If I plunge into the death encompassing the world, then my buds break open. How much our life needs death! Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 275.

I had still not become a man again who carried within himself the conflict between a longing for the world and a longing for the spirit. I did not live either of these longings, but I lived myself and was a merrily greening tree in a remote spring forest. And thus I learned to live without the world and spirit; and I was amazed how well I could live like this. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277.

Carl Jung interprets the dream of a "Young Greek Girl." (2015-08-11 13:42)

To a Young Greek Girl
Dear Miss N., 14 October 1954

As to your question whether it makes a difference to your dreams if one has read about similar subjects, I must say that dreams of the sort you give me an example of can occur whether you have read [my books] or not.
It is, of course, quite natural that the dreams take suitable material from whatever source is available, either from books or from other experiences but this doesn't matter.
There are people who can read my books and never have a dream of anything reminiscent of my writings, but it is true that if you understand what you have read, you get a frame of mind or a problematical outlook which you did not have before, and that, of course, influences your dreams.
I shouldn't assume that your dream has been particularly influenced by what you have read.
I dislike as a rule interpreting dreams of people whom I don't know personally; one can easily be led astray.
I will make an exception in your case since I see that your dream has a meaning very important for you.
The beginning of it shows a certain fear of an imminent catastrophic situation-the tempest and the darkness.
The sudden discovery of the relief is something like a revelation, an unveiling of the compensatory background to your conscious psychology that has masculine (animus) inclinations.
It is the Eleusinian mystery of Demeter and her daughter Persephone.
The masculine element is paying homage to. this maternal figure.
It is quite obvious that the dream intends to call your attention to this great mythologem so important for a woman's psychology.
It is particularly important to your case because you are very much on your mother's side and presumably partially identified with her, being her only daughter.
Also you are remote from your father, from whom you have not received what is due to a daughter.
Therefore, you have developed a sort of substitute for the spiritual influence not coming forth from your father as it should.
That is a great hindrance working either way to the masculine as well as to the feminine side of your personality.
It would be wise, therefore, to follow the suggestion of the dream and to meditate on all the aspects of the myth of Demeter and Persephone.
Also, Greece had its Eleusinian cult because it suffered from a very similar psychological condition: women too much under the influence of their mothers and spiritually starved by their fathers, men also too much influenced by the mother because of the uncontrolled emotionality of the fathers and victimized by the emotional appetites of their mothers, hence the widespread homosexuality particularly in the male population.
At the time of Pericles there was even an epidemic of suicides among young girls feeling neglected by the men occupied with homosexual affairs.
Try to find out what Demeter has to convey to you.
You are obviously more attracted by the chthonic mystery represented by Demeter than by the spiritual and paternal trends of Christianity, from which you apparently have separated yourself.
It is this critical attitude that has to be considered as the immediate cause of this dream with its definitely antique atmosphere.
This is about all I can safely say about your dream.
If you give it your full attention, you will probably have other dreams elucidating the further steps of your way.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 187-188.

Carl Jung on ”salutation to the perfect Master.” (2015-08-12 09:10)

To Arvind U . Vasavada
Dear friend, 22 November 1954
Thank you for your kind letter and the beautiful ”salutation to the perfect Master.”
In the guru, I perceive, you greet the infinitesimal God whose light becomes visible wherever a man’s consciousness has made even the smallest step forward and beyond one’s own horizon.

The light of the Dawn praised by our medieval thinkers as the Aurora consurgens,the rising morning light, is awe-inspiring, it fills your heart with joy and admiration or with irritation and fear and even with hatred, according to the nature of whatever it reveals to you.
The ego receives the light from the self.
Though we know of the self, yet it is not known.
You may see a big town and know its name and geographical position, yet you do not know a single one of its inhabitants.
You may even know a man through daily intercourse, yet you can be entirely ignorant of his real character.
The ego is contained in the self as it is contained in the universe of which we know only the tiniest section.
A man of greater insight and intelligence than mine can know myself, but I could not know him as long as my consciousness is inferior to his.
Although we receive the light of consciousness from the self and although we know it to be the source of our illumination, we do not know whether it possesses anything we would call consciousness.
However beautiful and profound the sayings of your Wisdom are, they are essentially outbursts of admiration and enthusiastic attempts at formulating the overwhelming impressions an ego-consciousness has received from the impact of a superior subject.
Even if the ego should be (as I think) the supreme point of the self, a mountain infinitely higher than Mt. Everest, It would be nothing but a little grain of rock or ice, never the whole mountain.
Even if the grain recognizes itself as being part of the mountain and understands the mountain as an immense agglomeration of particles like itself, it does not know their ultimate nature, because all the others are, like itself, individuals, incomparable and incomprehensible in the last resort.
(The individual alone is ultimate reality and can know of existence at all.)
If the self could be wholly experienced, it would be a limited experience whereas in reality its experience is unlimited and endless.
It is our ego-consciousness that is capable only of limited experience.
We can only say that the self is limitless, but we cannot experience its infinity.
I can say that my consciousness is the same as that of the self, but it is nothing but words, since there is not the slightest evidence that I participate more or further in the self than my ego-consciousness reaches.
What does the grain know of the whole mountain, although it is visibly a part of it?
If I were one with the self, I would have knowledge of everything, I would speak Sanskrit, read cuneiform script, know the events that took place in prehistory, be acquainted with the life of other planets, etc.
There is unfortunately nothing of the kind.
You should not mix up your own enlightenment with the self-revelation of the self.
When you recognize yourself, you have not necessarily recognized the self but perhaps only an infinitesimal Part of it, though the self has given you the light.
Your standpoint seems to coincide with that of our medieval mystics, who tried to dissolve themselves in God.
You all seem to be interested in how to get back to the self, instead of looking for what the self wants you to do in the world, where-for the time being at least-we are located, presumably for a certain purpose.
The universe does not seem to exist for the sole purpose of man denying or escaping it.
Nobody can be more convinced of the importance of the self than me.
But as a young man does not stay in his father's house but goes out into the world, so I don't look back to the self but collect it out of manifold experiences and put it together again.
What I have left behind, seemingly lost, I meet in everything that comes my way and I collect it, reassembling it as it were.
In order to get rid of opposites, I needs must accept them first, but this leads away from the self.
I must also learn how opposites can be united, and not how they can be avoided. As long as I am on the first part of the road I have to forget the self in order to get properly into the mill of the opposites, otherwise I live only fragmentarily and conditionally.
Although the self is my origin, it is also the goal of my quest.
When it was my origin, I did not know myself, and when I did learn about myself, I did not know the self.

I have to discover it in my actions, where first it reappears under strange masks.
That is one of the reasons why I must study symbolism, otherwise I risk not recognizing my own father and mother when I meet them again after the many years of my absence.
Hoping I have answered your question, I remain,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 194-196

Carl Jung: ”We should have schools for adults....”} (2015-08-13 05:35)

To Henry D. Isaac
Dear Herr Isaac, 25 October 1954
Your question is indeed most timely, for it is highly unlikely that any social measures and proposals will make the individual more conscious, more conscientious and more responsible but will have the opposite effect, because all agglomerations of individuals show a distinct tendency to lower the level of individual consciousness.
Hence all advice that begins with ”you ought” usually proves to be completely ineffective.
This hangs together with the obvious fact that only the individual is the carrier of virtues but not the mass.
Today this supremely important vehicle of the social function is imperiled by our whole culture, or rather unculture.
If the individual could be improved, it seems to me that a foundation would be laid for an improvement of the whole.
Even a million noughts do not add up to one.
I therefore espouse the unpopular view that a better understanding in the world can come only from the individual and be promoted only by him.
But considering the vast numbers involved, this truth looks like a counsel of despair and futility.
Supposing, however, that anyone did want to make his infinitesimal contribution to the desired ideal, he would have to be in a position really to understand another person.
The indispensable precondition for this is that he understands himself.
If he doesn’t, he will inevitably see the other person through the deceptive and distorting lens of his own prejudices and projections and will recommend and impute to him the very things he most needs himself.
So we must understand ourselves to a certain extent if we want any real communication with others.
Today there are a whole lot of things which an adult ought to know in order to be equipped for life.
He is supposed to have picked them up in his schooldays, but then he was much too young to understand them, and later there is nothing to prompt him to go back to school again.
Usually he has no time for that.
Nobody brings him any useful knowledge in this respect, and he remains in a state of childish ignorance.

We should have schools for adults, where one could inculcate into them at least the elements of self-knowledge and knowledge of human nature.
I have made this suggestion often enough, but it has remained a pious wish although everyone admits in theory that without self-knowledge there can be no general understanding.
Ways and means would surely be found if it were some technological problem.
But since it is merely the most important thing of all, the human psyche and human relationships, that is at issue, there are neither teachers nor pupils, neither schools nor refresher courses, and everything is shrugged off with ”you ought.”
That everyone ought to begin with himself is much too unpopular and so everything stays as it is.
Only when people get so nervous that the doctor diagnoses a neurosis do they go to a specialist, whose medical horizon usually does not include social responsibility.
Unfortunately the so-called religions have never proved to be vehicles of general human understanding, since with few exceptions they suffer from totalitarian claims and in this respect at least hardly differ from any other -ism, and actually disrupt human relationships at the critical point.
If one is in the position of a doctor, as I am, to become intimately acquainted with very many educated people, one is continually amazed at the terrifying unconsciousness of modern civilized man.
Contemporary science can give such people any amount of enlightening knowledge about things they should have known right at the beginning of their social life but had no chance to acquire.
Instead of knowing, they had to be content with ridiculous prejudices and preconceived opinions.
Our whole society is split up by specialism, and the self-serving professions are so differentiated that none of them knows what the other is doing.
There’s nothing to be hoped for from the universities, since they turn out only specialists.
Even psychology gives no thought to the unity of man, but has split into countless subdivisions each with its own tests and specialist theories.
Anyone who sought the wisdom that is needed would soon find himself in the situation of old Diogenes, who went looking for a man on the marketplace of Athens in broad daylight with a lantern in his hand.
I think this is all I have to say about the present state of human understanding.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 189-191.

Carl Jung: None of my critics has ever tried to apply my method conscientiously. (2015-08-13 12:55)

To Calvin S. Hall
Dear Prof. Hall, 8 November 1954
Thank you for your kind reply.
I am much obliged that you took my criticism in a good spirit.
The main point with me is that it is difficult having to deal with careless and superficial criticisms.
None of my critics has ever tried to apply my method conscientiously.
Anybody doing it cannot fail to discover what I call archetypal motifs.
They appear in dreams just as much as in speech or in the writings of our poets.
The only question is: are they wholly spontaneous or due to tradition?
To answer this question one has to go into detail, and it's just that detail that is neglected by the critics.
For many years I have carefully analysed about 2000 dreams p.a., thus I have acquired a certain experience in this matter.
As I already told you, I object to the term "system."
If I had an invented system, I certainly should have constructed better and more philosophical concepts than those I am applying.
Take for instance animus and anima.
No philosopher in his senses would invent such irrational and clumsy ideas.
When things fit together, it is not always matter of a philosophical system; sometimes it is the facts that fit together.
Mythological motifs are facts; they never change; only theories change.
There can never be a time which denies the existence of mythological motifs, it is not just a barbarous darkening of the mind.
Yet the theory about them can change a great deal at any time.
By this same mail, I am sending you a list of all my writings so that you can compare it with your list of my books.
Apologizing for my impatience,
I remain,
Yours very sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 191-192.

Carl Jung on Saint Paul (2015-08-13 13:03)

The idea of angels, archangels, “principalities and powers” in St. Paul, the archons of the Gnostics, the heavenly hierarchy of Dionysius the Areopagite, all come from the perception of the relative autonomy of the archetypes. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 66, Para 104.

Please give X. my best greetings and tell him-because his love is all too easily injured-he should meditate on Paul’s words in the Epistle to the Corinthians: ”Love endureth all things.” Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 120-121.

These signs appear in Gnosticism, St. Paul’s sayings are undoubtedly connected with Gnosticism. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 8March1935, Pages 199.

I don’t believe in the tiger who was finally converted to vegetarianism and ate only apples. My solace was always Paul, who did not deem it beneath his dignity to admit he bore a thorn in the flesh. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 276-277.

Paul for instance was not converted to Christianity by intellectual or philosophical endeavor or by a belief, but by the force of his immediate experience. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 183.

Paul for instance was not converted to Christianity by intellectual or philosophical endeavor or by a belief, but by the force of his immediate experience. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 183.

The Christian Church has hitherto. . . [recognized] Christ as the one and only God-man.

But the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, the third Divine Person, in man, brings about a Christification of many, and the question then arises whether these many are all complete God-men. . . .

It is well to remind ourselves of St. Paul and his split consc iousness: on one side he felt he was the apostle directly called and enlightened by God, and, on the other side, a sinful man who could not pluck out the ”thorn in the flesh” and rid himself of the Satanic angel who plagued him.

That is to say even the enlightened person remains what he is, and is never more than his own limited ego before the One who dwells within him, whose form has no knowable boundaries, who encompasses him on all sides, fathomless as the abysms of the earth and vast as the sky. Carl Jung, CW 11, Page 470.

St. Paul’s concept of ayvoia (ignorantia) may not be too far removed from dyiwia, since both mean the initial, unconscious condition of man. Carl Jung, Aion, Pages 191-192.

As St. Paul said, ”I am redeemed and am freed from the law.”

The earliest source about the Resurrection is St. Paul, and he is no eyewitness, but he strongly emphasizes the absolute and vital importance of resurrection as well as the authenticity of the reports. (Cf. I Cor. 15:14 and 15:5”.)

Carl Jung: Your succour comes at a time when it is badly needed... (2015-08-14 06:11)

To J. B . Priestley
Dear Mr. Priestley, 8 November 1954
Friends have sent your two articles to me.
I am deeply touched by your kindness and understanding.
You as a writer are in a position to appreciate what it means to an isolated individual like myself to hear one friendly human voice among the stupid and malevolent noises rising from the scribbler-infested jungle.

I am indeed most grateful for your warm-hearted support and your generous appreciation.
Your succour comes at a time when it is badly needed; soon a little book of mine will be published in England which my publishers in USA did not dare to print. Its title is: Answer to Job.
It deals with the wholly unsatisfactory outcome of the Book of Job and what its further historical consequences for the development of certain religious questions including Christian views were.
The book will be highly unwelcome in certain spheres and will be misunderstood and misinterpreted accordingly.
The German edition over here has already upset the representatives of three religions, not because it is irreligious but because it takes their statements and premises seriously.
Needless to say the best of the so-called free-thinkers are equally shocked.
Sir Herbert Read, who is informed about its contents, wisely said: "You certainly understand how to put your foot in it."
But I am really glad that they are willing to print it.
I will tell my publishers to present a copy to you as soon as it comes out.
Hoping you are in good health and active as ever,
I remain,
Yours gratefully and sincerely,

Carl Jung on "Carrying the Torch." (2015-08-14 06:43)

To H. Oswald
Dear Frau Oswald, 11 November 1954

I would gladly accept your invitation to devote myself to Holderlin's work if I still felt up to this task.
Unfortunately I am no longer energetic enough and am too old-in my 8oth year-to do it justice.
I know the lines you quote from Holderlin only too well.
But I have worked so hard in these last decades that I must be wary of even relatively minor mental Exertions.
It is now up to the younger generation to open a few locked doors, perhaps with the help of the keys I have wrought.
In any case I see no one at present who could tackle Holderlin.
Such a work is reserved for a distant future.
A person carries the torch only a stretch of the way and must then lay it down, not because he has reached a goal but because his strength is at an end.
It would be most unseemly to grab Holderlin by the hair in senile impatience.
I cannot deny that all sorts of thoughts run through my head, but that traitor the body leaves me in the lurch.
Nevertheless I thank you for your pious wish, for which there is every justification.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung: “I write for unbelievers.” (2015-08-14 16:14)

To Bernhard Martin
Dear Dr. Martin, 7 December 1954
It is very kind of you to submit your manuscript to me for an opinion.
I have taken the liberty of marking it with numbers in pencil where a change in the text seems necessary.
You ”know” of that which is beyond the psyche only through belief, not through knowledge.
I do not write for believers who already possess the whole truth, rather for unbelieving but intelligent people who want to understand something.
Without the psyche you can neither know nor believe.
Therefore everything about which we can speak at all lies in the psychic realm; even the atom is in this sense a psychic model.
I grant you that the believer will learn nothing from my Answer to Job since he already has everything.
I write only for unbelievers.
Thanks to your belief, you know much more than I do.

Since my earliest youth I have been made to feel how rich and how knowing the believers are, and how disinclined even to listen to anything else.
I do not hesitate to admit my extreme poverty in knowing through believing, and would therefore advise you to shut my book with a bang and inscribe on the inside of the jacket: ”Nothing here for the believing Christian” -a sentiment with which I am in complete agreement.
I am not concerned with what is ”believable” but simply with what is knowable.
It seems to me that we are not in a position to ”generate” or ”uphold” belief, for belief is a charisma which God giveth or taketh away.
It would be presumptuous to imagine that we can command it at will.
For the sake of brevity my comments are rather direct and outspoken.
I hope you won’t mind this, but will see how different are the two planes on which the discussion is moving.
Without in any way impugning belief, I confine myself to its assertions.
As you see, I even take the highly controversial new dogma at its face value.
I do not consider myself competent to judge the metaphysical truth of these assertions; I only try to elucidate their content and their psychological associations.
The assertions are, as you yourself admit, anthropomorphic and therefore can hardly be considered reliable with respect to their metaphysical truth.
You as a believer take the stand that the proposition ”God is” has as its inevitable corollary God’s Existence in reality, whereas Kant irrefutably pointed out long ago (in his critique of Anselm’s proof of God) that the little word ”is” can denote no more than a ”copula in the judgment.”
Other religions make equally absolute assertions, but quite different ones.
But as a psychologist on the one hand and a human being on the other I must acknowledge that my brother may be right too.
I do not belong to the elect and the beati possidentes of the sole truth, but must give fair consideration to all human assertions, even the denial of God.
So when you confront me as a Christian apologist you are standing on a different plane from me.
You cling to ”believing is knowing,” and I must always be the loser because de fide non est disputandum any more than one can argue about taste.
One cannot argue with the possessor of the truth.
Only the seeker after truth needs to reflect, to inquire, to deliberate, for he admits that he does not know.
As a believer you can only dismiss me out of hand and declare that I am no Christian and what I say is useless, indeed harmful.
Well, gunpowder was a dangerous invention, but it also has its useful applications.
It is notorious that everything can be used for a good or a bad purpose.
Hence there was no valid reason for me to keep silence, quite apart from the fact that the present state of ”Christendom” arouses a host of doubts in people’s minds.
As a doctor I have to provide the answers which for many of my patients are not forthcoming from the theologian.
I myself have politely requested the theologians to explain to me what the attitude of modern Protestantism is as regards the identity of the Old and the New Testament concept of God.
Two didn’t answer at all and the third said that nobody bothers any more about God-concepts nowadays.
But for the religious-minded person this is a matter of burning interest, which was one of my motives for writing Answer to Job.
I would like to recommend Prof. Volz’s Das Daemonische in Jahwe to your attention, and as for the New Testament I pose the question: Is it necessary to placate a ”loving Father” with the martyr’s death of his son?
What is the relation here between love and vindictiveness?
And what would I feel about it if my own father exhibited that kind of phenomenology?
Such are the questions of the unbelieving religious man for whom I write.
To him applies the amiable (predestinarian) principle of Matt. 13: 12: ”Whosoever hath, to him shall be given,” etc.
But ”illis non est datum,” these lost sheep of which another, equally authentic logion says that Christ was sent only to them.

Those who cannot believe would at least like to understand: ”Putasne intelligis quae legis?” (Acts 8:30).
But understanding begins at the bottom of the mountain on top of which the believer sits.
He already knows everything much better and can therefore say: ”Lord, I thank thee that I am not so dumb and ignorant as those down below, who want to understand” (cf. Luke 18:11).
I cannot anticipate a thing by believing it but must be content with my unbelief until my efforts meet with the grace of illumination, that is, with religious experience.
I cannot make-believe.
To conclude with an indiscreet question: Don’t you think that the angel of the Lord, wrestling with Jacob, also got a few hefty cuffs and kicks? (So much for my ”scandalous” criticism of Yahweh!)
I know my Answer to Job is a shocker for which I ought to offer a civil apology (hence my motto).
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 197-199.

Carl Jung: Every religion makes use of two feet: faith on one side and ritual on the other. (2015-08-14 17:08)

To Pastor William Lachat
Dear Pastor Lachat, 18 January 1955
The book on Le Bdpteme dans l'Eglise nformee which you were good enough to send me deals with an eminently theological theme.
I feel that I am too much of a layman to be competent to touch upon it.
The only problem that concerns me is that of the rite in Protestantism.
As I see it, this is a problem of the highest importance.
The sola fide standpoint seems to me insufficient for a complete religion.
Every religion makes use of two feet: faith on one side and ritual on the other.
In the two Christian churches, the importance and the psychological significance of rites are not generally appreciated; to some people they are acts of faith or of habit; to others, acts of magic.

But in reality there is a third aspect: the aspect of the rite as a symbolic act, giving expression to the archetypal expectation of the unconscious.
What I mean by this is that every epoch of our biological life has a numinous character: birth, puberty, marriage, illness, death, etc.
This is a natural fact demanding recognition, a question wanting an answer.
It is a need that should be satisfied by a solemn act, characterizing the numinous moment with a combination of words and gestures of an archetypal, symbolic nature.
Rites give satisfaction to the collective and numinous aspects of the moment, beyond their purely personal significance.
This aspect of the rite is highly important.
The pastor's personal prayer does not fill the need at all because the response should be collective and historical; it should evoke the "ancestral spirits" so as to unite the present with the historical and mythological past, and for that a re-presentation of the past is indispensable: rites should be archaic (in language and gesture).
The proper kind of rite is not magically but psychologically efficacious.
That is why a well-conducted Mass produces a powerful effect, particularly when the meaning of the ceremony can be followed.
But once lost, lost forever! That is the tragedy of Protestantism.
It has only one leg left.
This lack may possibly be compensated by an artificial limb, but one never feels convinced that it is as good as the natural leg.
The Protestant is restless, and something in him goes about looking for a solution.
The wheel of time cannot be turned back.
Things can, however, be destroyed and renewed.
This is extremely dangerous, but the signs of our time are dangerous too.
If there was ever a truly apocalyptic era, it is ours.
God has put the means for a universal holocaust into the hands of men.
People hate the human soul, it is nothing but "psychological."
They don't understand that it has needs, and they throw its treasures into the street without understanding them.
That is what Protestantism started, the Encyclopedistes continued, and la Deesse Raison will finish off.
Our rites will become solemn syntheses of hydrogen bombs.
Baptism, like the other sacraments, is really a mystery in so far as it represents an answer to the unconscious question put to us by the numinous moment.
This question awaits a satisfactory reaction from our side.
If there is no response, the lack of it augments the general dissatisfaction to the point of neurosis, and increases the disorientation to the point of mental blindness and collective psychosis which has characterized our time since 1933, or (in Russia) since the war of 1914-1918.
I thank you very much for sending the book on baptism, which I am in the process of reading slowly.
Perhaps I shall have still other reactions.
With my sincere regards,

Carl Jung on the ”Trinity of Science.” (2015-08-15 15:35)

To Michael Fordham
Dear Fordham, 24 January 1955
According to your wish and to my notoriously helpless state concerning higher mathematics, I have sent the galley proofs and your notes to Prof. Fierz.
You will find the other notes included in this letter.
I am deeply obliged to you for all the trouble you have taken over this complicated matter.
An American pupil of mine, Dr. Progoff (New York), has tried to adapt and to explain synchronicity to the average reader but he landed his ship on the rocks because he could not free his mind from the deep-rooted belief in the Sanctissima Trinitas of the axiomata time, space, and causality.
Funny how few people can draw the inevitable conclusion from causality being of statistical nature, that it must suffer exceptions.
You can arbitrarily dismiss them as indispensable parts of the real world, if you like averages better than random facts. The latter are facts none the less and cannot be treated as non-existent.
Moreover, since the real man is always an individual and unique event and as such merely ”random,” you have to label the whole of mankind in its essentials as ”valueless.”

But on the other hand, only the individual carries life and consciousness of life, which seems to me rather a significant fact not to be lightly dismissed at least not by the physician.
You can do such things in Nazi Germany or in Russia, but-God forbid-not with us.
But wherever a philosophy based upon the sciences prevails (as in the USA), the individual man loses his foothold and becomes ”vermasst,” turned into a mass particle, because as an ”exception” he is valueless, not very different from the Russian.
This is the reason and the motive of my essay.
I am convinced that something ought to be done about this blind and dangerous belief in the security of the scientific Trinity.
I don’t expect that my contemporaries will accept my idea, but my book will be in existence and sooner or later somebody will draw the same conclusions.
By the way-do you know Brown’s paper about the Rhine experiments?
I only know it in its French form (G. Spencer Brown: ”De Ia recherche psychique consideree comme un test de Ia theorie des probabilites,” Revue metapsychique, Mai-Aout, 1954, p. 87 sqq.).
The author cannot deny the validity of Rhine’s results.
But since it is ”impossible” to look round corners and to know the future, the probability calculus must be basically wrong!
This shows the impact of synchronicity upon the fanatical one-sidedness of scientific philosophy.
Thanking you again for your care and attention,
I remain,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on reviews of “Synchronicity.” (2015-08-15 15:48)

To R.F.C. Hull
Dear Hull, 24 January 1955
Thank you very much for your refreshing answer to Mr. Philip Toynbee.
You have done it very well.

No reason to believe you could not rectify such clumsy misunderstandings!
I am obliged to you for your courageous answer.
There are damned few who have the guts to stand up for me.
The latest comment about ”Synchronicity” is th at it cannot be accepted because it shakes the security of our scientific foundations, as if th is were not exactly the goal I am aiming at and as if the merely statistical nature of causality had never been mentioned before.
It is true however that it is the asses that make public opinion.
50 years of this stuff could have subdued me easily if I had not had the unshakable experience that my truth was good enough for myself and that I could live with it.
If you like Camembert, you just like it, although the whole world would shout at you that it is very bad.
Sooner or later, somebody else will also discover that nothing is quite secure, not even the SS.
Trinitas, space, time, and causality.
I am sorry that I did not see you again.
Only once I saw you flitting by on your fiery chariot.
I am planning to come down to Ascona once more towards the end of February for about a fortnight.
Many thanks!
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 217.

Carl Jung on the Individual and Mass Mentality. (2015-08-15 15:55)

To Hans A. Illing
Dear Dr. Illing, 26 January 1955
As a doctor, I consider any psychic disturbance, whether neurosis or psychosis, to be an individual illness, so the patient has to be treated accordingly.
The individual can be treated in the group only to the extent that he is a member of it.
This is a great relief to begin with, since, being submerged in the group, he can escape from himself up to a point.

The sense of security is increased and the sense of responsibility decreased when one is part of a group.
Once I ran into a thick fog while crossing a treacherous glacier, full of crevasses, with a company of soldiers.
The situation was so dangerous that everyone had to stop just where he happened to be.
Yet there was no trace of panic, but rather the spirit of a public festival!
Had one been alone, or had there only been two of us, the danger could not have been overlooked or laughed off.
As it was, the brave and experienced had a chance to shine.
The timid took heart from the plucky ones, and nobody said a word about the possibility of having to improvise a bivouac on the glacier, which could hardly have passed off without frostbite, etc., let alone about the perils of an attempted descent.
This is typical of the mass mentality.
Young people in a group get up to tricks they would never do by themselves.
During the war, compulsion neuroses among soldiers vanished overnight as a result of group activity.
The group confessions of sects like the Oxford Movement are well known; also the cures at Lourdes, which would be unthinkable without an admiring public.
Groups bring about not only astonishing cures but equally astonishing psychic changes and conversions precisely because suggestibility is heightened.
This was recognized long ago by the totalitarian dictators; hence the mass parades, chanting, cheering, etc.
Hitler inspired the most massive group experience of change in Germany since the Reformation and cost Europe millions of dead.
Heightened suggestibility means individual bondage, because the individual is at the mercy of environmental influences, be they good or bad.
The discriminative capacity is weakened, and so is the sense of personal responsibility, which as in the Oxford Movement is left to ”Lord Jesus.”
People have wondered belatedly about the psychology of the German Army-no wonder!
Every single soldier and officer was just a particle in the mass, swayed by suggestion and stripped of moral responsibility.
Even a small group is ruled by a suggestive group spirit which, if it is good, can have very favourable social effects, though at the expense of mental and moral independence of the individual.
The group accentuates the ego; one becomes braver, more presumptuous, more cocky, more insolent, more reckless; but the self is diminished and gets pushed into the background in favour of the average.
For this reason all weak and insecure persons belong to unions and organizations, and if possible to a nation of 80 million!
Then one is a big shot, because he is identical with everybody else, but he loses his self (which is the soul the devil is after and wins!) and his individual judgment.
The ego is pressed to the wall by the group only if in his judgment it is not in accord with the group.
Hence the individual in the group always tends to assent as far as possible to the majority opinion, or else to impose his opinion on the group.
The levelling influence of the group on the individual is compensated by one member of it identifying with the group spirit and becoming the Leader.
As a result, prestige and power conflicts are constantly arising due to the heightened egotism of the mass man.
Social egocentricity increases in proportion to the numerical strength of the group.
I have no practical objections to group therapy any more than I have to Christian Science, the Oxford Movement, and other therapeutically effective sects.
I myself founded a group nearly 40 years ago; but it was composed of analysed persons and its purpose was to constellate the individual’s social attitude.
This group is still active today.
The social attitude does not come into operation in the dialectical relationship between patient and doctor and may therefore remain in an unadapted state, as was the case with the majority of my patients.

This drawback only became apparent when the group was formed and called for the mutual rubbing off of sharp edges.
In my opinion group therapy is only capable of educating the social human being.
Attempts in this direction are being made in England, particularly with unanalyzed persons, on the basis of psychological theories inaugurated by me.
Mr. P. W. Martin, Talboys, Oxted, Surrey, could give you further information.
I rate these attempts very highly.
However, in view of the foregoing critical remarks about group therapy, I do not believe that it can replace individual analysis, i.e., the dialectical process between two individuals and the subsequent intrapsychic discussion, the dialogue with the unconscious.
Since the sole carrier of life and the quintessence of any kind of community is the individual, it follows that he and his quality are of paramount importance.
The individual must be complete and must have substance, otherwise nothing has substance, for any number of zeros still do not amount to more than zero.
A group of inferior people is never better than any one of them; it is just as inferior as they, and a State composed of nothing but sheep is never anything else but a herd of sheep, even though it is led by a shepherd with a vicious dog.
In our time, which puts so much weight on the socialization of the individual because a special capacity for adaptation is also needed, the formation of psychologically oriented groups is certainly more important than ever.
But in view of the notorious tendency of people to lean on others and cling to various -isms instead of finding security and independence within themselves, which is the prime requisite, there is a danger that the individual will equate the group with father and mother and so remain just as dependent, insecure, and infantile as before.
He may become adapted socially, but what of his individuality, which alone gives meaning to the social fabric?
Sure, if society consisted of valuable individuals only, adaptation would be worthwhile; but in reality it is composed mainly of nincompoops and moral weaklings, and its level is far below that of its better representatives, in addition to which the mass as such stifles all individual values.
When a hundred intelligent heads are united in a group the result is one big fathead.
There used to be the quiz question:
What are the three biggest organizations whose morality is the lowest?
Answer : Standard Oil, the Catholic Church, and the German Army.
It is precisely in a Christian organization that one might expect the highest morality, but the need to bring fractious factions into harmony requires compromises of the most questionable kind.
(Jesuitical casuistry and perversion of the truth in the interests of the Church!)
The worst examples to date are Nazism and Communism, where the lie has become the principal reason of State.
Conspicuous virtues are relatively rare and are mostly individual achievements. Mental and moral sloth, cowardice, bigotry, and unconsciousness dominate everything.
I have 50 years of pioneer work behind me and could tell a pretty tale in this respect.
Admittedly there has been scientific and technological progress, but no one has yet heard that people in general have become more intelligent let alone morally better.
Individuals can be improved because they present themselves for treatment.
But societies only let themselves be deceived and misled, even if temporarily for their own good.
For what we are dealing with is simply the passing and morally weakening effects of suggestion.
(This is why medical psychotherapists, with few exceptions, have long since abandoned the use of suggestion therapy.)
The good is never easy to reach; the more it costs the better it is.
Socially good results have to be paid for too, usually later, but then with interest and compound interest (witness the Mussolini era in Italy and its catastrophic end).
To sum up, I have reached the following conclusions:
1 . Group therapy is indispensable for the education of the social human being.
2. It is not a substitute for individual analysis .

3· The two forms of psychotherapy complement each other.
4· The danger of group therapy is getting stuck on the collective level.
5 · The danger of individual analysis is the neglect of social adaptation.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 217-221.

Carl Jung to Upton Sinclair (2015-08-16 05:45)

Dear Mr. Sinclair, 20 January 1955
Thank you ever so much for your awfully nice letter.
You ought not to think that I shall be able to write you always such long letters in the future; it all depends on the button you push.
It happens that your recent writings have touched off some electric charges.

I am glad that my letter has pleased you and I have no objection whatever if you want to publish it in the New Republic.
It is a great question to me whether the American public or at least some of its competent representatives can follow my argument.
If the reduction to the simple human story would be the proper answer, the whole tradition of 2000 years would be wiped out together with the church that carries it.
The disruption of tradition means the destruction of a culture.
I am not sure that we ought to risk such a peril.
If we want to maintain the spiritual contents of 2000 years of Christian tradition, we must understand what it is all about.
One can do that only if one assumes that it makes sense.
As religious assertions never make sense when understood concretely, they needs must be comprehended as a symbolic psychic phenomenon.
That's the point I try to make clear to my contemporaries.
It is an ambitious and perhaps hopeless enterprise, but I believe in the Roman principle dulce et decorum est pro patria mori; instead of patria you read patrimonium christianum.
I have realized from your previous letter that you are already 76 years old; I hadn't realized that before.
I am now in my 80th and I must say I am grateful to whomever administers my fate that I have met in you a kindred spirit interested in and talking of things that seem to be vital to you.
I assure you there are not many.
The ecclesia spiritualis is a very small concern, and pays little dividends.
My best wishes for you,
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung
P .S. Indeed I do remember Frederik van Eeden:
I may have seen him personally even, but I am not quite sure; it is so long ago, between 40 and 50 years.
I remember him as a very sensitive and sweet nature, definitely without the stamina a pioneer needs.
He was dangerously near the modern mind, but his weakness led him into the protection of the ecclesiastical walls.
I don't know how he felt about his conversion. His was a way back, but not out. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 214-215.

Carl Jung on “Speaking in Tongues.” (2015-08-16 16:57)

To E . V. Tenney
Dear Dr. Tenney, 23 February 1955

It was a great pleasure to receive a letter from you.
I often wondered how you were faring and how you digested all the difficult stuff you have devoured in Zurich.
I see from your letter that the digestive process has made a great step forward, which is very satisfactory.
There is no objection to your making extracts from the seminar notes, but I must warn you that I have never been able to go through them and correct minor errors of all descriptions found all over the texts.
It is also expected that you wouldn't use them for quotations in printed papers without special permission.
Now as to your questions:
1 . Speaking with tongues (glossolalia) is observed in cases of ekstasis (= abaissement du niveau mental, predominance of the unconscious) It is probable that the strangeness of the unconscious contents not yet integrated in consciousness demands an equally strange language.
As it does demand strange pictures of an unheard of character, it is also a traditional expectation that the spiritual demonic inspiration manifests itself either in hieratic or otherwise incomprehensible language.
That is also the reason why primitives and civilized people still use archaic forms of language on ritual occasions (Sanskrit in India, Old Coptic in the Coptic church, Old Slavonic in the Greek Orthodox church, Latin in the Catholic church, and mediaeval German or English in the Protestant church).
There are case reports about mediums that spoke foreign languages which were unknown to them in their waking state.
Theodore Flournoy in Geneva reported such a case in which he showed that it was a question of a cryptomnesic Sanskrit the medium had picked up in a Sanskrit grammar whose existence nobody was aware of.
It is exceedingly difficult to establish the authenticity of these cases on account of cryptomnesia.
2 . The healing function is not necessarily a characteristic of individuation; it is a thing in itself.
It also doesn't work exclusively through transference; that is a Freudian prejudice.
It is evident that healing presupposes a special kind and faculty of understanding and compassion.
3 · You find visual images in the process of analysis chiefly with people of a visual type.
The way the unconscious manifests itself depends very much upon your functional type.
It can manifest itself in the most unexpectedly various ways.
Your story of the Catholic priests is delightful; they were obviously shielding themselves from the devil when he crept up in what you said.
If you discuss religious problems and you bring in a psychological point of view, you instantly collide with the concretism of religious belief.
You know the Virgin has been taken up to Heaven, and that ought to be believed quite concretely although no theologian can explain to me whether she has been taken up in her shirt or other pieces of clothing or naked, and what happened to her garments: did they become eternal too, or what happened to the microbes that are in every human body: did they become immortal too?
You see, psychology takes into account all such heretical aspects, while the believers in concrete truth never think of such things.
You are quite right that you did not found any organization, things always become rigid.
I am very glad that Time has brought out a decent article; I was afraid they would make a caricature of it as is usually the case.
Another aspect of this concretism is the rigidity of scholastic philosophy, through which Father "White is wriggling as well as he can.
He is at bottom an honest and sincere man who cannot but admit the importance of psychology, but the trouble is that he gets into an awful stew about it.
Analytical psychology unfortunately just touches the vulnerable spot of the church, viz. the untenable concretism of its beliefs, and the syllogistic character of Thomistic philosophy.
This is of course a terrific snag, but-one could almost say -fortunately people are unaware of the clashing contrasts.
Father White, however, is by no means unconscious of those clashes; it is a very serious personal problem to him.
But it is the same with Protestantism: there is the same difficulty between a concrete or historic belief and a symbolic understanding.

One could well say it is a problem of our time whether our mind is capable of developing itself so that it can understand the symbolic point of view or not.
I had some correspondence recently with Upton Sinclair; he is going to publish my last letter in the New Republic. You will see when you read that letter how I try to insinuate the symbolic point of view into a rationalistic attitude.
Now I think I have answered all your main questions.
My best regards to Mrs . Tenney,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung and moving into Aquarius, and the Sibylline Books (2015-08-17 05:30)

To Adolf Keller
Dear friend, 25 February 1955

It was very kind of you to take the time and trouble to react at such length to the article in Time.
our interpretation of my strange-looking visage is excellent.
The photographer, who bored me excruciatingly with his many exposures, must have caught me in an absentminded moment when I was sunk in my thoughts.
My thoughts about ”this world” were not-and are not-enjoyable.
The drive of the unconscious towards mass murder on a global scale is not exactly a cheering prospect.
Transitions between the aeons always seem to have been melancholy and despairing times, as for instance the collapse of the Old Kingdom in Egypt (”The Dialogue of a World; Weary Man with His Soul”) between Taurus and Aries, or the melancholy of the Augustinian age between Aries and Pisces.
And now we are moving into Aquarius, of which the Sibylline Books say: Luciferi vires accendit Aquarius acres (Aquarius inflames the savage forces of Lucifer).
And we are only at the beginning of this apocalyptic development!
Already I am a great-grandfather twice over and see those distant generations growing up who long after we are gone will spend their lives in that darkness.
I would accuse myself of senile pessimism did I not know that the H-bomb is lying ready to hand-a fact that unfortunately can no longer be doubted.
Only a Herostratus in the Kremlin is needed to push the button.
And if we are lucky enough to escape that, what about the overpopulation problem?
Best greetings,

Carl Jung: There are mere chance occurrences as well as synchronicity (2015-08-17 06:08)

To Evelyn Thorne
Dear Miss Thorne, 23 March 1955
Thank you very much for your interesting letter.
I can confirm your observation from my own experience.
Time and again I have observed that when I was busy with a special thought or a work of a remote kind, I found that the theme was picked up in newspaper articles or in letters I got from strangers as if it has been broadcasted.
Sometimes this observation was so striking that I myself thought of the possibility that it might be a case of synchronicity.
But your observation of the colours worn by people in a crowd shows that it must be a matter of the accumulation phenomenon in chance series.
You can observe this fact easily when you watch the traffic on roads where it is not continuous.
You will notice that cars or pedestrians have a marked tendency to come in aperiodic batches interspersed with solitary pedestrians or cars.
These accumulation phenomena are just chance occurrences.
Thus we have to consider the coincidence of themes in manuscripts or newspaper articles in the first place as mere chance, although with a certain mental reservation.
At the time of Immanuel Kant there were quite a number of philosophers with a very similar kind of mind, and also at the time of Charles Darwin there were at least three other minds at work to produce similar ideas independently of each other.
In such cases one feels tempted to think of a peculiar Zeitgeist secretly at work and pushing forward certain instrumental individuals.
Unfortunately, this hypothesis is difficult to prove, yet it seems to me as if the latter phenomena were somewhere midway between mere chance occurrences and positive synchronistic phenomena.

By the way, my essay on synchronicity will soon be published in English translation by the Bollingen Press.
Thanking you again,
I remain,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Upton Sinclair's "Personal Christ." (2015-08-17 07:09)

To Upton Sinclair
Dear Mr. Sinclair, 7 January 1955

Having read your novel Our Lady and having enjoyed every page of it, I cannot refrain from bothering you again with a letter.
This is the trouble you risk when giving your books to a psychologist who has made it his profession to receive impressions and to have reactions.
On the day after I had read the story, I happened to come across the beautiful text of the ”Exultet” in the Easter night liturgy:
0 inaestimabilis dilectio caritatis
Ut servum redimeres, Filium tradidisti!
0 certe necessarium Adae peccatum,
Quod Christi morte deletum est!
0 felix culpa
Quae talem ac tantum meruit habere Redemptorem
Although I am peculiarly sensitive to the beauty of the liturgical language and of the feeling expressed therein, something was amiss, as if a corner had been knocked off or a precious stone fallen from its setting.
When trying to understand, I instantly remembered the bewildered Marya confronted with the incongruities of the exorcism, her beautiful and simple humanity caught in the coils of a vast historical process which had supplanted her concrete and immediate life by the almost inhuman superstructure of a dogmatic and ritual nature, so strange that, in spite of the identity of names and biographical items, she was not even able to recognize the story of herself and of her beloved son.
By the way, a masterful touch! I also remembered your previous novel about the idealistic youth who had almost become a saviour through one of those angelic tricks well known since the time of Enoch (the earthly adventure of Samiasaz and his angelic host).
And moreover, I recalled your Jesus biography.
Then I knew what it was that caused my peculiarly divided feeling: it was your common sense and realism, reducing the Holy Legend to human proportions and to probable possibilities, that never fails in knocking off a piece of the spiritual architecture or in causing a slight tremor of the Church’s mighty structure.
The anxiety of the priests to suppress the supposedly satanic attempt at verisimilitude is therefore most convincing, as the devil is particularly dangerous when he tells the truth, as he often does (vide the biography of St. Anthony of Egypt by St. Athanasius).
It is obviously your laudabilis intentio to extract a quintessence of truth from the incomprehensible chaos of historical distortions and dogmatic constructions, a truth of human size and acceptable to common sense.
Such an attempt is hopeful and promises success, as the ”truth” represented by the Church is so remote from ordinary understanding as to be well-nigh inacceptable.
At all events, it conveys nothing any more to the modern mind that wants to understand since it is incapable of blind belief.
In this respect, you continue the Strauss Renan tradition in liberal theology.
I admit it is exceedingly probable that there is a human story at the bottom of it all.
But under these conditions I must ask: Why the devil had this simple and therefore satisfactory story to be embellished and distorted beyond recognition?
Or why had Jesus taken on unmistakably mythological traits already with the Gospel writers?
And why is this process continued even in our enlightened days when the original picture has been obscured beyond all reasonable expectation?
Why the Assumptio of 1950 and the Encyclical Ad caeli Reginam of Oct. 1, 1954?
The impossibility of a concrete saviour, as styled by the Gospel writers, is and has always been to me obvious and indubitable.
Yet I know my contemporaries too well to forget that to them it is news hearing the simple fundamental story.
Liberal theology and incidentally your laudabilis intentio have definitely their place where they make sense.
To me the human story is the inevitable point de depart, the self-evident basis of historical Christianity.
It is the ”small beginnings” of an amazing development.
But the human story-I beg your pardon-is just ordinary, well within the confines of everyday life, not exciting and unique and thus not particularly interesting.

We have heard it a thousand times and we ourselves have lived it at least in parts.
It is the well-known psychological ensemble of Mother and beloved Son, and how the legend begins with mother's anxieties and hopes and son's heroic fantasies and helpful friends and foes joining in, magnifying and augmenting little deviations from the truth and thus slowly creating the web called the reputation of a personality.
Here you have me-the psychologist-with what the French call his deformation professionnelle.
He is blase, overfed with the "simple" human story, which does not touch his interest and particularly not his religious feeling.
The human story is even the thing to get away from, as the small story is neither exciting nor edifying.
On the contrary, one wants to hear the great story of gods and heroes and how the world was created and so on.
The small stories can be heard where the women wash in the river, or in the kitchen or at the village well, and above all everybody lives them at home.
That has been so since the dawn of consciousness.
But there was a time in antiquity, about the fourth century B.C. (I am not quite certain about the date.
Being actually away on vacation, I miss my library!), when a man Euhemeros made himself a 'name through a then new theory: The divine and heroic myth is founded upon the small story of an ordinary human chief or petty king of local fame, magnified by a minstrel's fantasy.
All-Father Zeus, the mighty "gatherer of clouds," was originally a little tyrant, ruling some villages from his maison forte upon a hill, and "nocturnis ululatibus horrenda Prosperpina" was presumably his awe-inspiring mother-in-law.
That was certainly a time sick of the old gods and their ridiculous fairy stories, curiously similar to the "enlightenment" of our epoch equally fed up with its "myth" and welcoming any kind of iconoclasm, from the Encyclopedia of the XVI-IIth century to the Freudian theory reducing the religious "illusion" to the basic "family romance" with its incestuous innuendos in the early XXth century.
Unlike your predecessor, you do not insist upon the chronique scandaleuse of the Olympians and other ideals, but with a loving hand and with decency like a benevolent pedagogue, you take your reader by the hand:
"I am going to tell you a better story, something nice and reasonable, that anybody can accept.I don't repeat these ancient absurdities, these god-awful theologoumena like the Virgin Birth, blood and flesh mysteries, and other wholly superfluous miracle gossip. I show you the touching and simple humanity behind these gruesome inventions of be-nighted ecclesiastical brains."
This is a kind-hearted iconoclasm far more deadly than the frankly murderous arrows from M. de Voltaire's quiver: all these mythological assertions are so obviously impossible that their refutation is not even needed.
These relics of the dark ages vanish like morning mist before the rising sun, when the idealistic and charming gar-dener's boy experiments with miracles of the good old kind, or when your authentic Galilean grandmother "Marya" does not even recognize herself or her beloved son in the picture produced by the magic mirror of Christian tradition.
Yet, why should a more or less ordinary story of a good mother and her well-meaning idealistic boy give rise to one of the most amazing mental or spiritual developments of all times?
Who or what is its agens?
Why could the facts not remain as they were originally?
The answer is obvious: The story is so ordinary that there would not have been any reason for its tradition, quite certainly not for its world-wide expansion. The fact that the original situation has developed into one of the most extraordinary myths about a divine heros, a God-man and his cosmic fate, is not due to its underlying human story, but to the powerful action of pre-existing mythological motifs attributed to the biographically almost unknown Jesus, a wandering miracle Rabbi in the style of the ancient Hebrew prophets, or of the contemporary teacher John the Baptizer, or of the much later Zaddiks of the Chassidim.
The immediate source and origin of the myth projected upon the teacher Jesus is to be found in the then popular Book of Enoch and its central figure of the "Son of Man" and his messianic mission.
From the Gospel texts it is even manifest that Jesus identified himself with this "Son of Man."
Thus it is the spirit of his time, the collective hope and expectation, which caused this astounding Transformation and not at all the more or less insignificant story of the man Jesus.
The true agens is the archetypal image of the God-man, appearing in Ezekiel's visio for the first time in Jewish history, but in itself a considerably older figure in Egyptian theology, viz., Osiris and Horus.

The transformation of Jesus, i.e., the integration of his human self into a super- or inhuman figure of a deity, accounts for the amazing ”distortion” of his ordinary personal biography.
In other words: the essence of Christian tradition is by no means the simple man Jesus whom we seek in vain in the Gospels, but the lore of the God-man and his cosmic drama.
Even the Gospels themselves make it their special job to prove that their Jesus is the incarnated God equipped with all the magic powers of a Kvpw> rwv 7rvwp.arwv.
That is why they are so liberal with miracle gossip which they naively assume proves their point.
It is only natural that the subsequent post-apostolic developments even went several points better.
In this respect, and in our days the process of mythological integration is still expanding and spreading itself even to Jesus’ mother, formerly carefully kept down to the human rank and file for at least 500 years of early church history.
Boldly breaking through the sacrosanct rule about the definability of a new dogmatic truth, viz., that the said truth is only definibilis inasmuch as it was believed and taught in apostolic times, explicite or implicite, the pope has declared the Assumptio Mariae a dogma of the Christian creed.
The justification he relies on is the pious belief of the masses for more than 1000 years, which he considers sufficient proof of the work of the Holy Ghost.
Obviously the ”pious belief” of the masses continues the process of projection, i.e., of transformation of human situations into myth.
But why should there be myth at all?
My letter is already too long so that I can’t answer this last question any more, but I have written several books about it.
I only wanted to explain to you my idea that in trying to extract the quintessence of Christian tradition, you have removed it like Prof. Buitmann in his attempt at ”demythologizing” the Gospels.
One cannot help admitting that the human story is so very much more probable, but it has little or nothing to do with the problem of the myth containing the essence of Christian religion.
You catch your priests most cleverly in the disadvantageous position which they have created for themselves by their preaching a concrete historicity of clearly mythological facts.
Nobody reading your admirable novel can deny being deeply impressed by the very dramatic confrontation of the original with the mythological picture, and very probably he will prefer the human story to its mythological ”distortion.”
But what about the &avyycfA.wv, the ” message” of the God-man and Redeemer and his divine fate, the very foundation of everything that is holy to the Church?
There is the spiritual heritage and harvest of 1900 years still to account for, and I am very doubtful whether the reduction to common sense is the correct answer or not.
As a matter of fact, I attribute an incomparably greater importance to the dogmatic truth than to the probable human story.
The religious need gets nothing out of the latter, and at all events less than from a mere belief in Jesus Christ or any other dogma.
Inasmuch as the belief is real and living, it works.
But inasmuch as it is mere imagination and an effort of the will without understanding, I see little merit in it.
Unfortunately, this unsatisfactory condition prevails in modern times, and in so far as there is nothing beyond belief without understanding but doubt and skepticism, the whole Christian tradition goes by the board as a mere fantasy.
I consider this event a tremendous loss for which we are to pay a terrific price.
The effect becomes visible in the dissolution of ethical values and a complete disorientation of our Weltanschauung.
The ”truths” of natural science or ”existential philosophy” are poor surrogates.
Natural ”laws” are in the main mere abstractions (being statistical averages) instead of reality, and they abolish individual existence as being merely exceptional.
But the individual as the only carrier of life and existence is of paramount importance.
He cannot be substituted by a group or by a mass.
Yet we are rapidly approaching a state in which nobody will accept individual responsibility any more.

We prefer to leave it as an odious business to groups and organizations, blissfully unconscious of the fact that the group or mass psyche is that of an animal and wholly inhuman.
What we need is the development of the inner spiritual man, the unique individual whose treasure is hidden on the one hand in the symbols of our mythological tradition, and on the other hand in man's unconscious psyche.
It is tragic that science and its philosophy discourage the individual and that theology resists every reasonable attempt to understand its symbols.
Theologians call their creed a symbolum but they refuse to call their truth "symbolic."
Yet, if it is anything, it is anthropomorphic symbolism and therefore capable of re-interpretation.
Hoping you don't mind my frank discussion of your very inspiring writings,
I remain, with my best wishes for the New Year,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
P.S. Thank you very much for your kind letter that has reached me just now.
I am amazed at the fact that you should have difficulties in finding a publisher.
What is America coming to, when her most capable authors cannot reach their public anymore?

Carl Jung on "Speaking in Tongues." (2015-08-18 05:37)

To E . V. Tenney
Dear Dr. Tenney, 23 February 1955
It was a great pleasure to receive a letter from you.
I often wondered how you were faring and how you digested all the difficult stuff you have devoured in Zurich.
I see from your letter that the digestive process has made a great step forward, which is very satisfactory.
There is no objection to your making extracts from the seminar notes, but I must warn you that I have never been able to go through them and correct minor errors of all descriptions found all over the texts.
It is also expected that you wouldn't use them for quotations in printed papers without special permission.
Now as to your questions:
1 . Speaking with tongues (glossolalia) is observed in cases of ekstasis (= abaissement du niveau mental, predominance of the unconscious) It is probable that the strangeness of the unconscious contents not yet integrated in consciousness demands an equally strange language.

As it does demand strange pictures of an unheard of character, it is also a traditional expectation that the spiritual demonic inspiration manifests itself either in hieratic or otherwise incomprehensible language.
That is also the reason why primitives and civilized people still use archaic forms of language on ritual occasions (Sanskrit in India, Old Coptic in the Coptic church, Old Slavonic in the Greek Orthodox church, Latin in the Catholic church, and mediaeval German or English in the Protestant church).
There are case reports about mediums that spoke foreign languages which were unknown to them in their waking state.
Theodore Flournoy in Geneva reported such a case in which he showed that it was a question of a cryptomnesic Sanskrit the medium had picked up in a Sanskrit grammar whose existence nobody was aware of.
It is exceedingly difficult to establish the authenticity of these cases on account of cryptomnesia.
2 . The healing function is not necessarily a characteristic of individuation; it is a thing in itself.
It also doesn't work exclusively through transference; that is a Freudian prejudice.
It is evident that healing presupposes a special kind and faculty of understanding and compassion.
3 · You find visual images in the process of analysis chiefly with people of a visual type.
The way the unconscious manifests itself depends very much upon your functional type.
It can manifest itself in the most unexpectedly various ways.
Your story of the Catholic priests is delightful; they were obviously shielding themselves from the devil when he crept up in what you said.
If you discuss religious problems and you bring in a psychological point of view, you instantly collide with the concretism of religious belief.
You know the Virgin has been taken up to Heaven, and that ought to be believed quite concretely although no theologian can explain to me whether she has been taken up in her shirt or other pieces of clothing or naked, and what happened to her garments: did they become eternal too, or what happened to the microbes that are in every human body: did they become immortal too?
You see, psychology takes into account all such heretical aspects, while the believers in concrete truth never think of such things.
You are quite right that you did not found any organization, things always become rigid.
I am very glad that Time has brought out a decent article; I was afraid they would make a caricature of it as is usually the case.
Another aspect of this concretism is the rigidity of scholastic philosophy, through which Father "White is wriggling as well as he can.
He is at bottom an honest and sincere man who cannot but admit the importance of psychology, but the trouble is that he gets into an awful stew about it.
Analytical psychology unfortunately just touches the vulnerable spot of the church, viz. the untenable concretism of its beliefs, and the syllogistic character of Thomistic philosophy.
This is of course a terrific snag, but-one could almost say -fortunately people are unaware of the clashing contrasts.
Father White, however, is by no means unconscious of those clashes; it is a very serious personal problem to him.
But it is the same with Protestantism: there is the same difficulty between a concrete or historic belief and a symbolic understanding.
One could well say it is a problem of our time whether our mind is capable of developing itself so that it can understand the symbolic point of view or not.
I had some correspondence recently with Upton Sinclair; he is going to publish my last letter in the New Republic.
You will see when you read that letter how I try to insinuate the symbolic point of view into a rationalistic attitude.
Now I think I have answered all your main questions.
My best regards to Mrs . Tenney,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Mescaline (2015-08-18 06:03)

[Carl Jung on Mescaline]
To A. M. Hubbard
Dear Sir, 15 February 1955

Thank you for your kind invitation to contribute to your mescalin scheme.
Although I have never taken the drug myself nor given it to another individual, I have at least devoted 40 years of my life to the study of that psychic sphere which is disclosed by the said drug; that is the sphere of numinous experiences.
Thirty years ago I became acquainted with Dr. Prinzhom's mescalin experiments and thus I had ample opportunity to learn about the effects of the drug as well as about the nature of the psychic material involved in the experiment.
I cannot help agreeing with you that the said experiment is of the highest psychological interest in a theoretical way.
But when it comes to the practical and more or less general application of mescalin, I have certain doubts and hesitations.
The analytical method of psychotherapy (e.g., "active imagination") yields very similar results, viz. full realization of complexes and numinous dreams and visions.
These phenomena occur at their proper time and place in the course of the treatment.
Mescalin, however, uncovers such psychic facts at any time and place when and where it is by no Means certain that the individual is mature enough to integrate them.
Mescalin is a drug similar to hashish and opium in so far as it is a poison, paralysing the normal function of apperception and thus giving free rein to the psychic factors underlying sense perception.
These aesthetic factors account for colours, sounds, forms, associations, and emotions attributed by the unconscious psyche to the mere stimulus provided by the objects.
They are comparable in Hindu philosophy to the concept of the "thinker" of the thought, the "feeler" of feeling, the "sounder" of sound, etc.
It is just as if mescalin were taking away the top layer of apperception, which produces the "accurate" picture of the object as it looks to us.
If this layer is removed, we immediately discover the variants of conscious perception and apperception, viz. a rich display of contingent colours, forms, associations, etc., from which under normal conditions the process of apperception selects the correct quality.
Perception and apperception result from a complicated process which transforms the physical and physiological stimulus into a psychic image.
In this way, the unconscious psyche adds colours, sounds, associations, meaning, etc. out of the treasure of its subliminal possibilities.
These additions, if unchecked, would dissolve into or cover up the objective image by an infinite variety, a real "fantasia" or symphony of shades and nuances both of qualities as well as of meanings.
But the normal process of conscious perception and apperception aims at the production of a "correct" representation of the object excluding all subliminal perceptional variants.
Could we uncover the unconscious layer next to consciousness during the process of apperception, we would be confronted with an infinitely moving world riotous with colours, sounds, forms, emotions, meanings, etc.
But out of all this emerges a relatively drab and banal picture devoid of emotion and poor in meaning.
In psychotherapy and psychopathoiogy we have discovered the same variants (usually, however, in a less gorgeous array) through amplification of certain conscious images.
Mescalin brusquely removes the veil of the selective process and reveals the underlying layer of perceptional variants, apparently a world of infinite wealth.
Thus the individual gains an insight and a full view of psychic possibilities which he otherwise (f.i. through "active imagination") would reach only by assiduous work and a relatively long and difficult training.
But if he reaches and experiences [them in this way], he has not only acquired them by legitimate endeavour but he has also arrived at the same time in a mental position where he can integrate the meaning of his experience.
Mescalin is a short cut and therefore yields as a result only a perhaps awe-inspiring aesthetic impression, which remains an isolated, unintegrated experience contributing very little to the development of human personality.
I have seen some peyotees in New Mexico and they did not compare favourably with the ordinary Pueblo Indians.
They gave me the impression of drug addicts.
They would be an interesting object for a closer psychiatric investigation.
The idea that mescalin could produce a transcendental experience is shocking.
The drug merely uncovers the normally unconscious functional layer of perceptional and emotional variants, which are only psychologically transcendent but by no means ”transcendental,” i.e., metaphysical.

Such an experiment may be in practice good for people having a desire to convince themselves of the real existence of an unconscious psyche.
It could give them a fair idea of its reality.
But I never could accept mescalin as a means to convince people of the possibility of spiritual experience over against their materialism.
It is on the contrary an excellent demonstration of Marxist materialism: mescalin is the drug by which you can manipulate the brain so that it produces even so-called ”spiritual” experiences.
That is the ideal case for Bolshevik philosophy and its ”brave new world.”
If that is all the Occident has to offer in the way of ”transcendental” experience, we would but confirm the Marxist aspirations to prove that the ”spiritual” experience can be just as well produced by chemical means.
There is finally a question which I am unable to answer, as I have no corresponding experience: it concerns the possibility that a drug opening the door to the unconscious could also release a latent, potential psychosis.
As far as my experience goes, such latent dispositions are considerably more frequent than actual psychoses, and thus there exists a fair chance of hitting upon such a case during mescalin experiments.
It would be a highly interesting though equally disagreeable experience, such cases being the bogey of psychotherapy.
Hoping you are not offended by the frankness of my critical opinion,
I remain, dear Sir,
Yours very truly,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 222-224.

Carl Jung on the Individual and Society (2015-08-18 13:47)

To Hans A . Illing
Dear Dr. Illing, 10 February 1955
I give the adaptation of the individual to society its full due.
But I still stand up for the inalienable rights of the individual since alone is the carrier of life and is gravely threatened by the social leveling process today.
Even in the smallest group he is acceptable only if he appears acceptable to the majority of its members.
He has to resign himself to being tolerated.
But mere toleration is no improvement; on the contrary, it fosters self-doubt, to which the isolated individual who has something to espouse is particularly prone.
I am no preacher of ”splendid isolation” and have the greatest difficulty in shielding myself from the crushing demands of people and human relationships.
Without values of one’s own even social relationships lack significance.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 221.

Carl Jung on The ruler of my birth, old Saturnus (2015-08-18 14:11)

To Upton Sinclair
Dear Mr. Sinclair, 25 February 1955

Thank you very much for all you have sent me!
You are really of an astounding fertility.
I have read your drama with the greatest interest.
I could not help being deeply moved by the human aspect of this horrible problem.
There is indeed no other answer to it but suicide.
It is so because these inventions-the uranium and hydrogen bomb-are produced by the human mind, instigated by the great genocide the unconscious is planning in order to compensate the incessant and inevitable increase of populations, which must eventually lead to gigantic catastrophes if miraculous and unforeseen inventions do not intervene.
But even then the conflagration would only be postponed.
This is the sword of Damocles suspended on a thin thread above our heads.
Your drama is certainly a thrust that goes home, at least in the case of a naive spectator like myself, of whose literary incompetence I must warn you.
I have read your letter to Time and I have added-with your permission-some further historical detail.
Thank you for the copy of Time!
A. Keller was enthusiastic about my portrait.
Needless to say I don't know myself from that side.
The photographer must have caught me at something.
I thank you also for your interesting Mental Radio.
Each time I read such reports I am reminded of the fact that our psyche has an aspect that defies space and time and incidentally causality, and this is just the thing our parapsychologists do not yet understand.
Your idea of a feminist revolt in Heaven is most amusing.
Incidentally, this is the reason, viz. the Assumptio B .V. Mariae, why I enjoy a relatively decent press on the Catholic side, while the usual stuff I get is just the kind you have sent me.
The incompetent and profoundly ignorant reviewers sneeze at me.
On the average, I only get bad reviews, which ought to convince me that I am writing pretty good stuff.
Sometimes it is hard to believe it.
Yet in the same mail I received a very decent review of Psychology and Alchemy by an American, a Mr. Sykes.
He has to do with Salzburg and the American School there.
But fortunately enough, to judge from the satisfactory sale of my books, the public does not heed such inadequate criticism.
You are quite right; with the dogma of the Assumptio the unconscious "wells into the Church," since Woman is its (the unconscious) representative on earth.
Concerning "Enemy in the Mouth," you might try the Bollingen Press. (. . .)
Let me know and I shall recommend it to Barrett.
Alcoholism is a terrible threat to a nation. Look at France!
My Answer to Job was left by the Bollingen Press to the English publishers, since they were apparently afraid of something like "Unamerican activities" and the loss of prestige presumably.
It is a book for the few, yet-I am afraid-the many may read and misunderstand it.
Yet even in this case I get most enthusiastic letters, but almost without exception from simple people.
They seem to be the main readers of my books.
Now don't tease yourself-! am hardly respectable, but you are much better known in USA than I am.
Please don't put yourself out for my little book.
It will get on its way slowly as all my other work has done.
The ruler of my birth, old Saturnus, slowed down my maturation process to such an extent that I became aware of my own ideas only at the beginning of the second half of my life, i.e., exactly with 36 years.
I beg your pardon for using old astrological metaphors.
"Astrology" is another of those "random phenomena" wiped off the desk by the idol of the average, which everybody believes to be reality itself while it is a mere abstract.
Soon a little book of mine which I have published with the physicist Prof. W. Pauli will come out in English.

It is even more shocking than Job, but this time to the scientist, not the theologian.
It deals with the ”random phenomenon” of extrasensory perception, especially its theory, as far as my contribution goes.
Pauli’s part deals with the role the archetype plays in the formation of certain physical concepts.
The public reaction will be even worse than in the case of Job.
The way in which the scientific world reacts reminds me strongly of those remote times when I stood up all alone for Freud against a world blindfolded by prejudice, and ever since I have been the subject of calumny, irritation, and contempt, although I have harvested a good deal of appreciation paradoxically enough just from universities (among them Oxford and Harvard).
I hardly dare to assume that they did not know what they were doing.
Now who is right, my critics or the academies?
In the meantime, I can say with Schopenhauer (whose fate was worse: of his first edition only 1 copy was sold!): “I am read and I shall be read.”
I am sorry taking up your valuable time with such personal outpourings.
I only wanted to explain why I take bad criticism as the thing to be expected, whereas a decent review is a rare exception and therefore an unpredictable ”random phenomenon.”
Hoping that I have answered every point in your letter,
I remain,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 230-232.

Carl Jung: The vernal equinox is moving out of the sign of Pisces... (2015-08-19 05:40)

To Pater Lucas Menz, O.S. B .
Dear Pater Lucas, 22 February 1955
I have read your draft with great interest.
Considering the terrible time in which we are living, I am bound to agree.
It reminds me of the beneficent work of the O.S.B. in those dark centuries when the culture of antiquity was gradually falling into decay.
Now once again we are in a time of decay and transition, as around 2000 B.C, when the Old Kingdom of Egypt collapsed, and at the beginning of the Christian era, when the New Kingdom finally came to an end and with it classical Greece.
The vernal equinox is moving out of the sign of Pisces into the sign of Aquarius, just as it did out of Taurus (the old bull gods) into Aries (the ram-horned gods) and then out of Aries (the sacrificed lamb) into Pisces.
It is to be hoped that the O.S.B. will succeed in launching another salvaging operation this time too.
1500 years ago St. Benedict could pour the new wine into new bottles; or rather, the seeds of a new culture germinating in the decay were bedded in the new spirit of Christianity.
Our apocalyptic epoch likewise contains the seeds of a different, unprecedented, and still inconceivable future which could be bedded in the Christian spirit if only this would renew itself, as happened with the seeds that sprouted from the decay of classical culture.
But here, it seems to me, lies the great difficulty.
The coming new age will be as vastly different from ours as the world of the 19th century was from that of the 20th with its atomic physics and its psychology of the unconscious.
Never before has mankind been torn into two halves, and never before was the power of Absolute destruction given into the hand of man himself.
It is a ”godlike” power that has fallen into human hands.

The dignitas humani generis has swollen into a truly diabolical grandeur.
What answer will the genius of mankind give?
Or what will God do about it?
You answer with the historical spirit in which St. Benedict answered, but he spoke and acted with a new spirit that was a match for the anti-spirit of his age.
Is that answer also equal to the present problem?
And does it comprehend the terrible grandeur that has revealed itself in man?
It seems to me we haven't yet noticed that such a question has been posed at all.
We are still stuck in the fearful murk and confusion of unconsciousness.
Christianity brought the world a new light, the lux moderna (as the alchemists called their lumen naturae).
Today this light flickers and wavers alarmingly, and the wheel of history cannot be turned back.
Even the Emperor Augustus with all his power could not push through his attempts at repristination.
You have rightly guessed that I am as worried as you are and have every sympathy with your aspirations.
But why do you turn to me, a dyed-in-the-wool Protestant?
Presumably you are thinking of my psychology which, though born of the Christian spirit, seeks to give adequate answers to the spirit of this age: the voice of a doctor struggling to heal the psychic confusion of his time and thus compelled to use a language very different from yours.
In all too many cases the old language is no longer understood, or is understood in the wrong way.
If I have to make the meaning of the Christian message intelligible to a patient, I must translate it with a commentary.
In fact this is one practical aim of my psychology, or rather psychotherapy.
The theologian could hardly go along with this, although St. Paul himself spoke Greek to the Greeks and probably wouldn't have been deterred even if the head of the community at Jerusalem had forbidden it.
I am taking the liberty of sending you my book Aion, from which you will see that you are dealing with a heretic and could get your fingers burned.
I would like to spare you this, for you can help many people even without modern psychology.
I can only wish your endeavour every success, since I understand it perfectly although outsiders can't see that.
For most people my Christian standpoint remains hidden, and because of the strangeness of my language and the incomprehensibility of my interests I am given a wide berth.
With kind regards,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung: ”Thank you for your letter and all the criticism it contains.”] (2015-08-19 08:48)

[Carl Jung: “Man must know that he is man’s worst enemy just as much as God had to learn from Job about His own antithetical nature.”]
To Father Victor White
Dear Victor, 2 April 1955
Thank you for your letter and all the criticism it contains.
As long as you do not identify yourself with the avenging angel, I can feel your humanity and I can tell you that I am really sorry for my misdeeds and sore about God’s ways with the poor anthropoids that were meant to have a brain enabling them to think critically.
Just as I am grateful for the fact that you call me to order and that your judgment-be it correct or not-does not spare me, so I assume God will listen to a mortal voice, just as much as He has given His ear to Job when this little tortured worm complained about His paradoxical, amoral nature.
Just as Job lifted his voice so that everybody could hear him, I have come to the conclusion that I had better risk my skin and do my worst or best to shake the unconsciousness of my contemporaries rather than allow my laxity to let things drift towards the impending world catastrophe.
Man must know that he is man’s worst enemy just as much as God had to learn from Job about His own antithetical nature.
It is obvious that God’s angel (having no will of his own) wanted to have his fight with Jacob and to kill him even if he would not defend himself.

I bet the angel got some good knocking about before he succeeded in dislocating Jacob's hip.
God surely expected Jacob to answer Him in kind.
I am rather certain that Job's case was the same.
As a matter of fact there is biblical authority on my side: Isaiah 48:10-11)
"Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver; I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction.
For mine own sake, even for mine own sake will I do it."
Should I set the light of such an insight "under a bushel"?
In peaceful and harmless conditions it would have been very unwise to movere quieta.
But in our time everything is at stake, and one should not mind the little disturbance I am causing.
It is a mere fleabite on the immense body of Christendom.
If I am causing trouble to the peace of mind of serious theologians, I am sorry, but I really do not see why their sleep is better than mine.
They have no prerogative to hide from the great wind of the world and to leave uncomfortable things to themselves.
The other day I got a letter from a student of (Catholic) theology who had asked his directeur de conscience for advice as to the study of modern psychology.
Very aptly the rev. father said: "Don't study what troubles you! "
I am afraid this is characteristic.
You should be glad that somebody thinks about God at all.
The apostles and the early Fathers of the Church had no easy life and moreover no Christian is meant to go to sleep in a safe pew.
Look at the world-the whole damn thing is rent from top to bottom, and so is man in our infernal epoch.
I hesitated and resisted long enough until I made up my mind to say what I think,
The peace of the Church is one thing and getting behind the times another.
I have asked four theologians (Prot.) about the modern position of the Church with reference to the question whether the God of the Old Testament is the same as that of the New.
Two did not answer at all.
One said that in the last 30 years theological literature does not speak of God any more.
The last one said:
"It is easy to answer your question. Yahweh is merely an archaic conception of God in Comparison with the NT idea."
I said: "This is exactly the kind of psychologism you accuse me of.
When it suits you, God is suddenly nothing but a conception, but when you preach of Him, then it is the absolute truth."
What did he say? Nothing.
The old Jesuit father Nicolaus Caussinus had a better answer:
In the OT God was like a raging rhinoceros, but in the NT He turned into a God of love conquered by the love of a pure virgin, having found peace in her lap at last-This is at least a kind of answer.
It is even a profound answer showing the importance of man in the divine drama of incarnation.
It obviously began when God took on personality (in contradistinction to all other god), i.e., finiteness.
This was the first act of kenosis on the way to incarnation.
This is the "Answer to Job":
He had to give up being the victim of unreflected opposites.
You lose nothing and you even gain something in contemplating such thoughts.
It affects your ecclesiastical position but not more than it disturbs my scientific position.
The pope breaking through apostolic authority and the theological resistance of his own clergy got his share too.
After Ad Caeli Reginam he got ill again.
There must have been a terrific conflict in him, being the pope on the one hand and the religious innovator on the other.
Should he have spared his clergy that could not agree with the new dogma?
I have no papal authority; only honest common sense and no power except the consensus of a very few thinking individuals.

As you do not belong to the Church exclusively but also to humanity, it is not in the interest of the Church if you pay no tribute to our time.
Even the pope did in his way.
Your sun in Libra demands undisturbed balance.
You only get it when either side carries equal weight.
Christ is crucified between the one going up and the other going down, i.e., between opposites.
So do not try to escape your fate "written in the stars."
I know, it is the mistake of Libra people: they are afraid of anything disturbing the balance. But they can maintain it only by "studying what troubles them."
Your criticism of my motive concerning Job is certainly unjust and you know it. It is an expression of the mental torment you had to undergo in U.S.A. and in Europe.
Nobody has more sympathy with your predicament than I have, since more than 50 years of uphill work outside, and of the curtain rent inside, have taught me something.
Having chosen the life of the monk you have separated yourself from this world and exposed yourself to the eternal fires of the other.
Somewhere you have to pay the toll either to man or to God and in the end you will discover that both overcharge you.
In this cruel suspension you will discover that redemption is to be found only on the middle ground, the centre of your self, which is just as much with as against God; with-inasmuch as God wills you; against-inasmuch as man's Luciferian autonomy exists outside of God.
It is as a matter of fact a product of the opposites in God.
That is exactly the problem I am treating in Job and that is why Job invokes the help of God against God.
It would be a great mistake to think you can slip through such an ordeal without the most violent emotions.
You yourself are profoundly emotional about it and you could not make anybody believe that you are not in a hell of suffering.
There is no comfort and no consolation anywhere except in the submission to and the Acceptance of the self, or you may call it the God that suffers in His own creation.
"Excoxi te . . . et elegi te in camino paupertatis. Propter Me, propter Me faciam" (Isaiah 48:10-11).
My psychology unfortunately tries to be honest.
It is certainly the hard way, neither an easy consolation nor a narcotic.
Nobody touching it in earnest can avoid seeing the dark side and feeling it.
Most certainly I shall never cover up the truth as I see it.
The Church can take it as one of the diabolic temptations of the world, and the world can condemn it as foolishness.
I shall stick to my conviction that my Answer to Job is a straightforward application of my psychological principles to certain central problems of our religion.
They can take it or leave it.
Moreover they will do what they please, without asking me.
Somehow I can afford my independence, but I am fully aware that there are many who cannot do the same without risking their social existence.
They must be able to live and to this end they have to protect themselves as well as they can.
If I had not been able to live an independent life, I should have been far more cautious in expressing my opinions and many things would have gone another way, f.i., I would not even have stuck out my neck for Freud, who had become my first great indiscretion.
Primum vivere necesse est, deinde philosophari-this is the hard rule for everybody fed by an institution for services rendered.
Only the free-lance can risk saying something beyond the conventional and thus cause discomfort to himself without endangering his very existence.
I fully understand therefore your critical outburst, but you must allow me nevertheless to call your attention to the fact that all the martyrs of your Church have been most unwise in this respect.

I have discovered in my private life that a true Christian is not bedded upon roses and he is not meant for peace and tranquility of mind but for war.
And again I am realizing profoundly that not everybody's nature is as bellicose as mine, although I have attained Deo concedente-a certain state of peace within, paid for by a rather uncomfortable state of war without.
But even if a peaceful nature has reached a certain higher level of consciousness he cannot escape the raging conflict of opposites in his soul, as God wants to unite His opposites in man.
As soon as a more honest and more complete consciousness beyond the collective level has been established, man is no more an end in himself, but becomes an instrument of God, and this is really so and no joke about it.
I have not made this world nor have I put a human soul into it.
This is His work and His responsibility and there is no judge above Him.
That is why the story begins with Job on the human level and with the assumption of personality on the divine level.
One can, like Job, lament about it, but it is to no purpose. It is just so.
If turmoil and torment become too great, there is still the oneness of the self, the divine spark within its inviolable precincts, offering its extramundane peace.
Please spend again some hours reading my Answer to Job with this comment in mind and see whether you still can maintain the idea that it is a case of mere spleen.
Could we not apply the same qualification to your own bad temper?
When you arrive in Zurich I shall be away in Bollingen; but when we return at the beginning of May, I should like you to stay with us in Kusnacht.
Cordially yours,

Carl Jung on "becoming whole and Holy. (2015-08-19 13:10)

To Pater Lucas Menz

Dear Pater Lucas, 28 March 1955
Many thanks for your kind and illuminating letter.
It affords me an invaluable glimpse into the process of becoming whole and holy.
On the way back through the history of mankind we integrate much that belongs to us and, deep down, also something of brother animal, who is actually holier than us since he cannot deviate from the divine will implanted in him because his dark consciousness shows him no other paths.
On this way back-no matter where it is begun if only it is trodden in earnest-we fall into the fire or, as the logion says, come near to it: "He that is near me is near the fire. He that is far from me is far from the kingdom."
The "taming of the beast," as you call it, is indeed a long process and coincides with the dissolution of egohood.
What you call "deselving" I call "becoming a self": what previously seemed to be "ego" is taken up into a greater dimension which dwarfs and surrounds me on all sides, and which I cannot grasp in its totality.
In this connection you, like me, rightly quote Paul, who formulates the same experience.
This experience is a charisma on the one hand, for it is not vouchsafed to us nisi Deo concedente.
On the other hand it is vouchsafed only if we give up the ego as the supreme authority and put ourselves wholly under the will of God.
You yourself feel the need for a definition of "perfection."
You define it as the "complete unfolding of nature on the level of holiness, brought about by surrendering to God."
In so far as God is wholeness himself, himself whole and holy, man attains his wholeness only in God, that is, in self-completeness, which in turn he attains only by submitting to God's will.
Since man in the state of wholeness and holiness is far from any kind of "perfection," the New Testament rDtnv<; must surely be translated as "complete."
For me the state of human wholeness is one of "completeness" and not of "perfection," an expression which, like "holiness," I tend to avoid.
You describe the ego (after the "taming of the beast") as being "in complete possession of itself."
Here I would say that the resistance coming from the psychic depths ceases if we can give up our egohood, and the self (consciousness + unconscious) receives us into its greater dimension, where we are then "whole," and because of our relative wholeness we are near to that which is truly whole, namely God.
(This is discussed in chs. IV and V of Aion.)
Hence I would say that God is then "in complete possession of the ego and of myself" rather than stress the power of the ego.
I don't know whether it is permissible, in our incompetence, to think on things divine.
I find that all my thoughts circle round God like the planets round the sun, and are as irresistibly attracted by him.
I would feel it the most heinous sin were I to offer any resistance to this compelling force.
I feel it is God's will that I should exercise the gift of thinking that has been vouchsafed me.
Therefore I put my thinking at his service and so come into conflict with the traditional doctrine, above all with the doctrine of the privatio boni.
Again, I have asked various theologians in vain what exactly is the relationship of Yahweh to the God of the Christians, since Yahweh, though a guardian of justice and morality, is himself unjust (hence Job 16:19ff.).
And how is this paradoxical being related to the Summum Bonum?
According to Isaiah 48:10-11 Yahweh torments mankind for his own sake : "Propter me, propter me faciam!"
This is understandable in terms of his paradoxical nature, but not in terms of the Summum Bonum, which by definition already has everything it needs for perfection.
Hence it has no need of man, unlike Yahweh.
I must question the doctrine of the Summum Bonum because the non-existence of evil deprives evil of all substance and leaves over only the good or else nothing at all, which, since it is nothing, also effects nothing, i.e., cannot cause even the tiniest evil impulse.
And since it is nothing, it cannot come from man either.
Moreover the devil was there before man and was certainly not good.
But the devil is not nothing.

The opposite of the good is therefore not nothing but an equally real evil.
The depth of the psyche, the unconscious, is not made by man but is divinely created nature, which should on no account be reviled by man even though it causes him the greatest difficulties.
Its fire, which ”refines” us ”in the furnace of affliction,” is according to Isaiah 48:10 the divine will itself, i.e., the will of Yahweh, who needs man.
Man’s understanding and will are challenged and can help, but they can never pretend to have plumbed the depths of the spirit and to have quenched the fire raging within it.
We can only hope that God, in his grace, will not compel us to go deeper and let ourselves be consumed by his fire.
You have evidently offered him sacrifice enough by withstanding his fire until your egohood was sufficiently subdued.
In reality your ego is by no means in complete possession of itself but has been practically reduced to ashes, so that you have become capable of a measure of selfless love.
You could indeed rejoice over this did not your ”joyfulness” crassly conflict with the suffering of the world and your fellow man.
Even the Redeemer on the Cross uttered no joyful cry despite his having been credited with completely overcoming the world and himself.
An ”object” (as you put it), i.e., a human being who does not know that he has enkindled love in you does not feel loved but humiliated because he is simply subjected or exposed to your own psychic state in which he himself has no part.
Being loved in that way would leave me cold.
But you yourself say that inasmuch as one is oneself one is also the other.
Then his suffering will also affect you and detract from your joyfulness.
But when you go on to say that you ”don’t need Creation any more” you give your fellow man (who is also part of Creation) to understand that he is superfluous for you, even though you ”joyfully acclaim God through him.”
It falls to the lot of anyone who has overcome something or detached himself from something to bear in the same measure the burdens of others.
Generally they are so heavy that any shouts of joy die on one’s lips.
One is glad if only one can draw breath from time to time.
Much as I can go along with you in the process of ”becoming whole and holy,” or individuation, I cannot subscribe to your statements about the ”ego in complete possession of itself” and unrelated universal love, although they bring you perilously close to the ideal of Yoga: nirdvandva (free from the opposites).
I know these moments of liberation come flashing out of the process, but I shun them because I always feel at such a moment that I have thrown off the burden of being human and that it will fall back on me with redoubled weight.
You don’t need to change your standpoint in any way in order to gain a knowledge of the archetypes.
You are in the thick of it, even if you should take the view of the father confessor who told a student who came to him for advice on the study of psychology: ”Don’t study anything that upsets you.”
As we have not yet reached the state of eternal bliss, we are still suspended on the Cross between ascent and descent, not only for our own but for God’s sake and mankind’s.
With kind regards,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Thomistic Psychology (2015-08-19 14:24)

To Sylvester Schoening
Dear Mr. Schoening, 24 March 1955
Your question is difficult to answer, since Thomistic psychology is on a metaphysical basis, and the psychology of the unconscious on an empirical foundation.
Through many talks with theologians, I have learnt that the greatest difficulty in discussing this matter consists in the difference of the point de depart.
The theologian starts with philosophical concepts which have practically nothing to do with the merely nominalistic concepts of the empiricist.
The theological terms contain what they are giving a name to, the empirical terms are just labels and don't contain what they are naming.
The empirical emphasis is on facts, and names mean very little; also hypotheses mean just as little as they can easily be exchanged for a better point of view.
The only possibility of a discussion I can see is the comparison of certain Thomistic statements with the statements of empirical psychology.
If you have a chance to come to Zurich beginning of May, you will have an opportunity of meeting the Dominican Father Victor White who is delivering a course of lectures at the C. G. Jung Institute.
I have done a number of such comparisons with him, and he has a fair knowledge of my psychology, so that if you have a chance to talk with him it might be of considerable importance to you.
If you should come to Zurich I am ready to see you and talk to you about this subject, but you must keep in mind that my knowledge of Thomistic psychology is almost nil since I have devoted all my available time to the study of facts and not of opinions.

Carl Jung on a piece of Greek sculpture (2015-08-20 11:20)

To Ronald J. Horton
Dear Mr. Horton, 22 April 1955

The chance of seeing and enjoying the exquisite beauty of this unique piece of Greek sculpture has been a boon I have to thank you for.
It is indeed a difficult task to identify the head.
I am no archaeologist, and I cannot claim any competence in judging such a case.
My special interest besides my psychiatric work is research in the field of comparative psychology of religious symbolism.
Superficially looking at the head, one would be inclined to think of a relatively late date and one would be reminded of the Mithraic dadophors.
But as it is obviously a work of the highest Greek art, one has to go further back.
The erotic element, the feminine sweetness of the face, the peculiar treatment of the hair on the one hand and the Phrygian pileus, the juvenile masculinity on the other hand, suggest one of the early dying son-gods of the Near East.
I think chiefly of Attis, the son and lover of Kybele.
He is represented with the pileus.
He has, like his analoga, viz. Adonis, Tammuz, and the Germanic Baldur, all the grace and charm of either sex.
There is something of Demeter's serene beauty in his face.
(The parallel is the Eleusinian Iacchus.)
As the cult of Attis is of considerable age, there is a certain possibility that it is an early representation of Attis.
That is about the nearest I can get to a diagnosis of the head and its truly bewitching beauty.
At all events it expresses in a perfect way the feeling an Asiatic Greek would experience in worshipping Attis or one of his equivalents, one of the pueri aeterni, being the joy of men and women and dying early with the flowers of spring.
May I keep at least one of the photos?
They have caught my fantasy thoroughly.
I am sorry to give you such a meagre and tentative answer.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 243-244.
Note: The image at the top of this post is not the image Dr. Jung is corresponding about.

Carl Jung: Unfortunately I am unable to thank you for sending me your book. (2015-08-20 11:32)

To Pater Raymond Hostie
Dear Pater, 25 April 1955
Unfortunately I am unable to thank you for sending me your book.
As you know through Father Bruno, you criticize me as though I were a philosopher.
But you know very well that I am an empiricist whose concepts have-as such-no content, since they are mere nomina that can be changed as convention requires. I have given you every opportunity in the past to discuss obscurities.
You never came out with your criticism.
I have no doctrine and no philosophical system, but have presented new facts which you studiously ignore.
It is as though one were to criticize the labels on the drawers of a collection of minerals Without looking at their contents.
It is not so much your fault that you do not appear to understand how it is that the psychic facts designated by my concepts possess an autonomy of their own.
This is an empirical fact which is not understood by most people anyway, because they have never gone through the same experiences-quite understandably, since they take no notice of my method.
Si parva licet componere magnis, the situation is the same as with Galileo, who discovered the hitherto unknown moons of Jupiter by means of a telescope.
But no one wanted to look through it.
So Jupiter had no moons.
Mandala symbols, for instance, are seen not only in Zurich but also in Rio de Janeiro and San Francisco-naturally only by psychiatrists who get their patients to draw.
These are the facts that count, not the names.
You overlook the facts and then think that the name is the fact, and thus you reach the nonsensical conclusion that I hypostatize ideas and am therefore a ”Gnostic.”
It is your theological standpoint that is a gnosis, not my empiricism, of which you obviously haven’t the faintest inkling.
I must also express the conjecture that I may be doing injustice to you personally by taking your criticism as a perversion of the facts.
You are, after all, the member of an Order whose principle is:
”We have to pronounce as black what appears to our eyes white if she [the Church] calls it black.”
Hence in any discussion there is no personal opponent with whom one could come to an understanding.
Yours truly,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 244-245.

Carl Jung on “Faust.” (2015-08-21 05:06)

To Karl Theens
Dear Herr Theens, 25 April 1955
I would gladly comply with your kind invitation to contribute something to the literature on Faust were it not that my old age sets definite and, unfortunately, narrow limits to my working capacity.
Faust II has been my companion all my life but it was only 20 years ago that certain things began to dawn on me, especially when I read Christian Rosencreutz’s Chymical Wedding, which Goethe also knew but, interestingly enough, did not mention among the alchemical literature of his Leipzig days.

This is what often happens with books or impressions which, piercing through the top layer of consciousness, sink down into the depths of the psyche and return to the surface only much later in altered form, bearing witness to their long-lasting effects.
So far as we know, Goethe used only the relatively late alchemical literature, and it was the study of the classical and early medieval texts which first convinced me that Faust I and II is an opus alchymicum in the best sense.
Recently Goethe as alchemist has been treated by the Englishman Ronald D. Gray (Goethe the Alchemist, Cambridge 1952), evidently under the stimulus of my own references to this subject.
Unfortunately Gray's knowledge of alchemy is deficient so that he overlooks its main concern, the mystery of the coniunctio, or "chymical wedding," which runs through the whole of Faust.
I have devoted a special work to this problem-Mysterium Coniunctionis, which is to appear shortly.
It contains everything that forms the historical background -so far as this is alchemical-of Faust.
These roots go very deep and seem to me to explain much of the numinous effect which emanates from Goethe's "main work."
But for my feeling it is so vast that I would do better to say nothing at all, as it is quite impossible even to hint at the wealth of associations in a short essay, let alone make them intelligible.
So it is not disinclination or indifference that checks my pen, but the insuperable difficulty of condensing such a profusion of material into a few words.
Instead of a substantial contribution I can therefore offer nothing except these skimpy references to researches and studies which, in my view at least, do shed some light on the problem of Faust.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung to a mother whose son joined an Indian religious order... (2015-08-21 05:20)

[Carl Jung to a mother whose son aged 24, joined an Indian religious order and changed his European name into an Indian one.]

7222

Anonymous
Dear Frau N., 26 April 1955
I find your son's decision very regrettable in the sense that it is hardly anything more than an evasion, though it is not as unusual as it may seem.
When I was in Calcutta I met a whole lot of Europeans-Englishmen and Germans-who had joined the Ramakrishna Order there.
With us this decision would be like entering a Catholic monastic order and would be more binding since it is more difficult to get out of the monastery or the Catholic priesthood than out of an exotic religious community.
I know the patron saint of the Pramachari Order, Paramhansa Yogananda, or rather I know his book.
It is genuinely Indian and for our ears sounds utterly fantastic.
As has often happened before, impressionable people living in India easily come under the influence of Indian ideas, which are admittedly impressive and at least quench in the Indian manner a thirst for knowledge which our theologians unfortunately cannot assuage.
When these young people return to Europe they often find that they have to give up this fantastic-sounding philosophy simply because it does not fit our circumstances.
Nobody can afford to go around every day with the begging bowl and sit in the street waiting for a pious soul to fill it with rice.
This is a daily spectacle in India but with us the police and the traffic would render such an unusual religious exercise impossible.
Missionaries here have to rely on a few gushing enthusiasts who, though they don't fill the rice bowl for them, occasionally drop a mild gift into their purse.
For a young man with a strong but largely unrealized need for self-assertion this is a pretty dismal prospect in the long run.
I therefore think you would be well advised not to put any difficulties in his way at present but to get him back to Europe sometime.
There's no need to bother him emotionally, just ask him what he thinks of living on in the future: alms or earnings.
If he has financial prospects which assure him a life free from care, he can safely keep to the Pramachari Mission as a way of passing the time.
He will then discover soon enough that nothing comes out of it.
Such ideas are suitable for countries where for 10 months it is so hot that you can hardly open your eyes for sweat.
This is the great difference which Emile Zola pointed out when he said: "Mais chez no us, la misere a froid."
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on “Suffering.” (2015-08-21 05:29)

Dear Herr N., 28 April 1955
Your ideas bring you up against a general cultural problem which is infinitely complicated.

7224

What is true in one place is untrue in another.
”Suffering is the swiftest steed that bears you to perfection,” and the contrary is also true.
”Breaking in” can be discipline, and this is needed for the emotional chaos of man, though at the same time it can kill the living spirit, as we have seen only too often.
In my opinion there is no magical word that could finally unravel this whole complex of questions; nor is there any method of thinking or living or acting which would eliminate suffering and unhappiness.
If a man’s life consists half of happiness and half of unhappiness, this is probably the optimum that can be reached, and it remains forever an unresolved question whether suffering is educative or demoralizing.
In any case it would be wrong to give oneself up to relativism and indifferentism.
Whatever can be bettered in a given place at a given time should certainly be done, for it would be sheer folly to do otherwise.
Man’s fate has always swung between day and night.
There is nothing we can do to change this.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Knowledge and Belief. (2015-08-21 09:05)

To Walter Robert Corti
Dear Herr Corti, 2 May 1955
At last I have found a quiet moment in which to finish reading your Mythopoese and to append my answer.
The reading has to be fresh in my mind so that I can react properly.
As always in such cases, it does not seem to me superfluous to begin with the constantly reiterated statement that I am neither a philosopher nor a theologian and so cannot deploy any artillery in the battle of arguments.

While I was reading your book I felt myself transported back a century or more; at first, to be sure, only about 60 years, into those blossoming and spring-like student days when, in enchanted inns in Markgrafenland, amid a circle of friends (now, alas, almost extinct), one discussed the eternal verities with much earnest heating of the head, and never a thought to what Bismarck had started off in 1871 and what the fatally deluded Wilhelm II was then continuing.
We were still living in the romantic age of Hegel, Schelling, and Schopenhauer. No wonder your words brought back the romantic mood.
”Once more you hover near me, forms and faces / Seen long ago with troubled youthful gaze,” I could say with Faust.
The heaven-storming pretensions of the romantic intellect, sad to relate, have flown from me utterly.
How can one decide the impossible?
What in the world can one assert about God?
Probably only antinomies, like Deus est immobilis and instigator of all motion, eternal source and goal, Creator uniting in himself genesis and decay, supreme light and gloomiest abyss, infinite as God, finite as personality (only this one and no other!), singular and plural, the unfolding and union of all opposites.
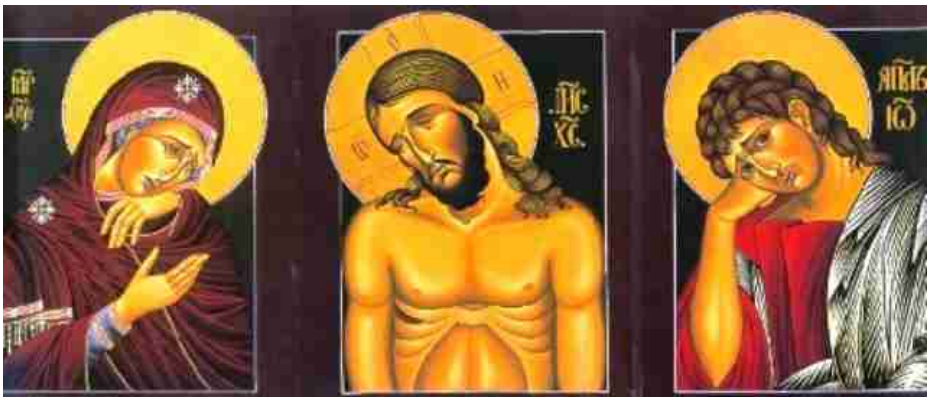
There are some who, faced with these illimitabilities, can escape to the floating island of belief, take to the lifeboat of the graced, but I have never belonged to their number.
It seems to me that transcendental judgments of the intellect are absolutely impossible and therefore vacuous.
But in spite of Kant and epistemology they crop up again and again and can evidently not be suppressed.
This is probably because they represent emotional needs and, as such, are psychological facts that cannot be eliminated, which is how they appear to the empirical mind.
The assertions of the latter are not subjective confessions like your philosophical statements, but are empirical judgments which assert that a general consensus declares God to be immobilis, and that an equally general consensus says he is evolving.
No philosopher knows who is right, and we don’t know whether God himself knows.
So if you profess belief-with or without supporting arguments in an evolving God, I can assure you on the basis of my mythological knowledge that you enjoy a greater consensus than the believers in a Deus immobilis.
The biographical ”metamorphosis of the gods” is decidedly more popular than their static immutability.
Even Yahweh, who lacked a personal biography, created a temporal world, allied himself to a people, begot a son and “took to form of a servant, incarnated as a man, etc. In the New Testament he even changed his character.
From an eternal he became an historical figure.
Allah acts without being acted upon-a contradiction in terms-which is as it should be in view of the fact that he cannot be discussed.
It has yet to be explained why man makes transcendental statements, indeed must make them, it would seem (you are an example, Herr Corti!)
No doubt such statements have a primarily psychological cause, the exact nature of which is still controversial because it is connected with the unconscious.
We only know that the primordial experience underlying mythological statements is highly numinous.
This is a verifiable fact, as indisputable as my finding a particular picture beautiful or loving a particular person or smacking my lips over a particular dish.
What is more, medical experience shows that it is advisable to take numinous experiences seriously, as they have a great deal to do with the fate of the individual.
It also seems that the will to be taken seriously is implicit in the experience itself, since it comes upon us with the most vehement claim to truth.
Your book bears witness to this.
I hear you are giving a lecture to theologians in Canton Bern (?). I am sure you will learn a thing or two there about the efficacy of philosophical arguments.
But that’s the way it is: belief, even philosophical belief, demands avowals in order to banish doubt.
But knowledge consists of nothing but doubts and so has nothing to avow.
It partakes of the mystery of the known.

As you will have gathered from my answer, I have read your book with so much interest and involvement that I could not refrain from burdening you with a bit of my own biography.
Yours very sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 249-251.

Carl Jung: ”Even the saints cast a Shadow.” (2015-08-21 15:08)



Dear Fraulein Kiener, 14 May 1955
In the Christ symbol the conquest of evil is suggested by the descent into hell and the breaking open of its gates.
But nobody has ever heard that the devil departed this life afterwards; on the contrary, the authentic New Testament view is that after the thousand-year reign of Christ he shall be loosed again on earth in all his youthful freshness, in the form of Antichrist.
Also, as you rightly point out, a strong light is the best shadow-projector, provided that there is something to cast a shadow.
Even the saints cast a shadow.
We do not know whether there is more good than evil or whether the good is stronger.
We can only hope that the good will predominate.
If good is identified with constructiveness, there is some probability that life will go on in a more or less endurable form; but if destructiveness were to prevail, the world would surely have done itself to death long ago.
As that hasn’t happened yet, we may suppose that the positive exceeds the negative.
Hence the optimistic assumption of psychotherapy that conscious realization accentuates the good more than the overshadowing evil.
Becoming conscious reconciles the opposites and thus creates a higher third.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,

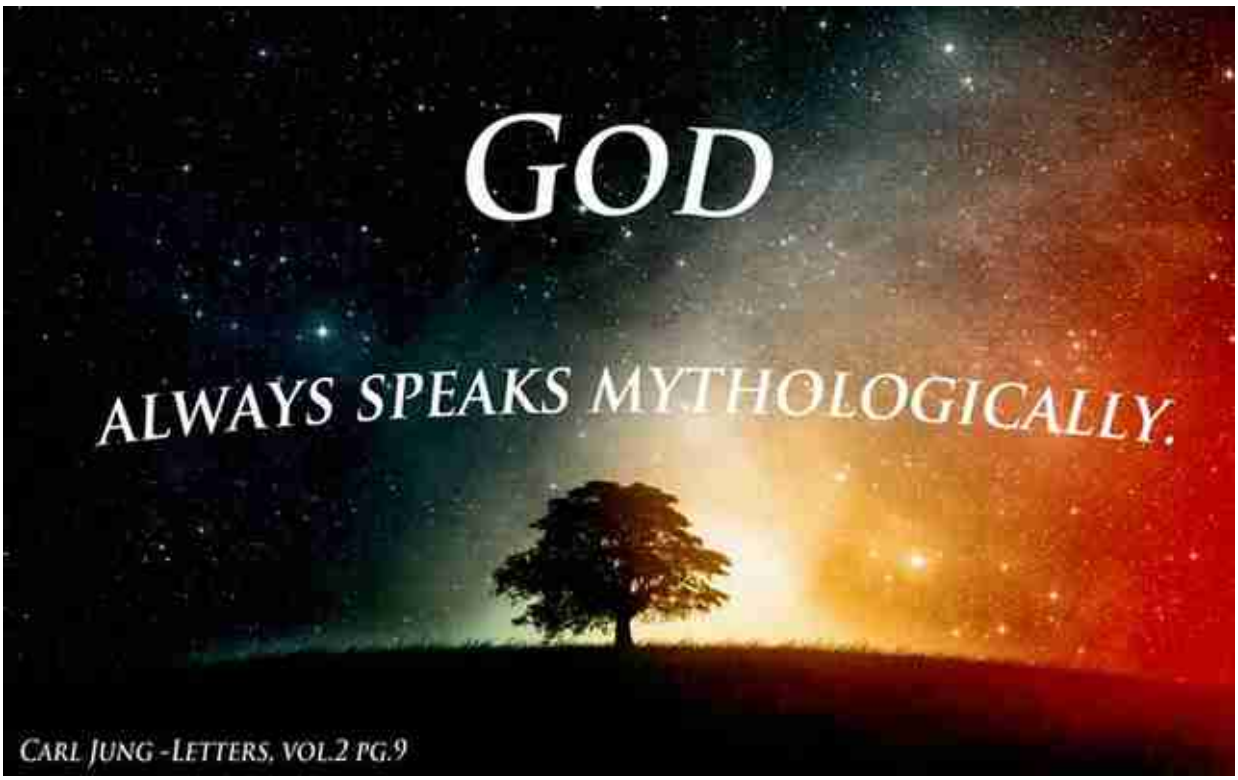
Carl Jung: "Mythology as a vital psychic phenomenon is as necessary as it is unavoidable." (2015-08-21 17:54)



To Pastor Jakob Amstutz.
Dear Pastor Amstutz, Mammern, 23 May 1955
Meanwhile I have read your typescript, "Zum Verstandnis der Lehre vom werdenden Gotte."
It seems to me one more proof of the overweening gnostic tendency in philosophical thinking to ascribe to God qualities which are the product of our own anthropomorphic formulations.
Every metaphysical judgment is necessarily antino mian, since it transcends experience and must therefore be complemented by its counterposition.
If we describe God as "evolving," we must bear in mind at the same time that perhaps he is so vast that the process of cognition only moves along his contours, as it were, so that the attribute "evolving" applies more to it than to him.
Moreover, "evolving" as a quality of human cognition is far more probable empirically than the presumptuous projection of this quality on to a Being whose nature and scope transcend by definition our human stature in every respect.
Such projective statements are pure gnosticism.
I hold the contrary view that there are certain experiences (of the most varied kinds) which we characterize by the attribute "divine" without being able to offer the slightest proof that they are caused by a Being with any definite qualities.
Were such a proof possible, the Being that caused them could only have a finite nature and so, by definition, could not be God.
For me "God" is on the one hand a mystery that cannot be unveiled, and to which I must attribute only one quality: that it exists in the form of a particular psychic event which I feel to be numinous and cannot trace back to any sufficient cause lying within my field of experience.
On the other hand "God" is a verbal image, a predicate or mythologem founded on archetypal premises which underlie the structure of the psyche as images of the instincts ("instinctual patterns").
Like the instincts, these images possess a certain autonomy which enables them to break through, sometimes against the rational expectations of consciousness (thus accounting in part for their numinosity).
"God" in this sense is a biological, instinctual and elemental "model," an archetypal "arrangement" of individual, contemporary and historical contents, which, despite its numinosity, is and must be exposed to intellectual and moral criticism, just like the image of the ”evolving” God or of Yahweh or the Summum Bonum or the Trinity.

”God” as a mythologem dominates your discussion, which casts a deceptive veil over the religious reality.
For the religious man it is an embarrassment to speak of the mystery which he can say nothing about anyway except paradoxes, and which he would rather conceal from profane eyes if he had anything in his hands at all that he could conceal from anybody.
It is unfortunately true: he has and holds a mystery in his hands and at the same time is contained in its mystery.
What can he proclaim? Himself or God? Or neither?
The truth is that he doesn’t know who he is talking of, God or himself.
All talk of God is mythology, an archetypal pronouncement of archetypal causation.
Mythology as a vital psychic phenomenon is as necessary as it is unavoidable.
Metaphysical speculations that keep within the bounds of reason (in the wider sense) are therefore quite in place so long as one is aware of their anthropomorphism and their epistemological limitations.
The relatively autonomous life of the archetypes requires symbolic statements like the ”evolving God” or the encyclicals Munificentissimus Deus and Ad Caeli Reginam or Cod as complexio oppositorum, etc., because collective psychic life is strongly influenced by changes in the ”Pleroma” of the mundus archetypus (cf. Hitler’s ”saviour epidemic” and the worldwide Communist delusion of a Utopia peopled by human robots).
In this discussion, it seems to me, the gnostic danger of ousting the unknowable and incomprehensible and unutterable God by philosophems and mythologems must be clearly recognized, so that nothing is shoved in between human consciousness and the primordial numinous experience.
The mythologem of the Incarnation seems to serve this purpose indirectly, because it is symbolic.
I hope you won’t find my criticism of your discussion officious, but will take it rather as an expression of my sympathetic interest.
For us psychotherapists, at any rate for those of them who have come to see how great is the importance of the religious attitude for psychic equilibrium, theological discussions are of the utmost practical value, because questions of this kind are directed to us more often than the layman imagines.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 254-256.

Carl Jung: I was thrown back on experience alone. (2015-08-22 04:52)

To Pastor Walter Bernet
Dear Pastor Bernet, 13 June 1955

7230

At last I have got down to reading and studying your book which you so kindly sent me.
Please put the slowness of this procedure down to my old age!
It was certainly not lack of interest that kept me reading so long, but rather a curiosity or-more accurately-a need to familiarize myself with and learn to understand the theological mode of thinking, which is so alien to me.
I have been able to assimilate this thinking only very fragmentarily, if at all, in spite or perhaps because of the fact that I come from a theological milieu on my mother's side, and my father was himself a clergyman.
It was the tragedy of my youth to see my father cracking up before my eyes on the problem of his faith and dying an early death.
This was the objective outer event that opened my eyes to the importance of religion.
Subjective inner experiences prevented me from drawing negative conclusions about religion from my father's fate, much as I was tempted to do so.
I grew up in the heyday of scientific materialism, studied natural science and medicine, and became a psychiatrist.
My education offered me nothing but arguments against religion on the one hand, and on the other the charisma of faith was denied me.
I was thrown back on experience alone.
Always Paul's experience on the road to Damascus hovered before me, and I asked myself how his fate would have fallen out but for his vision.
Yet this experience came upon him while he was blindly pursuing his own way.
As a young man I drew the conclusion that you must obviously fulfill your destiny in order to get to the point where a donum gratiae might happen along.
But I was far from certain, and always kept the possibility in mind that on this road I might end up in a black hole.
I have remained true to this attitude all my life.
From this you can easily see the origin of my psychology: only by going my own way, integrating my capacities headlong (like Paul), and thus creating a foundation for myself, could something be vouchsafed to me or built upon it, no matter where it came from, and of which I could be reasonably sure that it was not merely one of my own neglected capacities.
The only way open to me was the experience of religious realities which I had to accept without regard to their truth.
In this matter I have no criterion except the fact that they seem meaningful to me and harmonize with man's best utterances.
I don't know whether the archetype is "true" or not.
I only know that it lives and that I have not made it.
Since the number of possibilities is limited, one soon comes to a frontier, or rather to frontiers which recede behind one another presumably up to the point of death.
The experience of these frontiers gradually brings the conviction that what is experienced is an endless approximation.
The goal of this approximation seems to be anticipated by archetypal symbols which represent something like the circumambulation of a centre.
With increasing approximation to the centre there is a corresponding depotentiation of the ego in favour of the influence of the "empty" centre, which is certainly not identical with the archetype but is the thing the archetype points to.
As the Chinese would say, the archetype is only the name of Tao, not Tao itself.
Just as the Jesuits translated Tao as "God," so we can describe the "emptiness" of the centre as "God."
Emptiness in this sense doesn't mean "absence" or "vacancy," but something unknowable which is endowed with the highest intensity.
If I call this unknowable the "self," all that has happened is that the effects of the unknowable have been given an aggregate name, but its contents are not affected in any way.
An indeterminably large part of my own being is included in it, but because this part is the unconscious I cannot indicate its limits or its extent.
The self is therefore a borderline concept, not by any means filled out with the known psychic processes.

On the one hand it includes the phenomena of synchronicity, on the other its archetype is embedded in the brain structure and is physiologically verifiable: through electrical stimulation of a certain area of the brain-stem of an epileptic it is possible to produce mandala visions (quadratura circuli).
From synchronistic phenomena we learn that a peculiar feature of the psychoi background is Transgressive within space and time.
This brings us directly to the frontier of transcendence, beyond which human statements can only be mythological.
The whole course of individuation is dialectical, and the so-called ”end” is the confrontation of the ego with the ”emptiness” of the centre. Here the limit of possible experience is reached: the ego dissolves as the reference-point of cognition.
It cannot coincide with the centre, otherwise we would be insensible; that is to say, the extinction of the ego is at best an endless approximation.
But if the ego usurps the centre it loses its object (inflation!).
Even though you add to my ”ultimate” an ”absolute ultimate,” you will hardly maintain that my ”ultimate” is not as good an ”ultimate” as yours.
In any case all possibility of cognition and predication ceases for me at this frontier because of the extinction of the ego.
The ego can merely affirm that something vitally important is happening to it.
It may conjecture that it has come up against something greater, that it feels powerless against this greater power; that it can cognize nothing further; that in the course of the integration process it has become convinced of its finiteness, just as before it was compelled to take practical account of the existence of an ineluctable archetype.
The ego has to acknowledge many gods before it attains the centre where no god helps it any longer against another god.
It now occurs to me-and I hope I am not deceiving myself that from the point where you introduce the ”absolute ultimate” which is meant to replace my descriptive concept of the self by an empty abstraction, the archetype is increasingly detached from its dynamic background and gradually turned into a purely intellectual formula.
In this way it is neutralized, and you can then say ”one can live with it quite well.”
But you overlook the fact that the self-constellating archetypes and the resultant situations steadily gain in numinosity, indeed are sometimes imbued with a positively eerie daemonism and bring the danger of psychosis threateningly close.
The up surging archetypal material is the stuff of which mental illnesses are made.
In the individuation process the ego is brought face to face with an unknown superior power which is likely to cut the ground from under its feet and blow consciousness to bits.
The archetype is not just the formal condition for mythological statements but an overwhelming force comparable to nothing I know.
In view of the terrors of this confrontation I would never dream of addressing this menacing and fascinating opponent familiarly as ”Thou,” though paradoxically it also has this aspect.
All talk of this opponent is mythology.
All statements about and beyond the ”ultimate” are anthropomorphisms and, if anyone should think that when he says ”God” he has also predicated God, he is endowing his words with magical power.
Like a primitive, he is incapable of distinguishing the verbal image from reality.
In one breath he will endorse the statement Deus est ineffabilis without a thought, but in the next he will be speaking of God as though he could express him.
It seems to me-and I beg your pardon in advance if I am doing you an injustice-that something of the sort has happened to you.
You write, apparently without any misgivings, that I equate God with the self.
You seem not to have noticed that I speak of the God-image and not of God because it is quite beyond me to say anything about God at all.
It is more th an astonishing that you have failed to perceive this fundamental distinction, it is shattering.
I don’t know what you must take me for if you can impute such stupidities to me after you yourself have correctly presented my epistemological standpoint at the beginning of your book.

I have in all conscience never supposed that in discussing the psychic structure of the God-image I have taken God himself in hand.
I am not a word-magician or word-fetishist who thinks he can posit or call up a metaphysical reality with his incantations.
Don't Protestant critics accuse the Catholic Mass of magic when it asserts that by pronouncing the words Hoc est corpus meum Christ is actually present?
In Job and elsewhere I am always explicitly speaking of the God-image.
If my theologian critics choose to overlook this, the fault lies with them and not with me.
They obviously think that the little word "God" conjures him up in reality, just as the Mass forces Christ to appear through the words of the Consecration. (Naturally I am aware of the dissident Catholic explanation of this.)
I do not share your overvaluation of words, and have never regarded the equation Christ = Logos as anything else than an interesting symbol conditioned by its time.
This credulity and entrapment in words is becoming more and more striking nowadays.
Proof of this is the rise of such a comical philosophy as existentialism, which labours to help being become being through the magical power of the word.
People still believe that they can posit or replace reality by words, or that something has happened when a thing is given a different name.
If I call the "ultimate" the self and you call it the "absolute ultimate," its ultimateness is not changed one whit.
The name means far less to me than the view associated with it.
You seem to think that I enjoy romping about in a circus of archetypal figures and that I take them for ultimate realities which block my view of the Ineffable.
They guide but they also mislead; how much I reserve my criticism for them you can see in Answer to Job, where I subject archetypal statements to what you call "blasphemous" criticism.
The very fact that you consider this critique of anthropomorphisms worthy of condemnation proves how strongly you are bound to these psychic products by word-magic.
If theologians think that whenever they say "God" then God is, they are deifying anthropomorphisms, psychic structures and myths.
This is exactly what I don't do, for, I must repeat, I speak exclusively of the God-image in Job.
Who talks of divine knowledge and divine revelation? Certainly not me.
"Ultimately" I have really reached the ultimate with my presumptuous anthropomorphisms which feign knowledge and revelation!
I see many God-images of various kinds; I find myself compelled to make mythological statements, but I know that none of them expresses or captures the immeasurable Other, even if I were to assert it did.
However interesting or enthralling metaphysical statements may be, I must still criticize them as anthropomorphisms.
But here the theologian buttonholes me, asseverating that his anthropomorphism is God and damning anyone who criticizes any anthropomorphic weaknesses, defects, and contradictions in it as a blasphemer.
It is not God who is insulted by the worm but the theologian, who can't or won't admit that his concept is anthropomorphic.
With this he puts an end to the much needed discussion and understanding of religious statements.
Just as Bultmann's demythologizing procedure stops at the point where the demagicking of words no longer seems advisable to him, so the theologian treats exactly the same concept as mythological, i.e., anthropomorphic at one moment and as an inviolable taboo at the next.
I have begged four distinguished (academic) theologians to tell me what exactly is the attitude of modern Protestantism to the question of the identity of the God of the Old Testament with the God of the New, between whom the layman thinks he can spot quite a number of differences.
The question is so harmless that it is like asking what the difference is between Freud's view of the unconscious and mine.
Two didn't answer at all despite repeated requests.
The third told me that there was no longer any talk of God in the theological literature of the last twenty years anyway.
The fourth said the question was very easy to answer: Yahweh was simply a somewhat archaic God-concept in comparison with that of the New Testament.

Whereupon I replied: ”Look, my dear Professor, this is just the kind of psychologism the theologians accuse me of. Suddenly the divine revelation in the OT is nothing but an archaic concept and the revelation in the NT is simply a modern one. But the next moment this same revelation is God himself and no concept at all.”
So you ride the hobby-horse of your choice.
In order to do away with such tricks, I stick to my proposal that we take all talk of God as mythological and discuss these mythologems honestly.
As soon as we open our mouths we speak in traditional verbal images, and even when we merely think we think in age-old psychic structures.
If God were to reveal himself to us we have nothing except our psychic organs to register his revelation and could not express it except in the images of our everyday speech.
Let the Protestant theologian therefore abandon his hieratic word magic and his alleged knowledge of God through faith and admit to the layman that he is mythologizing and is just as incapable as he is of expressing God himself.
Let him not vilify and condemn and twist the arguments of others who are struggling just as earnestly to understand the mysteries of religion, even if he finds these arguments personally disagreeable or wrong in themselves.
(I cannot exempt you, for one, from the obligation to give due regard to the epistemological premises of Answer to Job if you want to criticize it.)
So long as we are conscious of ourselves, we are supported by the psyche and its structures and at the same time imprisoned in them with no possibility of getting outside ourselves.
We would not feel and be aware of ourselves at all were we not always confronted with the unknown power.
Without this we would not be conscious of our separateness, just as there is no consciousness without an object.
We are not delivered from the ”sin” of mythologizing by saying that we are ”saved” or ”redeemed” through the revelation of God in Christ, for this is simply another mythologem which does, however, contain a psychological truth.
Consequently we can understand the ”feeling of redemption” which is bound up with this mythologem; but the statement ”revelation in Christ” merely affirms that a myth of this kind exists which evidently belongs to the symbolism of the self.
What impresses me most profoundly in discussions with theologians of both camps is that metaphysical statements are made apparently without the slightest awareness that they are talking in mythic images which pass directly as the ”word of God.”
For this reason it is so often thoughtlessly assumed that I do the same thing, whereas quite to the contrary I am trained by my daily professional work to distinguish scrupulously between idea and reality.
The recognition of projections is indeed one of the most important tasks of psychotherapy.
I have read your erudite book with great interest and profit and find it all the more regrettable that in spite of your admirably objective presentation of my standpoint at the beginning you nevertheless go off the rails at the end.
You think I have deviated from my epistemological position in Job.
Had you read the introduction you could never have pronounced this false judgment.
I can understand very well that you are shocked by the book; I was too, and by the original Job into the bargain.
I feel that you have in general too poor an opinion of me when you charge me with the arrogance of wanting to write an exegesis of Job.
I don’t know a word of Hebrew.
As a layman, I have only tried to read the translated text with psychological common sense, on the assumption, certainly, that I am dealing with anthropomorphisms and not with magical words that conjure up God himself.
If in the Jewish commentaries the high priest takes the liberty of admonishing Adonai to remember his good rather than his bad qualities it is no longer so shocking if I avail myself of a similar criticism, especially as I am not even addressing Adonai, as the high priest did, but merely the anthropomorphic God-image, and expressly refrain from all metaphysical utterances, which the high priest did not.
You will scarcely suppose that, despite my assurance to the contrary, the mere pronouncing of God’s name conjures up God himself.
At all events Adonai took the high priest’s criticism and a number of other equally drastic observations without a murmur, thereby showing himself to b more tolerant than certain theologians.

The reason why mythic statements invariably lead to word-magic is that the archetype possesses a numinous autonomy and has a psychic life of its own.
I have dealt with this particular difficulty at some length in Job.
Perhaps I may remark in conclusion that the theory of archetypes is more difficult, and I am not quite so stupid as you apparently think.
I cannot omit to thank you, all the same, for the great trouble you have taken in going into my proposition so thoroughly.
It is obvious that this cannot be done without difficulties and misunderstandings, especially in view of the fact that our age is still for the most part trapped in its belief in words.
Ancient Greece was on an even lower level, as the term phrenes with its psychic connotation shows.
The Pueblo Indians of New Mexico still think in the ”heart” and not in the head.
Tantra Yoga gives the classic localizations of thought: anahata, thinking (or localization of consciousness) in the chest region (phrenes); visuddha (localized in the larynx), verbal thinking; and ajna, vision, symbolized by an eye in the forehead, which is attained only when verbal image and object are no longer identical, i.e., when their participation mystique is abolished.
I have this advance of human consciousness particularly at heart.
It is a difficult task to which I have devoted all my life’s work.
This is the reason why I venture to plague you with such a long letter.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung: ”Thought transference” is a synchronistic phenomenon. (2015-08-22 15:15)

To Helene Kiener
Dear Fraulein Kiener, 15 June 1955
”Thought transference” is a synchronistic phenomenon.
”Self” is something that can be verified psychologically.
We experience ”symbols of the self” which cannot be distinguished from ”God symbols.”
I cannot prove that the self and God are identical, although in practice they appear so.
Individuation is ultimately a religious process which requires a corresponding religious attitude = the ego-will submits to God’s will.

To avoid unnecessary misunderstandings, I say ”self” instead of God.
It is also more correct empirically.
Analytical psychology helps us to recognize our religious potentialities.
I know the Jesuit X.
Naturally he is afraid of the psychological truth .
What a misfortune it would be for the Catholic Church if all religions could unite in a truly universal Ecclesia spiritualis!
Then Pere X would no longer be the only one who is right!
I have no ambitious power plans, but seek a passable way only for myself and a few others.
I leave the will-to-power to the Churches, and the concomitant fear of losing power.
I have nothing to lose in this respect.
All science is merely a tool and not an end in itself.
Analytical psychology only helps us to find the way to the religious experience that makes us whole.
It is not this experience itself, nor does it bring it about.
But we do know that analytical psychology teaches us that attitude which meets a transcendent reality halfway.
Recently there appeared in Paris a book by another Jesuit, Pere Hostie (sic!), who criticizes my empirical concepts as though they were philosophical ones.
The facts I report are largely ignored.
Naturally this is an anxiety reaction which twists my findings as much as possible and imputes to me what these gentlemen do themselves.
They see the mote in their brother’s eye.
Like drowning men they cling to a straw.
Best greetings and wishes,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 265.

Carl Jung: "A complete life, unconditionally lived, is the work of the Holy Spirit." (2015-08-22 17:00)

To Pastor William Lachat
Dear Pastor Lachat, 29 June 1955
Your letter of June 10th comes at the right moment, since I am in the hospital where I have time to answer it.
I can subscribe to all the principal points made by Mr. Zacharias with the exception of his metaphysical Christian interpretations and, above all, his identification of Christ, with the archetype of the self in the sense that Christ is himself the archetype.
I cannot prove the identity of an historical personage with a psychological archetype.
That is why I stop after establishing the fact that in the Occident this archetype, or this "God-image," is seen in Christ; in the Orient, in the Buddha, or in the form of Tao (which is not a personification but a metaphysical hypostasis).
In these three concrete forms the archetype of the self has appeared to us.
Since it represents the center of All, it can be called the vas mysticum filled with the Spiritus Sancta servitor mundi.
This symbolic formula would be an entirely satisfactory characterization of the psychological nature of the archetype of the self if the paradoxical nature of the Holy Spirit, like that of the author of all things, could be admitted.
Inasmuch as we attribute to the Holy Spirit the faculty of procreating in matter, we must unavoidably grant it a nature capable of contact with material existence, i.e., a chthonic aspect, as the alchemists did; otherwise it could not influence Physis.
However, these are metaphysical considerations outside my empirical domain.
But if you take them for what they are-that is, psychological qualifications-my formula seems perfectly applicable.
As for literature relevant to this subject, I would recommend my books Aion and Symbolik des Geistes.
In the latter you will find a little essay on Mercurius and the chthonic aspect of the Spirit.
I cannot share Zacharias' optimistic belief that the efficacy of the rites can be "repristinized."
Unfortunately one must say: Once lost, lost forever!
But I must also say that there will be psychological equivalents; the psychological work necessary for the realization of the individuation process is an opus divinum consisting of a series of symbolic acts, examples of which can be found in my book Gestaltungen des Unbewussten (”Zur Empirie des Individuationsprozesses”).

Considering that the light of Christ is accompanied by the ”dark night of the soul” that St. John of the Cross spoke about, and by what the Gnostics of lrenaeus called the umbra Christi, which is identical with the chthonic aspect mentioned above, the life of Christ is identical in us, from the psychological point of view, with the unconscious tendency toward individuation.
That is what forces us to live life completely, an adventure which is often as heroic as it is tragic.
Without error and sin there is no experience of grace, that is, no union of God and man.
A complete life, unconditionally lived, is the work of the Holy Spirit.
It leads us into all dangers and defeats, and into the light of knowledge, which is to say, into maximal consciousness.
This is the aim of the incarnation as well as the Creation, which wants each being to attain its perfection.
Very sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 267-268.

Carl Jung on James and Lucia Joyce (2015-08-23 04:53)

[Carl Jung on James and Lucia Joyce]
To Patricia Graecen
Dear Mrs. Graecen 29 June 1955
I n fulfilling your wishes I have corrected the pages of your MS here enclosed. The question of the letter to Joyce is mysterious.
I am rather certain that I never wrote to him but the remark about Molly's monologue is definitely authentic, though where and to whom I made it is beyond the reach of my memory.
I am sorry.
If you know anything of my anima theory, Joyce and his daughter are a classic example of it. She was definitely his femme inspiratrice, which explains his obstinate reluctance to have her certified.
His own anima, i.e., unconscious psyche, was so solidly identified with her that to have her certified would have been as much as an admission that he himself had a latent psychosis.
It is therefore understandable that he could not give in.
His "psychological" style is definitely schizophrenic, with the difference, however, that the ordinary patient cannot help talking and thinking in such a way, while Joyce willed it and moreover developed it with all his creative forces.
Which incidentally explains why he himself did not go over the border.
But his daughter did, because she was no genius like her father, but merely a victim of her disease.
In any other time of the past Joyce's work would never have reached the printer, but in our blessed XXth century it is a message, though not yet understood.

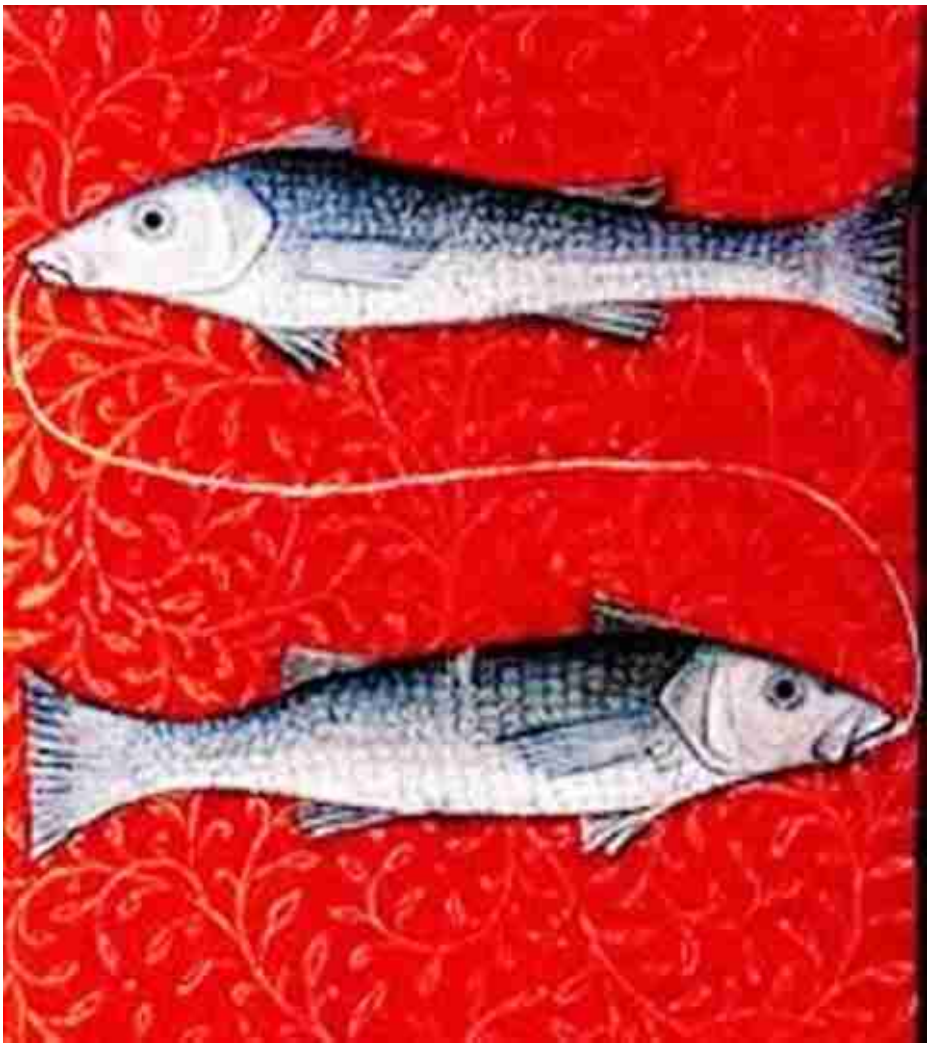
(2015-08-23 05:09)



To Eugen Bohler
Dear Professor Bohler, 23 February 1956
I have just got back from the Tessin and found your letter.
I look forward to seeing you next Tuesday 28.II. about 8 o'clock.
Your dreams are very interesting.
As "contemporary" symbols of the opposites, the fishes have a tendency to devour each other if only they are left alone.
In the end you have no alternative but to take the conflicts on yourself by ceasing to identify now with one side and now with the other.

You become what happens in the middle.
Then you are in the flow, and for this you need the high heart of the warrior. . . .
I have spent my free time making a thorough study of the Evangelium veritatis of Valentinus.
It is not exactly an easy problem.
Meanwhile with kindest regards,
Very sincerely yours,

Carl Jung on his ”Stone.” (2015-08-23 05:28)

To Maud Oakes
Dear Miss Oakes, 11 February 1956
I have read your meditation about the stone with much interest.
Your method of reading its message is adequate and in this case the only one yielding positive results.
You understand the stone as a statement about a more or less limitless world of thought-images.
I quite agree with your view.
One can read the symbols like that.
When I hewed the stone I did not think, however.
I just brought into shape what I saw on its face.
Sometimes you express yourself (in the MS) as if my symbols and my text were a sort of confession or a belief.
Thus it looks as if I were moving in the vicinity of theosophy.
In America especially one blames me for my so-called mysticism.
Since I don't claim at all to be the happy proprietor of metaphysical truths, I should much prefer that you attribute to my symbols the same tentativeness which characterizes your explanatory attempt.
You see, I have no religious or other convictions about my symbols.
They can change tomorrow.
They are mere allusions, they hint at something, they stammer and often they lose their way.
They try only to point in a certain direction, viz. to those dim horizons beyond which lies the secret of existence.
They [Dr. Jung's Symbols] are just no Gnosis, no metaphysical assertions.
They are partly even futile or dubious attempts at pronouncing the ineffable.
Their number therefore is infinite and the validity of each is to be doubted.
They are nothing but humble attempts to formulate, to define, to shape the inexpressible. "Wo fass ich Dich, unendliche Natur?" (Faust).
It is not a doctrine but a mere expression of and a reaction to the experience of an ineffable mystery.
There is one point more I want to mention: the stone is not a product only of thought-images, but just as much of feeling and local atmosphere, i.e., of the specific ambiente of the place.
The stone belongs to its secluded place between lake and hill, where it expresses the beata solitudo and the genius loci, the spell of the chosen and walled-in spot.
It could be nowhere else and cannot be thought of or properly understood without the secret web of threads that relate it to its surroundings .
Only there in its solitude it can say: Orphanus sum, and only there it makes sense.
It is there for its own sake and only seen by a few.
Under such conditions only the stone will whisper its misty lore of ancient roots and ancestral lives.
Thank you for letting me see your typescript.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung
P.S. When I saw you [Maud Oakes] in Bollingen I did not realize that you are the author of Todos Santos a book which I have read with greatest interest and sympathy, otherwise I would have expressed my admiration of your careful study.
I am doing it now with some delay. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 291-292.

Carl Jung: I was thrown back on experience alone. (2015-08-23 11:25)

To Pastor Walter Bernet
Dear Pastor Bernet, 13 June 1955
At last I have got down to reading and studying your book which you so kindly sent me.
Please put the slowness of this procedure down to my old age!
It was certainly not lack of interest that kept me reading so long, but rather a curiosity or-more accurately-a need to familiarize myself with and learn to understand the theological mode of thinking, which is so alien to me.
I have been able to assimilate this thinking only very fragmentarily, if at all, in spite or perhaps because of the fact that I come from a theological milieu on my mother's side, and my father was himself a clergyman.
It was the tragedy of my youth to see my father cracking up before my eyes on the problem of his faith and dying an early death.
This was the objective outer event that opened my eyes to the importance of religion.
Subjective inner experiences prevented me from drawing negative conclusions about religion from my father's fate, much as I was tempted to do so.
I grew up in the heyday of scientific materialism, studied natural science and medicine, and became a psychiatrist.
My education offered me nothing but arguments against religion on the one hand, and on the other the charisma of faith was denied me.
I was thrown back on experience alone.
Always Paul's experience on the road to Damascus hovered before me, and I asked myself how his fate would have fallen out but for his vision.
Yet this experience came upon him while he was blindly pursuing his own way.
As a young man I drew the conclusion that you must obviously fulfill your destiny in order to get to the point where a donum gratiae might happen along.
But I was far from certain, and always kept the possibility in mind that on this road I might end up in a black hole.
I have remained true to this attitude all my life.

From this you can easily see the origin of my psychology: only by going my own way, integrating my capacities headlong (like Paul), and thus creating a foundation for myself, could something be vouchsafed to me or built upon it, no matter where it came from, and of which I could be reasonably sure that it was not merely one of my own neglected capacities.
The only way open to me was the experience of religious realities which I had to accept without regard to their truth. In this matter I have no criterion except the fact that they seem meaningful to me and harmonize with man's best utterances.
I don't know whether the archetype is "true" or not.
I only know that it lives and that I have not made it.
Since the number of possibilities is limited, one soon comes to a frontier, or rather to frontiers which recede behind one another presumably up to the point of death.
The experience of these frontiers gradually brings the conviction that what is experienced is an endless approximation.
The goal of this approximation seems to be anticipated by archetypal symbols which represent something like the circumambulation of a centre.
With increasing approximation to the centre there is a corresponding depotentiation of the ego in favour of the influence of the "empty" centre, which is certainly not identical with the archetype but is the thing the archetype points to.
As the Chinese would say, the archetype is only the name of Tao, not Tao itself.
Just as the Jesuits translated Tao as "God," so we can describe the "emptiness" of the centre as "God."
Emptiness in this sense doesn't mean "absence" or "vacancy," but something unknowable which is endowed with the highest intensity.
If I call this unknowable the "self," all that has happened is that the effects of the unknowable have been given an aggregate name, but its contents are not affected in any way.
An indeterminably large part of my own being is included in it, but because this part is the unconscious I cannot indicate its limits or its extent.
The self is therefore a borderline concept, not by any means filled out with the known psychic processes.
On the one hand it includes the phenomena of synchronicity, on the other its archetype is embedded in the brain structure and is physiologically verifiable: through electrical stimulation of a certain area of the brain-stem of an epileptic it is possible to produce mandala visions (quadratura circuli).
From synchronistic phenomena we learn that a peculiar feature of the psychoi background is Transgressive within space and time.
This brings us directly to the frontier of transcendence, beyond which human statements can only be mythological.
The whole course of individuation is dialectical, and the so-called "end" is the confrontation of the ego with the "emptiness" of the centre. Here the limit of possible experience is reached: the ego dissolves as the reference-point of cognition.
It cannot coincide with the centre, otherwise we would be insensible; that is to say, the extinction of the ego is at best an endless approximation.
But if the ego usurps the centre it loses its object (inflation!).
Even though you add to my "ultimate" an "absolute ultimate," you will hardly maintain that my "ultimate" is not as good an "ultimate" as yours.
In any case all possibility of cognition and predication ceases for me at this frontier because of the extinction of the ego.
The ego can merely affirm that something vitally important is happening to it.
It may conjecture that it has come up against something greater, that it feels powerless against this greater power; that it can cognize nothing further; that in the course of the integration process it has become convinced of its finiteness, just as before it was compelled to take practical account of the existence of an ineluctable archetype.
The ego has to acknowledge many gods before it attains the centre where no god helps it any longer against another god.
It now occurs to me-and I hope I am not deceiving myself that from the point where you introduce the "absolute ultimate" which is meant to replace my descriptive concept of the self by an empty abstraction, the archetype is increasingly detached from its dynamic background and gradually turned into a purely intellectual formula.

In this way it is neutralized, and you can then say "one can live with it quite well."
But you overlook the fact that the self-constellating archetypes and the resultant situations steadily gain in numinosity, indeed are sometimes imbued with a positively eerie daemonism and bring the danger of psychosis threateningly close.
The up surging archetypal material is the stuff of which mental illnesses are made.
In the individuation process the ego is brought face to face with an unknown superior power which is likely to cut the ground from under its feet and blow consciousness to bits.
The archetype is not just the formal condition for mythological statements but an overwhelming force comparable to nothing I know.
In view of the terrors of this confrontation I would never dream of addressing this menacing and fascinating opponent familiarly as "Thou," though paradoxically it also has this aspect.
All talk of this opponent is mythology.
All statements about and beyond the "ultimate" are anthropomorphisms and, if anyone should think that when he says "God" he has also predicated God, he is endowing his words with magical power.
Like a primitive, he is incapable of distinguishing the verbal image from reality.
In one breath he will endorse the statement Deus est ineffabilis without a thought, but in the next he will be speaking of God as though he could express him.
It seems to me-and I beg your pardon in advance if I am doing you an injustice-that something of the sort has happened to you.
You write, apparently without any misgivings, that I equate God with the self.
You seem not to have noticed that I speak of the God-image and not of God because it is quite beyond me to say anything about God at all.
It is more th an astonishing that you have failed to perceive this fundamental distinction, it is shattering.
I don't know what you must take me for if you can impute such stupidities to me after you yourself have correctly presented my epistemological standpoint at the beginning of your book.
I have in all conscience never supposed that in discussing the psychic structure of the God-image I have taken God himself in hand.
I am not a word-magician or word-fetishist who thinks he can posit or call up a metaphysical reality with his incantations.
Don't Protestant critics accuse the Catholic Mass of magic when it asserts that by pronouncing the words Hoc est corpus meum Christ is actually present?
In Job and elsewhere I am always explicitly speaking of the God-image.
If my theologian critics choose to overlook this, the fault lies with them and not with me.
They obviously think that the little word "God" conjures him up in reality, just as the Mass forces Christ to appear through the words of the Consecration. (Naturally I am aware of the dissident Catholic explanation of this.)
I do not share your overvaluation of words, and have never regarded the equation Christ = Logos as anything else than an interesting symbol conditioned by its time.
This credulity and entrapment in words is becoming more and more striking nowadays.
Proof of this is the rise of such a comical philosophy as existentialism, which labours to help being become being through the magical power of the word.
People still believe that they can posit or replace reality by words, or that something has happened when a thing is given a different name.
If I call the "ultimate" the self and you call it the "absolute ultimate," its ultimateness is not changed one whit.
The name means far less to me than the view associated with it.
You seem to think that I enjoy romping about in a circus of archetypal figures and that I take them for ultimate realities which block my view of the Ineffable.
They guide but they also mislead; how much I reserve my criticism for them you can see in Answer to Job, where I subject archetypal statements to what you call "blasphemous" criticism.

The very fact that you consider this critique of anthropomorphisms worthy of condemnation proves how strongly you are bound to these psychic products by word-magic.
If theologians think that whenever they say ”God” then God is, they are deifying anthropomorphisms, psychic structures and myths.
This is exactly what I don’t do, for, I must repeat, I speak exclusively of the God-image in Job.
Who talks of divine knowledge and divine revelation? Certainly not me.
”Ultimately” I have really reached the ultimate with my presumptuous anthropomorphisms which feign knowledge and revelation!
I see many God-images of various kinds; I find myself compelled to make mythological statements, but I know that none of them expresses or captures the immeasurable Other, even if I were to assert it did.
However interesting or enthralling metaphysical statements may be, I must still criticize them as anthropomorphisms.
But here the theologian buttonholes me, asseverating that his anthropomorphism is God and damning anyone who criticizes any anthropomorphic weaknesses, defects, and contradictions in it as a blasphemer.
It is not God who is insulted by the worm but the theologian, who can’t or won’t admit that his concept is anthropomorphic.
With this he puts an end to the much needed discussion and understanding of religious statements.
Just as Bultmann’s demythologizing procedure stops at the point where the demagicking of words no longer seems advisable to him, so the theologian treats exactly the same concept as mythological, i.e., anthropomorphic at one moment and as an inviolable taboo at the next.
I have begged four distinguished (academic) theologians to tell me what exactly is the attitude of modern Protestantism to the question of the identity of the God of the Old Testament with the God of the New, between whom the layman thinks he can spot quite a number of differences.
The question is so harmless that it is like asking what the difference is between Freud’s view of the unconscious and mine.
Two didn’t answer at all despite repeated requests.
The third told me that there was no longer any talk of God in the theological literature of the last twenty years anyway.
The fourth said the question was very easy to answer: Yahweh was simply a somewhat archaic God-concept in comparison with that of the New Testament.
Whereupon I replied: ”Look, my dear Professor, this is just the kind of psychologism the theologians accuse me of. Suddenly the divine revelation in the OT is nothing but an archaic concept and the revelation in the NT is simply a modern one. But the next moment this same revelation is God himself and no concept at all.”
So you ride the hobby-horse of your choice.
In order to do away with such tricks, I stick to my proposal that we take all talk of God as mythological and discuss these mythologems honestly.
As soon as we open our mouths we speak in traditional verbal images, and even when we merely think we think in age-old psychic structures.
If God were to reveal himself to us we have nothing except our psychic organs to register his revelation and could not express it except in the images of our everyday speech.
Let the Protestant theologian therefore abandon his hieratic word magic and his alleged knowledge of God through faith and admit to the layman that he is mythologizing and is just as incapable as he is of expressing God himself.
Let him not vilify and condemn and twist the arguments of others who are struggling just as earnestly to understand the mysteries of religion, even if he finds these arguments personally disagreeable or wrong in themselves.
(I cannot exempt you, for one, from the obligation to give due regard to the epistemological premises of Answer to Job if you want to criticize it.)
So long as we are conscious of ourselves, we are supported by the psyche and its structures and at the same time imprisoned in them with no possibility of getting outside ourselves.
We would not feel and be aware of ourselves at all were we not always confronted with the unknown power.
Without this we would not be conscious of our separateness, just as there is no consciousness without an object.
We are not delivered from the ”sin” of mythologizing by saying that we are ”saved” or ”redeemed” through the revelation of God in Christ, for this is simply another mythologem which does, however, contain a psychological truth.

Consequently we can understand the ”feeling of redemption” which is bound up with this mythologem; but the statement ”revelation in Christ” merely affirms that a myth of this kind exists which evidently belongs to the symbolism of the self.
What impresses me most profoundly in discussions with theologians of both camps is that metaphysical statements are made apparently without the slightest awareness that they are talking in mythic images which pass directly as the ”word of God.”
For this reason it is so often thoughtlessly assumed that I do the same thing, whereas quite to the contrary I am trained by my daily professional work to distinguish scrupulously between idea and reality.
The recognition of projections is indeed one of the most important tasks of psychotherapy.
I have read your erudite book with great interest and profit and find it all the more regrettable that in spite of your admirably objective presentation of my standpoint at the beginning you nevertheless go off the rails at the end.
You think I have deviated from my epistemological position in Job.
Had you read the introduction you could never have pronounced this false judgment.
I can understand very well that you are shocked by the book; I was too, and by the original Job into the bargain.
I feel that you have in general too poor an opinion of me when you charge me with the arrogance of wanting to write an exegesis of Job.
I don’t know a word of Hebrew.
As a layman, I have only tried to read the translated text with psychological common sense, on the assumption, certainly, that I am dealing with anthropomorphisms and not with magical words that conjure up God himself.
If in the Jewish commentaries the high priest takes the liberty of admonishing Adonai to remember his good rather than his bad qualities it is no longer so shocking if I avail myself of a similar criticism, especially as I am not even addressing Adonai, as the high priest did, but merely the anthropomorphic God-image, and expressly refrain from all metaphysical utterances, which the high priest did not.
You will scarcely suppose that, despite my assurance to the contrary, the mere pronouncing of God’s name conjures up God himself.
At all events Adonai took the high priest’s criticism and a number of other equally drastic observations without a murmur, thereby showing himself to b more tolerant than certain theologians.
The reason why mythic statements invariably lead to word-magic is that the archetype possesses a numinous autonomy and has a psychic life of its own.
I have dealt with this particular difficulty at some length in Job.
Perhaps I may remark in conclusion that the theory of archetypes is more difficult, and I am not quite so stupid as you apparently think.
I cannot omit to thank you, all the same, for the great trouble you have taken in going into my proposition so thoroughly.
It is obvious that this cannot be done without difficulties and misunderstandings, especially in view of the fact that our age is still for the most part trapped in its belief in words.
Ancient Greece was on an even lower level, as the term phrenes with its psychic connotation shows.
The Pueblo Indians of New Mexico still think in the ”heart” and not in the head.
Tantra Yoga gives the classic localizations of thought: anahata, thinking (or localization of consciousness) in the chest region (phrenes); visuddha (localized in the larynx), verbal thinking; and ajna, vision, symbolized by an eye in the forehead, which is attained only when verbal image and object are no longer identical, i.e., when their participation mystique is abolished.
I have this advance of human consciousness particularly at heart.
It is a difficult task to which I have devoted all my life’s work.
This is the reason why I venture to plague you with such a long letter.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on the Psyche and Carcinoma (2015-08-24 04:45)

To Rudolf Jung
Dear Cousin, 11 May 1956
Your views on the origin of a carcinoma seem to me largely correct.
I have in fact seen cases where the carcinoma broke out under the conditions you envisage, when a person comes to a halt at some essential point in his individuation or cannot get over an obstacle.
Unhappily nobody can do it for him, and it cannot be forced.
An inner process of growth must begin, and if this spontaneous creative activity is not performed by nature herself, the outcome can only be fatal.
At any rate there is a profound disability, i.e., the constitution is at the end of its resources.
Ultimately we all get stuck somewhere, for we are all mortal and remain but a part of what we are as a whole.
The wholeness we can reach is very relative.
Just as carcinoma can develop for psychic reasons, it can also disappear for psychic reasons.
Such cases are well authenticated.
But this does not mean that it is amenable to psychotherapy, or that it could be prevented by a particular psychic development.
With best greetings,
Carl Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 296-297.

Carl Jung on Freud and Religion (2015-08-24 06:03)

To Andrew R. Eickhoff
Dear Mr. Eickhoff, 7 May 1956
Thank you very much for sending your interesting MS about Freud and Religion.
The historical fact is that Freud's attitude towards religion in any form was a negative one, quite apart from the fact that he himself said so in his paper about this subject.
Religious belief to him was indeed an illusion.

Whether this illusion is due to objective scientific argument or to personal bias does not matter when it comes to the question of actual facts.
His negative attitude was one among a number of other points of litigation between us.
No matter whether it was a Jewish or a Christian or any other belief, he was unable to admit anything beyond the horizon of his scientific materialism.
I was most unsuccessful in my attempts to make him see that his standpoint was unscientifically prejudiced and his idea of religion was a foregone conclusion. In our many talks about this and similar subjects he more than once quoted Voltaire's '\□□rasez l'infame! "and even went so far as to say that his doctrine of sexual repression as the ultimate reason for all such foolish ideas as f.i. religion, should be counterweighted by making a dogma of his sex theory.
Naturally he assumed that my more positive ideas about religion and its importance for our psychological life were nothing but an outcrop of my unrealized resistances against my clergyman father, whereas in reality my problem and my personal prejudice were never centred in my father but most emphatically in my mother.
As you will doubtless have realized from the perusal of Freud's works, his father-complex sticks out everywhere, while the equally important mother-complex plays the most insignificant role.
You might hold that, following the bias of my mother-complex, I have overrated the importance of religion-a criticism which I have considered seriously.
In the case of a psychologist I don't consider it a particularly excusable mistake to allow personal bias to overrule one's own judgment.
I have tried therefore, at least as well as I could, not to overlook the fact that my mother-complex might play me a trick, but if you should raise the point, I am sure you would find a willing ear to listen to your opinion.
I have always wondered how it comes that just the theologians are often so particularly fond of the Freudian theory, as one could hardly find anything more hostile to their alleged beliefs.
This curious fact has given me much stuff for thinking.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 295-296.

Carl Jung reviews Jolande Jacobi's book (2015-08-24 06:16)

To Jolande Jacobi
Dear Dr. Jacobi, 13 March 1956
Forgive me for being so late with my report.
I have read your essay in the Psyche Festschrift with great interest.
It is a very good presentation of my concepts, or rather of the names I use to express empirical facts.
But I always stumble over the frequent use of the term "theory" or "system."
Freud has a "theory," I have no "theory" but I describe facts.
I do not theorize about how neuroses originate, I describe what you find in neuroses.
Nor have I any theory of dreams, I only indicate what kind of method I use and what the possible results are.
I must emphasize this because people always fail to see that I am talking about and naming facts, and that my concepts are mere names and not philosophical terms.
I still have to mention the following two points.
On p. 269 you write that I apply Freud's "free" association to the personal context but not to archetypal material.
I don't use free association at all since it is in any case an unreliable method of getting at the real dream material.
On a journey through Russia, one of my psychiatric colleagues thoughtfully contemplated the Cyrillic notices in his sleeper, analysed himself by means of "free" association, and so discovered all his complexes.
In this case you can be quite certain that the complexes of Herr X were not dreamt in the Cyrillic sleeper notices.
That is to say, by means of "free" association you will always get at your complexes, but this does not mean at all that they are the material dreamt about.
In dream analysis I proceed in a circurnarnbulatory fashion, having regard to the wise Talmudic saying that the dream is its own interpretation.
P. 2 74: "The idea of the 'wholeness of the psyche,' which subsequently led Jung to the conception of the individuation process and to the methods of activating it, was from the beginning the determining factor in his psychological vision."

This sentence is incorrect.
In the first place, the idea of wholeness did not lead me to the conception of the individuation process.
The individuation process is not a ”conception” at all, but designates a series of observed facts; and secondly, there is no method on earth that could ”activate” it.
The individuation process is the experience of a natural law and may or may not be perceived by consciousness.
The ”idea of wholeness” is a word I have used-though only in later years-:-to describe the self.
Concepts play no role whatever with me because I make no philosophical assumptions; hence I never started from an ”idea of wholeness.”
For the rest your work is good.
I would only ask you to reconsider the two points I have mentioned, as they contain a fundamental misunderstanding.
With best greetings,
Yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 292-294.

Carl Jung’s gift from Laurens van der Post (2015-08-24 06:31)

To Laurens van der Post
Dear van der Post, 28 February 1956
Your amiable present from Africa has reached me safely.

The bow and the little arrows are just charming.
I could not refrain from trying Cupid's weapon and I can confirm its efficiency.
It shoots quite a distance.
I am much obliged also for the maker's photograph.
I have followed up your interesting trip through your reports published in the Neue Zurcher Zeitung, and all my old longing to see Africa,
God's unspoilt wilderness and its animal and human children once more [has returned].
Helas-I have seen and tasted it once at least vita somnium breve-so many things cannot be repeated and so many happy times cannot be called back.
No wonder that the thoughts of old people dwell so much in the past, as if they were listening for a living echo that never comes.
Time and again I have to make a vigorous effort to tear myself away from the things that have been in order to pay attention to things present, even to the future as if I were meant to be in it once.
I am deeply obliged to you for having remembered my fateful 80th birthday.
I am glad at last that I have been able (though not through my merit) to spare my wife what follows on the loss of a lifelong partner-the silence that has no answer.
I thank you once more for your kindness.
Please give my best regards to Mrs. van der Post. (. . .)
Yours cordially,

Carl Jung: For decades I have been either not understood or misunderstood... (2015-08-24 11:53)

[Carl Jung: For decades I have been either not understood or misunderstood...]
To Eugen Bohler
Dear Professor Bohler, May 1956
Best thanks for your friendly letter and my apologies for tearing the MS away from you.
All the copies have still to be corrected.
I have already availed myself of your valuable suggestions, as you will see in the printed text.
Your remarks obviously touch on something very essential in my style, though I wasn't aware of it at all.
For decades I have been either not understood or misunderstood, despite all the care I took to begin with in the matter of "communication and logical persuasion."
But because of the novelty of my subject as well as of my thoughts I ran up everywhere against an impenetrable wall.
This is probably why my style changed in the course of the years, since I only said what was relevant to the business in hand and wasted no more time and energy thinking about all the things that ill-will, prejudice, stupidity and whatnot can come up with.

Bachofen, for example, took infinite pains to be persuasive.
All in vain.
His time had not yet come.
I have resigned myself to being posthumous.
It is still much too early to speak to an educated public about ”symbols of self-recollection.”
It would all be utterly incomprehensible since the foundations for any real understanding don’t yet exist.
First and foremost it must be understood what the bell is tolling.
Your dream tells us.
It begins high up in metaphysics.
Already it stalks the earth.
Your dream is an epilogue to my MS.
With best greetings,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 298-299.

Carl Jung: For your age and your circumstances you are still much too fractious. (2015-08-25 04:40)

To Frau V.
Dear Frau V., 12 May 1956

After your kindness in sending me these excellent bottles of Chateauneuf du Pape, I really did expect that some quite special favours had been piling up on your side.
But if you are now in the dumps and up to your ears in the mire, you must tell yourself That you were obviously flying too high and that a dose of undiluted hellish blackness was indicated.
The pickle you are in is certainly something you couldn't have brought on yourself.
This shows that someone "out there" is surrounding you with provident thoughts and doing you the necessary wrong.
You should regard your present situation as a mud bath from which after a while a small morning sun will burst forth again.
"Patience be damned," says Faust, and you need it most of all.
For your age and your circumstances you are still much too fractious.
The devil can best be beaten with patience, having none himself.
With best wishes,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Colors in Dreams (2015-08-25 04:49)

To Romola Niiinsky
Dear Mrs. Nijinsky, 24 May 1956
Thank you for your letter of the 15th.
I was interested to hear of your various activities.
The question of colours or rather absence of colours in dreams, depends on the relations between consciousness and the unconscious.
In a situation where an approximation of the unconscious to consciousness is desirable, or vice versa, the unconscious acquires a special tone, which can express itself in the colourfulness of its images (dreams, visions, etc.) or in other impressive qualities (beauty, depth, intensity).

If on the other hand the attitude of consciousness to the unconscious is more or less neutral, or apprehensive, there is no marked need for the two to make contact, and the dreams remain colourless.
When Huxley says that a symbol is uncoloured, this is an error.
”Yellowing,” ”reddening,” ”whitening,” the ”blessed greenness,” etc. play an important role in the highly symbolic language of the alchemists.
You can also find the symbolism of colours in quite another field-that of Christian liturgy.
You have only to think of the significance of the variously coloured garments used in the Mass.
The intense perception of colours in the mescalin experiment is due to the fact the lowering of consciousness by the drug offers no resistance to the unconscious.
With kind regards,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Ethics (2015-08-25 05:07)

To William Kinney
Dear Mr. Kinney, 26 May 1956
In answering your letter of May 7th I must tell you that there is neither an easy answer to the problem of ethics nor are there any books that would give you satisfactory guidance as far as my knowledge goes.
Ethics depend upon the supreme decision of a Christian conscience, and conscience itself does not depend upon man alone, but as much upon the counterpart of man, namely God.

The ethical question boils down to the relationship between man and God.
Any other kind of ethical decision would be a conventional one, which means that it would depend upon a traditional and collective code of moral values.
Since such values are general and not specific, they don't exactly apply to individual situations, as little as a schematic diagram expresses the variations of individual events.
To follow a moral code would amount to the same as an intellectual judgment about an individual, viewed from the standpoint of anthropological statistics.
Moreover, making a moral code the supreme arbiter of your ethical conduct would be a substitute for the will of a living God, since the moral code is made by man and declared to be a law given by God himself.
The great difficulty of course is the "Will of God."
Psychologically the "Will of God" appears in your inner experience in the form of a superior deciding power, to which you may give various names like instinct, fate, unconscious, faith, etc.
The psychological criterion of the "Will of God" is forever the dynamic superiority.
It is the factor that finally decides when all is said and done.
It is essentially something you cannot know beforehand.
You only know it after the fact.
You only learn it slowly in the course of your life.
You have to live thoroughly and very consciously for many years in order to understand what your will is and what Its will is.
If you learn about yourself and if eventually you discover more or less who you are, you also learn about God, and who He is.
In applying a moral code (which in itself is a commendable thing), you can prevent even the divine decision, and then you go astray.
So try to live as consciously, as conscientiously, and as completely as possible and learn who you are and who or what it is that ultimately decides.
I have discussed certain aspects of this problem in one of my books, called Aion.
As soon as the translation is ready, it will appear in my Collected Works, published by the Bollingen Press, in case you don't read German.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 300-301

Carl Jung on the ”New Ethic.” (2015-08-25 14:57)

1 Gordon St.,
Tel Aviv,
ISRAEL
Dear Neumann,
I was very pleased to hear from you once again and to hear that you have read my small brochure.
It seems to have been a hit here as there is already a second print run underway.
In relation to the so-called New Ethic we are basically quite in agreement, but I prefer to express this delicate problem in a rather different language.
It is not really a question of a “new” ethic.
Evil is and always remains the thing one knows one should not do.
Man overestimates himself unfortunately in this respect: he thinks it is within his discretion to intend good or evil.
He can persuade himself of this, but in reality he is, in view of the greatness of these opposites, simply too small and too unconscious to be able to choose the one or the other in free will and under all circumstances.
It is much more the case that he does or does not do the good that he would like to for overwhelming reasons, and that in the same way, evil just happens to him like misfortune.
Ethics is that which makes it impossible for him to do evil intentionally and encourages him to do good—and indeed often with little success. I.e., he can do good and cannot avoid evil, although his ethic causes him to test the powers of his will in this regard. In reality he is the victim of these powers.
He must admit to himself that under no circumstances can he absolutely avoid sin, as he also on the other hand may hope to be able to do good. Now, as evil is unavoidable, so one never completely evades sin and it is a fact that one must accept.
It gives cause not for a new ethic, but for differentiated ethical considerations, namely, to the question: how do I behave toward the fact that I cannot escape sin?
The instruction that is given in Christ’s words: “If thou knowest what thou doest …” shows a way to the ethical surmounting of the problem: I know that I do not wish to do evil and do it all the same, not from my own choice but because it overpowers me.

As a human being I am a weakling and vulnerable so that evil can overwhelm me.
I know that I do it and what I have done and know that I will stand in the torment of this contradiction for my lifetime.
I will, where I can, avoid evil and will always fall into this hole.
But I will endeavor to live as if this were not the case; I will therefore grin and bear it and will by this means be pleasing to the Lord, like the unfaithful householder who knowingly produced a false account.
I do not do this because I wish to deceive myself or even the Lord, but so that I do not cause any public offense for the sake of my brothers' weakness, and I preserve my moral standing and human dignity to some degree.
I am therefore in the situation of a human being who experiences a terror in the middle of a dangerous situation and would prefer to see if he does not pull himself together for the sake of the others and feigns courage to himself and the others by which the situation can perhaps be saved.
In this case, while I have not made my panic imaginary, I have hidden my good success behind the mask of courage.
It is an act of supreme hypocrisy, therefore another sin, but without which we would all be lost.
This is not a new ethic, but simply a more differentiated one with fewer illusions, but the same as it always was.
You can relate these subtle considerations to Zeus, but not to the ox.
They are in fact subtle because they presuppose very special conditions.
They achieve their validity only for the man who is really conscious of his shadow, but for one who treats his shadow either as a casual inconvenience or who trivially dismisses it out of a lack of scruples and moral responsibility, it signifies a dangerous possibility of the aberration of moral judgment as is characteristic for the man who, as a result of his moral defect, possesses a corresponding intellectual inflation.
One can relieve oneself of some conflict by closing the moral eye for "all guilt avenges itself on earth."
I am just occupied with a work that has a completely different theme, but the discussion has meant that I had to also mention the ethical problem.
I could not do otherwise than embark on a repudiation of the expression "new ethic," without naming names.
This is once again one of those sins, a faithlessness as it were, which imposes itself like a disaster at the moment when I had to protect the disproportionately higher aspect of our psychology from the coarseness of vulgar appreciation and, this, to general advantage.
The entire difficulty lies in this case in the slipperiness of the language.
Therefore one is forced to strew sand, which occasionally also lands in the eyes of the audience.
I am looking forward to your application of the origins history to the psychology of children.
There would indeed be illustrative material there.
I feel myself very uncertain in relation to the question of pessimism and optimism and must leave the solution to fate.
The only one who could decide this dilemma, that is dear God himself, has withheld his answer from me so far.
Hopefully you are well dans ce meilleur des mondes possibles.
Tout cela est bien dit, mais il faut cultiver notre jardin.
With best wishes,
Your ever devoted,

Carl Jung's reply when A woman asks Dr. Jung why her child was born an imbecile. (2015-08-26 05:41)

A woman asks Dr. Jung why her child was born an imbecile.]
Dear Frau N., 28 June 1956
It is hard to accept the fate you have described.
Quite apart from the moral achievement required, complete acceptance depends very much on the conception you have of fate.
An exclusively causal view is permissible only in the realm of physical or inorganic processes.
The teleological view is more important in the biological sphere and also in psychology, where the answer makes sense only if it explains the ”why” of it.
So it is pointless to cling on to the causes, since they cannot be altered anyway.
It is more rewarding to know what is to be done with the consequences, and the kind of attitude one has-or should have-to them.
Then the question at once arises: Does the event have a meaning?
Did a hidden purpose of fate, or God's will, have a hand in it, or was it nothing but ”chance,” a ”mishap”?
If it was God's purpose to try us, why then must an innocent child suffer?
This question touches on a problem that is clearly answered in the Book of Job.

Yahweh's amorality or notorious injustice changes only with the Incarnation into the exclusive goodness of God.
This transformation is connected with his becoming man and therefore exists only if it is made real through the conscious fulfillment of God's will in man. If this realization does not occur, not only the Creator's amorality is revealed but also his unconsciousness.
With no human consciousness to reflect themselves in, good and evil simply happen, or rather, there is no good and evil, but only a sequence of neutral events, or what the Buddhists call the Nidhanachain, the uninterrupted causal concatenation leading to suffering, old age, sickness, and death.
Buddha's insight and the Incarnation in Christ break the chain through the intervention of the enlightened human consciousness, which thereby acquires a metaphysical and cosmic significance.
In the light of this realization, the mishap changes into a happening which, if taken to heart, allows us to glimpse deeply into the cruel and pitiless imperfections of Creation and also into the mystery of the Incarnation.
The happening then turns into that felix culpa which Adam brought on himself by his disobedience.
Suffering, Meister Eckhart says, is the "swiftest steed that bears you to perfection."
The boon of increased self-awareness is the sufficient answer even to life's suffering, otherwise it would be meaningless and unendurable.
Though the suffering of the Creation which God left imperfect cannot be done away with by the revelation of the good God's will to man, yet it can be mitigated and made meaningful.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 310-311,

Carl Jung: Whole numbers may well be the discovery of God's "primal thoughts,"... (2015-08-26 11:02)

To Robert Dietrich
Dear Herr Dietrich, 27 May 1956
Best thanks for kindly telling me your interesting dream.
Mathematicians are not agreed whether numbers were invented or discovered.
"In the Olympian host Number eternally reigns" (Jacobi).
Whole numbers may well be the discovery of God's "primal thoughts," as for instance the significant number four, which has distinctive qualities.
But you ask in vain for speculations on my part concerning the "development of this principle of order."
I cannot presume to say anything about this transcendental problem which is ingrained in the cosmos.
The mere attempt to do so would strike me as intellectual inflation.
After all, man cannot dissect God's primal thoughts.
Why are whole numbers individuals?
Why are there prime numbers?
Why have numbers inalienable qualities?
Why are there discontinuities like quanta, which Einstein would have liked to abolish?
Your dream seems to me a genuine revelation: God and Number as the principle of order belong together.
Number, like Meaning, inheres in the nature of all things as an expression of God's dissolution in the world of appearances.
This creative process is continued with the same symbolism in the Incarnation. (Cf. Answer to Job.)
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung

Carl Jung to Maud Oakes (2015-08-26 11:09)

To Maud Oakes
Dear Miss Oakes, 11 February 1956
I have read your meditation about the stone with much interest.
Your method of reading its message is adequate and in this case the only one yielding positive results.
You understand the stone as a statement about a more or less limitless world of thought-images.
I quite agree with your view.
One can read the symbols like that.
When I hewed the stone I did not think, however.
I just brought into shape what I saw on its face.
Sometimes you express yourself (in the MS) as if my symbols and my text were a sort of confession or a belief.
Thus it looks as if I were moving in the vicinity of theosophy.
In America especially one blames me for my so-called mysticism.
Since I don't claim at all to be the happy proprietor of metaphysical truths, I should much prefer that you attribute to my symbols the same tentativeness which characterizes your explanatory attempt.
You see, I have no religious or other convictions about my symbols.
They can change tomorrow.
They are mere allusions, they hint at something, they stammer and often they lose their way.

They try only to point in a certain direction, viz. to those dim horizons beyond which lies the secret of existence.
They [symbols] are just no Gnosis, no metaphysical assertions.
They are partly even futile or dubious attempts at pronouncing the ineffable.
Their number therefore is infinite and the validity of each is to be doubted.
They are nothing but humble attempts to formulate, to define, to shape the inexpressible. ”Wo fass ich Dich, unendliche Natur?” (Faust).
It is not a doctrine but a mere expression of and a reaction to the experience of an ineffable mystery.
There is one point more I want to mention: the stone is not a product only of thought-images, but just as much of feeling and local atmosphere, i.e., of the specific ambiente of the place.
The stone belongs to its secluded place between lake and hill, where it expresses the beata solitudo and the genius loci, the spell of the chosen and walled-in spot.
It could be nowhere else and cannot be thought of or properly understood without the secret web of threads that relate it to its surroundings .
Only there in its solitude it can say: Orphanus sum, and only there it makes sense.
It is there for its own sake and only seen by a few.
Under such conditions only the stone will whisper its misty lore of ancient roots and ancestral lives.
Thank you for letting me see your typescript.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung
P.S. When I saw you [Maud Oakes] in Bollingen I did not realize that you are the author of Todos Santos a book which I have read with greatest interest and sympathy, otherwise I would have expressed my admiration of your careful study.
I am doing it now with some delay. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 291-292.

Carl Jung: Christ is not an archetype but a personification of the archetype. (2015-08-26 11:22)

To Helene Kiener
Dear Fraulein Kiener, 1 June 1956
I would answer your questions as follows:
The ”Christ archetype” is a false concept, as you say.
Christ is not an archetype but a personification of the archetype.

7268

This is reflected in the idea of the Anthropos, the homo maximus or Primordial Man (Adam Kadmon).
In India it is Purusha, and in China Chen-jen (the whole or true man) as a goal to be attained.
Purusha as creator sacrifices himself in order to bring the world into being: God dissolves in his own creation.
(This thought occurs in a modern dream.)
The Incarnation results from Christ ”emptying himself of divinity” and taking the form of a slave.
Thus he is in bondage to man as the demiurge is in bondage to the world.
(Concerning the bondage of the creator to his creature, cf. Answer to Job, his identification with the two monsters4 and his inability to understand man.)
The spiritual (as contrasted with the worldly) Messiah, Christ, Mithras, Osiris, Dionysos, Buddha are all visualizations or personifications of the irrepresentable archetype which, borrowing from Ezekiel and Daniel, I call the Anthropos.
Bernet’s book is illogical because he simply cannot understand that we are not speaking of God himself but only of an image we have of him.
Through this epistemological slipperiness theology gets caught in its own toils.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
P.S. The passage from the modern dream was as follows:
There were ”five unities” which represented ”the whole creation of the universe.
But then something happened . . . that shook me profoundly . . . .
He, whose eternal existence I had never dared to doubt consciously, reduced the five unities to four unities by dissolving himself into Nothing.” Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 304-306.

Carl Jung: Where the fear, there is your task! (2015-08-26 11:33)

To Warner S. McCullen
Dear Mr. McCullen, 4 June 1956
The loss of the mother in the early years of childhood often leaves traces in the form of a mother-complex.
If the influence of a living mother is too strong, it has the same effect as when she is absent.
In either case it will be the cause of such a complex.
One of the main features of a mother-complex is the fact that one is too much under the influence of the unconscious.
As the unconscious in a man's case has a female character it then looks, Allegorically speaking, as if one had "swallowed" the mother.
In fact, there is only an arrested development of the female side of a man's character.
This shows either as too much femininity or too little.
Not knowing your personal biography I would not be able to tell you which your case is.
Fear and feelings of guilt, however, are characteristic of such a condition as a symptom of insufficient adaptation, as there is always something too much or too little, and moreover there is the feeling of a task to be fulfilled and not fulfilled yet.
It is unimportant to know what the possible original cause of such a symptom Is.
The search for the cause is rather misleading, since the existence of the fear continues, not because it has been originally started in the remote past, but because a task is incumbent upon you in the present moment, and, inasmuch as it remains unfulfilled, every day produces fear and guilt anew.
The question is, of course, what do you feel to be your task?
Where the fear, there is your task!

7270

You must study your fantasies and dreams in order to find out what you ought to do or where you can begin to do something.
Our fantasies are always hovering on the point of our insufficiency where a defect ought to be compensated.
I thank you very much for your kind present of the Korean medal .
The representation of the Chinese Saturn period is particularly Beautiful.
Faithfully yours,

Carl Jung on why some people believe in God. (2015-08-26 15:48)

To B . A. Snowdon
Dear Mr. Snowdon, 7 May 1955
You were quite right in believing I would answer your letter.
You are obviously a sincere man to whom one can give a straight answer.
You want to know why you believe so confidently in the existence of God, and you mention your friends who believe they are able to explain the reason for our existence or who say that the world can just as well be accidental, or similar things.
Nobody can answer such questions since there is no answer to them.
Whether the world is accidental, or intended or planned, nobody can say.
That I myself have a reasonable and provable cause is no news, but that man's existence in general has a definite and verifiable cause nobody can say, as little as we know the reasons why there are elephants, or trees, or amoebas, or anything else.

Of course there are reasons why they exist, but they are all unpredictable facts, which means that in past geological ages nobody would have been in a position to predict the coming of mammals and incidentally of man.
People who believe that they can explain these things are just a bit muddle-headed and victims of their own illusions.
The only thing we can safely state is that all the said things do exist, for reasons unknown.
Now when you ask why you so confidently believe in the existence of God, nobody can tell you why.
It is just a fact, a result or a fruit of your living mind.
The mind is like a tree bringing forth its characteristic blossom and fruit; it is just so.
As you call something that pleases you beautiful or good, so you confess to believe in God.
As an apple tree that bears no fruit would be all wrong, so you would be all wrong if you didn't confess your truth.
It just grows in arid through you, and this great unknown thing that makes the universe tick at all, and incidentally causes ourselves to produce such thoughts and convictions, is what man since time immemorial has called "gods" or "God."
It does not matter what he calls his God, whether he gives Him the name of "first cause," "matter," "ether," "will to be," "creative urge," etc.
When somebody says that the thing he suggests is something new or other than God, he is a bit soft in the brain, i .e., he is incapable of thinking clearly. He still believes in the magic power of words as if he were able to change something in the world by saying: "This is not God, but something else."
God is an immediate experience of a very primordial nature, one of the most natural products of our mental life, as the birds sing, as the wind whistles, like the thunder of the surf.
If you find such a belief in you, you are just natural, and we know that your mind functions properly, but equally we are unable to say why there are different kinds of birds, or why there are birds at all; we cannot find the reasons why their song exists in its particular way.
No scientist is able to tell you why we see a certain wave-length as green or red or blue, since all we can make out is only the length of the light waves, but it is a fact that we see these colours.
People who think that they know the reasons for everything are unaware of the obvious fact that the existence of the universe itself is one big unfathomable secret, and so is our human existence.
You can just be glad to have such a conviction, like a man who is in a happy frame of mind, even if nobody else, not even himself, knows why, but certainly nobody could prove to him that he is unhappy or that his feeling happy is an illusion.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 252-253.

Carl Jung on Sigmund Freud (2015-08-27 05:12)

To Benjamin Nelson
Dear Professor Nelson, 17 June 1956
If I were younger I should take great pleasure in following your kind proposition to write a comprehensible essay about the confusing mass of opinions aroused by Freud's essential discovery: the psychological enchainment of psychopathological phenomena and its consequences for normal psychology.
But-helas-in the meantime I have reached the age of 81 years with its inevitable reduction of efficiency, its fatigue, and its necessary restrictions.
Moreover the stimulus of novelty so tempting to a writer has lost its charm, as I have done this kind of work already in an almost forgotten past, when even Freud was still a strange, unknown, or misunderstood figure.
It is only within the last decade that his psychology was really taken notice of by academic minds and has penetrated the mental tenebrosities of the greater public.
It was simply not to be expected that my criticism or my different point of view or even my attempt at a further development of psychological research should have been understood or been noticed at all.
In the 18 or more volumes of my Collected Works I have said all I could possibly think of.
Whatever I might be able to write now would neither be new nor in any way better than the stuff I produced 30 or 40 years ago.
It is still neither read nor understood by my contemporaries.
In full ignorance of my work one is satisfied with misconceptions, distortions, and prejudices.
I cannot force people to take my work seriously and I cannot persuade them to study it really.
The trouble is that I don't construct theories one can learn by heart.
I collect facts which are not yet generally known or properly appreciated, and I give names to observations and experiences unfamiliar to the contemporary mind and objectionable to its prejudices.
Thus my chief contribution to the further development of the psychology of the unconscious, inaugurated by Freud, suffers from the considerable disadvantage that the doctors interested in psychotherapy have practically no knowledge of the general human mind as it expresses itself in history, archaeology, philology, philosophy, theology, etc., which demonstrate so many aspects of human psychology.
It is the smallest part of the psyche, and in particular of the unconscious, that presents itself in the medical consulting room.

On the other hand the specialists of the said disciplines are far from any psychological or psychopathological knowledge and the general public is blissfully unaware of all medical as well as any other kind of real and well-founded knowledge.
The topics under discussion are of a highly complex nature.
How can I popularize things so difficult, and demanding such an unusual amount of specific knowledge, to a public that does not or cannot take the trouble to settle down to a careful study of the facts collected in many volumes?
How can anyone express the essentials of nuclear physics in two words?
The comparison of modern psychology to modern physics is no idle talk.
Both disciplines [physics/psychology] have, for all their diametrical opposition, one most important point in common, namely the fact that they both approach the hitherto ”transcendental” region of the Invisible and Intangible, the world of merely analogous thought.
The truth of physics can be convincingly demonstrated by the explosion of an H-bomb.
The psychological truth is far less spectacular and only visible to a mind trained in Science as well as in many other often remote disciplines, that were never envisaged from a psychological point of view except in a most superficial and incompetent way. (Cf. f.i. Freud’s Totem and Taboo and The Future of an Illusion.)
I don’t claim any knowledge of modern physics myself, but I have worked together with the well-known physicist W. Pauli for a considerable time and as a result we were both satisfied with the fact that there is at least a very marked mutual rapprochement between the two most heterogeneous sciences in their epistemological preoccupations, i.e., in their antinomies (f.i. light = wave and corpuscle), Heisenberg’s ”Unbestimmtheitsrelation,” Bohr’s complementarity, not to speak of the archetypal models of representation.
(Cf. Jung a n d Pauli: Nature and Psyche.)
The reader is by far better prepared to understand physics, whereas the psychology of the unconscious is to him a terra incognita populated by the most absurd misconceptions and prejudices-which is always the case where ignorance reigns supreme.
The worst of ignorance is that it is never aware of how ignorant it is.
Recently it happened that an academic theologian accused me of esoterism because I use the word hierosgamos (a well-known technical term in comparative religion!!).
With the same right he could accuse every other discipline of indulging in esoterics simply because he does not understand its concepts.
That is the kind of thing I am up against.
I should have to write a voluminous book for the sole purpose of explaining the fundamentals of my psychology of the unconscious.
As a matter of fact I have written a good deal about elementary presuppositions.
But the trouble is that Freud alone is already an indigestible lump that keeps them busy to the end of their days.
Why bother about further complications?
I remember the years when Freud first appeared on the scene and when I fought my first battles for him.
What a mountain of prejudice, misunderstanding and mental inertia came down upon me!
It took more than half a century to make him acceptable.
He is not even yet so far understood that people would notice where something could be added or changed in his ideas, although there is no scientific truth that represents the last word.
The problem nearest to Freud’s heart was unquestionably the psychology of the unconscious, but none of his immediate followers has done anything about it.
I happen to be the only one of his heirs that has carried out some further research along the lines he intuitively foresaw.
As my modest attempts were judged to be almost blasphemous I have no earthly chance to write anything under my own name that would not be instantly branded with the mark of Cain.
It must needs be somebody else that is willing to risk his skin.
There is only one book that has seriously tried to tackle the thankless task of describing the development of depth psychology including my own contribution in its beginnings at least.

My later and more important work (as it seems to me) is still left untouched in its primordial obscurity.
The book is by Friedrich Seifert, professor of philosophy (!) in Munich.
As far as it goes it is a remarkably clear and objective piece of work and fills the bill of a fairly popular book.
I can recommend it warmly to your attention.
As far as I know, it is not translated yet.
Concerning my own writings I mention 3 articles about Freud:
”Sigmund Freud in His Historical Setting” (Character and Personality, London, Vol. I, No. 1, Sept. 1932; German in: Wirklichkeit der Seele, 1932).
”Freud and Jung: Contrasts” (in: Modern Man in Search of a Soul, Kegan Paul, London, 1933).
”Sigmund Freud” (in memoriam, Basler Nachrichten, 1 Oct. 1939)·
The last of these articles might be of interest to you.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 306-310.

Carl Jung to his Daughter on the death of her mother, Emma Jung (2015-08-27 08:50)

To Marianne Niehus-Jung
Dear Marianne, Bollingen, 17 July 1956

7276

Warmest thanks for your lovely letter, which was a great joy.
I am glad you weren't bored with me.
It was also a joy to be together with you for a while.
It is true that one cannot fully realize something that is not yet there, for one does not know what the pattern is which a still living person fills out.
Mama's death has left a gap for me that cannot be filled.
So it is good if you have something you want to carry out, and can turn to when the emptiness spreads about you too menacingly.
The stone I am working on (like the one I carved in the winter) gives me inner stability with its hardness and permanence, and its meaning governs my thoughts.

I will gladly read the MSS.
I hope there's no hurry.
The building is to start tomorrow if the permit arrives.

But I still have no news.
Will you be coming to Bollingen sometime?
Ruth sends best greetings,
Affectionately,
Your Father Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 316-317.
Notes:
1. This was a stone in memory of his wife; it was set up at Bollingen.
The stone he carved in the winter of 195 5/56 consisted of three stone tablets with the names of his ancestors.
They were placed in the courtyard of the Tower (Memories, p. 232/220).
2. In Memories (p. 225/213) Jung reports how after his wife's death he felt compelled to add an upper story to the central section of the Tower, as a representation of his ego-personality: "Now it signified an extension of consciousness achieved in old age. With that the building was complete."

To Elined Kotschnig
Dear Mrs . Kotschnig, 30 June 1956
It is not quite easy to answer your question within the space of a letter.
You know that we human beings are unable to explain anything that happens without or within ourselves otherwise than through the use of the intellectual means at our disposal.

We always have to use mental elements similar to the facts we believe we have observed.
Thus when we try to explain how God has created His world or how He behaves toward the world, the analogy we use is the way in which our creative spirit produces and behaves.
When we consider the data of paleontology with the view that a Conscious creator has perhaps spent more than a thousand million years, and has made, as it seems to us, no end of detours to produce consciousness, we inevitably come to the conclusion that-if we want to explain His doings at all-His behaviour is strikingly similar to a being with an at least very limited consciousness.
Although aware of the things that are and the next steps to take, He has apparently neither foresight of an ulterior goal nor any knowledge of a direct way to reach it.
Thus it would not be an absolute unconsciousness but a rather dim consciousness.
Such a consciousness would necessarily produce any amount of errors and impasses with the most cruel consequences, disease, mutilation, and horrible fights, i.e., just the thing that has happened and is still happening throughout all realms of life.
Moreover it is impossible for us to assume that a Creator producing a universe out of nothingness can be conscious of anything, because each act of cognition is based upon a discrimination for instance, I cannot be conscious of somebody else when I am identical with him.
If there is nothing outside of God everything is God and in such a state there is simply no possibility of self-cognition.
Nobody can help admitting that the thought of a God creating any amount of errors and impasses is as good as a catastrophe.
When the original Jewish conception of a purposeful and morally inclined God marked the end of the playful and rather purposeless existence of the polytheistic deities in the Mediterranean sphere, the result was a paradoxical conception of the supreme being, finding its expression in the idea of divine justice and injustice.
The clear recognition of the fatal unreliability of the deity led Jewish prophecy to look for a sort of mediator or advocate, representing the claims of humanity before God.
As you know, this figure is already announced in Ezekiel's vision of the Man and Son of Man.
The idea was carried on by Daniel and then in the Apocryphal writings, Particularly in the figure of the female Demiurge, viz. Sophia, and in the male form of an administrator of justice, the Son of Man, in the Book of Enoch, written about 100 B.c. and very popular at the time of Christ.
It must have been so well-known, indeed, that Christ called himself"Son of Man" with the evident presupposition of everybody knowing what he was talking about. Enoch is exactly what the Book of Job expects the advocate of man to be, over against the lawlessness and moral unreliability of Yahweh.
The recently discovered scrolls of the Dead Sea mention a sort of legendary mystical figure, viz. "the Teacher of Justice."
I think he is parallel to or identical with Enoch.
Christ obviously took up this idea, feeling that his task was to represent the role of the "Teacher of Justice" and thus of a Mediator; and he was up against an unpredictable and lawless God who would need a most drastic sacrifice to appease His wrath, viz. the slaughter of His own son.
Curiously enough, as on the one hand his self-sacrifice means admission of the Father's amoral nature, he taught on the other hand a new image of God, namely that of a Loving Father in whom there is no darkness.
This enormous antinomy needs some explanation.
It needed the assertion that he was the Son of the Father, i.e., the incarnation of the Deity in man.
As a consequence the sacrifice was a self-destruction of the amoral God, incarnated in a mortal body.
Thus the sacrifice takes on the aspect of a highly moral deed, of a self-punishment, as it were.
Inasmuch as Christ is understood to be the second Person of the Trinity, the self-sacrifice is the evidence for God's goodness.
At least so far as human beings are concerned.
We don't know whether there are other inhabited worlds where the same divine evolution also has taken place.
It is thinkable that there are many inhabited worlds in different stages of development where God has not yet undergone the transformation through incarnation.

However that may be, for us earthly beings the incarnation has taken place and we have become participants in the divine nature and presumably heirs of the tendency towards goodness and at the same time subject to the inevitable self-punishment.
As Job was not a mere spectator of divine unconsciousness but fell a victim to this momentous manifestation, in the case of incarnation we also become involved in the consequences of this transformation.
Inasmuch as God proves His goodness through self-sacrifice He is incarnated, but in view of His infinity and the presumably different stages of cosmic development we don't know of, how much of God-if this is not too human an argument-has been transformed?
In this case it can be expected that we are going to contact spheres of a not yet transformed God when our consciousness begins to extend into the sphere of the unconscious.
There is at all events a definite expectation of this kind expressed in the "Evangelium Aeternum" of the Revelations containing the message: Fear God!
Although the divine incarnation is a cosmic and absolute event, it only manifests empirically in those relatively few individuals capable of enough consciousness to make ethical decisions, i .e., to decide for the Good.
Therefore God can be called good only inasmuch as He is able to manifest His goodness in individuals.
His moral quality depends upon individuals.
That is why He incarnates.
Individuation and individual existence are indispensable for the transformation of God the Creator.
The knowledge of what is good is not given a priori; it needs discriminating consciousness.
That is already the problem in Genesis, where Adam and Eve have to be enlightened first in order to recognize the Good and discriminate it from Evil,
There is no such thing as the "Good" in general, because something that is definitely good can be as definitely evil in another case.
Individuals are different from each other, their values are different and their situations vary to such an extent that they cannot be judged by general values and principles.
For instance generosity is certainly a virtue, but it instantly becomes a vice when applied to an individual that misunderstands it.
In this case one needs conscious discrimination.
Your question concerning the relationship between the human being and an unconscious paradoxical God is indeed a major question,although we have th e most impressive paradigm of Old Testament piety that could deal with the divine antinomy.
The people of the Old Testament could address themselves to an unreliable God.
By very overt attempts at propitiation I mean in particular the repeated assertion and invocation of God's justice and this in the face of indisputable injustice.
They tried to avoid His wrath and to call forth His goodness.
It is quite obvious that the old Hebrew theologians were continuously tormented by the fear of Yahweh's unpredictable acts of injustice.
For the Christian mentality, brought up in the conviction of an essentially good God, the situation is much more difficult.
One cannot love and fear at the same time any more.
Our consciousness has become too differentiated for such contradictions.
We are therefore forced to take the fact of incarnation far more seriously than Hitherto.
We ought to remember that the Fathers of the Church have insisted upon the fact that God has given Himself to man's death on the Cross so that we may become gods.
The Deity has taken its abode in man with the obvious intention of realizing Its Good in man.
Thus we are the vessel or the children and the heirs of the Deity suffering in the body of the "slave."
We are now in a position to understand the essential point of view of our brethren the Hindus.
They are aware of the fact that the personal Atman is identical with the universal Atman and have evolved ways and means to express the psychological consequences of such a belief.
In this respect we have to learn something from them.

It saves us from spiritual pride when we humbly recognize that God can manifest Himself in many different ways.
Christianity has envisaged the religious problem as a sequence of dramatic events, whereas the East holds a thoroughly static view, i.e., a cyclic view.
The thought of evolution is Christian and-as I think-in a way a better truth to express the dynamic aspect of the Deity, although the eternal immovability also forms an important aspect of the Deity (in Aristotle and in the old scholastic philosophy).
The religious spirit of the West is characterized by a change of God's image in the course of ages.
Its history begins with the plurality of the Elohim, then it comes to the paradoxical Oneness and personality of Yahweh, then to the good Father of Christianity, followed by the second Person in the Trinity, Christ, i.e., God incarnated in man.
The allusion to the Holy Ghost is a third form appearing at the beginning of the second half of the Christian age (Gioacchino da Fiore), and finally we are confronted with the aspect revealed through the manifestations of the unconscious.
The significance of man is enhanced by the incarnation.
We have become participants of the divine life and we have to assume a new responsibility, viz. the continuation of the divine self-realization, which expresses itself in the task of our individuation.
Individuation does not only mean that man has become truly human as distinct from animal, but that he is to become partially divine as well.
This means practically that he becomes adult, responsible for his existence, knowing that he does not only depend on God but that God also depends on man.
Man's relation to God probably has to undergo a certain important change:Instead of the propitiating praise to an unpredictable king or the child's prayer to a loving father, the responsible living and fulfilling of the divine will in us will be our form of worship of and commerce with God.
His goodness means grace and light and His dark side the terrible temptation of power.
Man has already received so much knowledge that he can destroy his own planet.
Let us hope that God's good spirit will guide him in his decisions, because it will depend upon man's decision whether God's creation will continue.
Nothing shows more drastically than this possibility how much of divine power has come within the reach of man.
If anything of the above should not be clear to you, I am quite ready for further explanation.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 312-316.

Carl Jung: The disposition or instinctual ”pattern” is inherited, but not the idea itself. (2015-08-28 05:20)

To Lad is K. Kristof
Dear Herr Kristof, July 1956
Since, as you know, I am not a philosopher but an empiricist, my concept of the collective unconscious is not a philosophical but an empirical one.
I designate by this term all our experiences of ”behaviour patterns” in so far as these support or cause the formation of certain ideas.
By the latter I mean mythic ideas in the broadest sense of the word, such as can be observed in mythology and folklore as well as in the dreams, visions, and fantasies of normal and psychically ill persons.
The existence and spontaneous emergence of such ideas independently of tradition and migration permit the inference that there is a universal psychic disposition, an instinct, which causes the formation of typical ideas.
The disposition or instinctual ”pattern” is inherited, but not the idea itself. This consists of recent, individually acquired elements.
While the inference of a universal psychic disposition of this kind is sufficiently assured by experience, I feel less certain when it comes to the question of hereditary ”ramifications,” i.e., specific differentiations conditioned by locality or race.
It seems to me altogether possible and even probable that such differentiations really do exist (like the wingless insects of the Galapagos Islands) regardless of theoretical prejudices.
But as yet I have found no certain proofs.
In order to decide this question, one would have to undertake very extensive researches which would far exceed my capacities.
I therefore regret that I can give you no clear answer on this point.
The problem of the relation of a people or culture with the collective unconscious has nothing to do with the question of its nature or with its differentiation.

I have had ample opportunity to convince myself that the Indians and Chinese have just as little relation to the collective unconscious as Europeans.
You find a better relation only among primitives.
The development of consciousness proceeds at the cost of the relation to the unconscious.
Primitives have evolved a number of techniques for making it conscious and in [Eastern] cultures these have reached a high degree of differentiation.
In our highly developed modern cultures these techniques are dying out and the question of the relation to the collective unconscious is becoming obsolete.
It is only modern psychology that has taken up the problem again.
It should be added that the religions, so long as they are alive, have never ceased to foster the relation to the unconscious in one form or another.
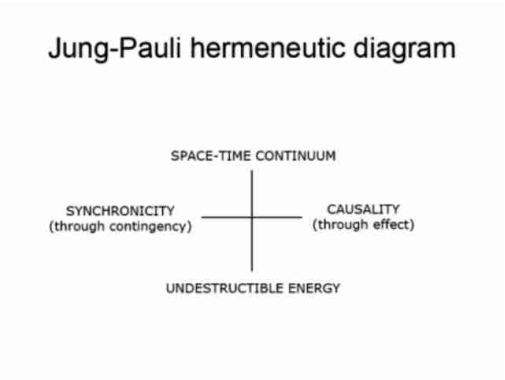
Yours Sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 319-320.

Carl Jung on Astrology and Synchronicity (2015-08-28 05:35)



To Enrique Butelman
Dear Sir, July 1956
Concerning the Spanish translation of my book Naturerkliirung und Psyche I should advise you to make use of the English version.
In comparison with the original German text there are quite a number of improvements in the English, which I think should be considered in the Spanish edition.
I think also that the appendix added by the English editors should form part of your edition.
I am very interested in the fact that you have taken up the subject of synchronicity.
My ideas in this respect seem to be highly incomprehensible, to judge from the reactions I got.
People seem to be incapable of following my conclusions
It seems that they are particularly shocked by my using astrological statistics and that I believe that nothing is explained by the words telepathy, precognition, etc . . . . Physicists are even unable to accept the fact that the term statistics presupposes the existence of exceptions to the rule, as really existent as their averages.
Causality as a statistical truth presupposes the existence of acausality, otherwise it cannot be a statistical truth.
In other words, the exceptions to causality are real facts which I try to envisage from the standpoint of their meaningful coincidence or synchronicity.

As a rule the improbability of a series of meaningful coincidences (i.e., of identical meaning) Increases with the number of its individual occurrences.
The question now is, where to find such a series.
Astrology is for the reasons indicated in my book-not a safe field for investigation.
Rhine's chance method has yielded the best results yet, but it remains sterile in view of a point of special interest.
It concerns the question: what is the psychological condition in which a synchronistic phenomenon may be expected?
Rhine's results have already shown that the test-person's lively interest is of paramount importance.
When it slackens by the test-person getting accustomed the results quickly deteriorate.
A certain affective condition seems to be indispensable.
One has therefore to look for emotional conditions.
We are actually investigating accidents, i.e., fractures with their preceding dreams and the corresponding results of other chance-methods of mediaeval origin as f.i. geomantics, horoscopy, playing cards, etc.
We have some encouraging results.
Owing to the traditional psychological nature of the said methods they permit a certain insight into the underlying unconscious constellations and their archetypal structure.
I have observed personally quite a number of synchronistic events where I could establish the nature of the underlying archetype.
The archetype itself (nota bene not the archetypal representation!) is psychoid, i.e., transcendental and thus relatively beyond the categories of number, space, and time.
That means, it approximates to oneness and immutability.
Owing to the liberation from the categories of consciousness the archetype can be the basis of meaningful coincidence.
It is quite logical therefore that you are interested in the effect of mescalin and similar drugs belonging to the adrenalin group.
I am following up these investigations.
It is true that mescalin uncovers the unconscious to a great extent by removing the inhibitory influence of apperception and by replacing the latter through the normally latent syndromous associations.
Thus we see the painter of colours, the inventor of forms, the thinker of thoughts actually at work.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 317-319.

Carl Jung on the decline of traditional values in India and China. (2015-08-28 14:52)

To Adolf Keller
Dear friend, August 1956
My last letter was not meant to be a letter of farewell; it merely gave vent to my annoyance that you have failed to see how much I have struggled to understand the dogmatic conception of Christ psychologically.
Now as ever I am of the opinion that Protestant theologians would have every reason to take my views seriously, for otherwise the same thing could happen here as has already happened in China and will happen in India: that the traditional religious ideas die of literal-mindedness, or are spewed out en masse because of their indigestibility.
In China, for instance, a philosopher like Hu Shih is ashamed to know anything of the I Ching, the profound significance of Tao has got lost, and instead people worship locomotives and aeroplanes.
Nowadays there is only a handful of Protestant theologians who have the slightest idea of what psychology could mean for them.
With friendly greetings,
Carl Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 322.

Carl Jung on a man's choice of wives (2015-08-29 05:14)

To H. J. Barrett
Dear Mr. Barrett, 1956
Sorry to be so late with my answer, but as I beat you by ten years I am presumably ten times slower than you.
Your letter not only interested but also impressed me.
The choice of your wives was characteristic.
They were temporary incarnations of what I call your anima.
I don't know whether you are so far acquainted with my writings that you know about the female archetype each man carries in his unconscious.
The Middle Ages already knew about this peculiar psychic fact and said:o mnis vir feminam suam secum portat. ["Each man carries his woman with him."]
In practice it means that the woman of your choice represents your own task you did not understand.
There is a certain creative ability which apparently is not accompanied by a corresponding technical gift.
Such people are pretty frequent and cannot understand that the creative man has to create and make visible in spite of the fact that he cannot do it properly.
He may be a painter who cannot paint or a musician who cannot compose, Not even play the piano.
But he ought to do it nevertheless like the Jongleur de Notre Dame and ad maiorem Dei gloriam.
Your wives were "unfortunately" (for you) gifted enough to carry out what you should have done in an incompetent way, but you were too rational and also too intelligent to waste your time on an apparently thankless task.
But there has always been the creative urge in you-at peace as long as the marriage functioned, as it was taken care of then, but appearing all by itself in a useless explosive form, namely as knockings and raps and such things after the death of your second wife.

It then became urgent for you to realize the pressure of the unconscious and its desire to produce immediately with the humble means at your disposal.
Never mind the imperfections of technique; the contents wanting to come to light are the thing that matters.
How psychic energy can transform itself into physically sound phenomena is a problem in itself. I don't know how it is done. We only know that it is done.
This is the non-spiritualistic explanation which I prefer in such cases.
It has to my mind the great advantage of bringing the problem home to the living individual.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 321-322

Carl Jung on having a house and land of your own. (2015-08-29 05:25)

Anonymous
Dear N., August 1956
I was very pleased to hear that you now have house and land of your own.
This is important for the chthonic powers.
I hope you will find time to commit your plant counterparts to the earth and tend their growth, for the earth always wants children-houses, trees, flowers-to grow out of her and celebrate the marriage of the human psyche with the Great Mother, the best counter-magic against rootless extraversion!

With best regards to you and your dear husband,
Always your faithful

Carl Jung on “Perfect Individuation.” (2015-08-30 10:39)

To Henry A . Murray
Dear Dr. Murray, August 1956
Thank you ever so much for your kind letter. It is a great pleasure for me to hear of you after this long time.
I thank you also for your good birthday wishes.
My correspondence with Freud will not be published in the near future.
It must wait until I have left the premises for good.
I am very interested that you are lecturing about my psychology.
I am glad to know how successful you have been in delivering your Lectures.
It seems to be an awfully difficult subject which I did not realize at all while writing my books.
It is true that the Bollingen Press was reluctant concerning the publication of my Answer to Job.
They were afraid of its causing still more prejudice against and anger with my unconventional views.
This is another of my books that demands some careful thinking.
I have always wished to make the acquaintance of Prof. Tillich, but I have never found an opportunity.
Your questions concerning ”individuation” and ”individual” are highly philosophical and impressive.
It is perfectly true that I never described an ”individuated person” for the simple reason that nobody would understand why I describe such a case, and most of my readers would be bored to tears.

I am also not such a great poet that I could produce a really worthwhile picture.
A genius like Goethe or Shakespeare might hope to be able to describe the lordly beauty and the divine completeness of an individuated old oak-tree, or the unique grotesqueness of a cactus.
But if a scientist risked doing the same, nobody would understand or appreciate it.
Science is only concerned with the average idea of an oak or a horse or man but not with their uniqueness.
Moreover an individuated human being is well-nigh impossible to describe as we have no standpoint outside the human sphere.
Thus we don't know what man is.
We only can say that he is no animal, nor a plant, nor a crystal, but what he is is impossible to say.
We would need an intimate knowledge of the inhabitants of other planets, inasmuch as they can be compared with men, in order to enable us to form some idea of what man is.
From the standpoint of science the individual is negligible or a mere curiosity.
From the subjective standpoint, however, i.e., from the standpoint of the individual himself, the individual is all-important as he is the carrier of life, and his development and fulfillment are of paramount significance.
It is vital for each living being to become its own entelechia and to grow into that which it was from the very beginning.
This very vital and indispensable need of each living being means very little or nothing from a statistical standpoint, and nobody outside can be seriously interested in the fact that Mr. X is to become a good businessman or that Mrs. Y is to get six children.
The individuated human being is just ordinary and therefore almost invisible.
Necessarily all criteria of individuation are subjective and outside the purpose of science.
You ask: what feeling does he have and what values, thoughts, activities and relations to his surroundings?
Well, his feelings, thoughts, etc. are just anybody's feelings, thoughts, etc.-quite ordinary, as a matter of fact, and not interesting at all, unless you happen to be particularly interested in that individual and his welfare.
He will be all right if he can fulfill himself as he was from the beginning.
He will have no need to be exaggerated, hypocritical, neurotic, or any other nuisance.
He will be "in modest harmony with nature."
As Zen Buddhism says: first mountains are mountains and the sea is the sea.
Then mountains are no more mountains, the sea is no more the sea, and in the end the mountains will be the mountains and the sea will be the sea.
Nobody can have a vision and not be changed by it.
First he has no vision, and he is the man A, then he is himself plus a vision = the man B; and then it might be that the vision may influence his life, if he is not quite dull, and that is the man C.
No matter whether people think they are individuated or not, they are just what they are: in the one case a man plus an unconscious nuisance disturbing to himself-or, without it, unconscious of himself; or in the other case, conscious.
The criterion is consciousness.
The man with a neurosis who knows that he is neurotic is more individuated than the man without this consciousness.
The man who is a damned nuisance to his surroundings and knows it is more individuated than th e man who is blissfully unconscious of his nature, etc.
The scientific standpoint is good for many things.
In the case of individuation-though it has a certain auxiliary significance-in the deciding issue it means nothing at all .
If a man is contradicted by himself and does not know it, he is an illusionist, but if he knows that he contradicts himself, he is individuated.
According to Schopenhauer man's only divine quality is his humour.
If the Pope has humour, or if Albert Schweitzer knows that he ran away from the European problem, or Winston Churchill is aware of what an insupportable bully he can be, they are thus far individuated.
But surely nobody is particularly interested in this highly subjective finesse unless he is a psychologist, or somebody fed up with his unconsciousness.
Hoping you enjoy always good health I remain, with kind regards to Christiana,
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 322-325.

Carl Jung on the “Great Dream” of a Modern Man. (2015-08-30 17:22)

To Patrick Evans
Dear Mr. Evans, 1 September 1956
Thank you for telling me of your interesting dream.
The dream is quite remarkable in its simplicity.
It is what the primitives would call a ”great dream.”
Your attempt at an interpretation is not wrong, but it is a sort of sideline, though important in itself.
The essential dream-image: the Man, the Tree, the Stone, looks quite inaccessible, but only to our modern consciousness which is, as a rule, unconscious of its historical roots.
The first thing I would do in such a case is the following: I would try to establish the relationship of the symbolism to its historical antecedents, namely to the identical ideas that have played a role in the immediate or the remote past.
Take the first item: the Man.
The Man leads you straight to the Bible.
There the Man is Adam, then there is the ”Son of Man” who is Christ.
Then you have the idea of the Primordial Man as it appears in the Kabbalah: Adam Kadmon, and the figure of the Anthropos who is described by Ezekiel, Daniel and in the Book of Enoch.

7292

This idea of the Man played a considerable role during the whole of the Middle Ages as far as the 18th century in alchemical philosophy.
The same is true of the two other items: the Tree and the Stone.
The Stone is still alive in Freemasonry.
For more information I should advise you to study my book Psychology and Alchemy, where you can find any amount of material for your three symbols.
I also have devoted a special study to the Tree-symbol but it has not appeared in English yet.
The interesting fact is that quite independently of tradition these symbols are reproduced in dreams of many modern individuals.
They are expressions of latent archetypes inherited from time immemorial.
It is the most characteristic quality of the archetype that it is numinous, i.e., it has a sort of emotional charge that seizes consciousness whenever an archetypal image or situation occurs.
That explains the rather unusual impression the dream made upon you.
The Man means Man as he has been in the beginning and / or as he should be in the future, the complete or total Man.
The Tree expresses development, growth from the hidden roots.
The evolution towards totality.
The Stone means, particularly in the form of the Philosophers Stone, the attainment of totality and immutability for which the Stone is a very apt symbol.
As Adam, according to certain traditions, was created in the form of a lifeless statue, so the second Adam, i.e., the total Man, will become a stone, yet alive, as is said in the New Testament: transmutemini in vivos lapides.
The three symbols of your dream form the heads of columns like titles, suggesting that the empty columns have yet to be filled out by contents.
The general theme is clear.
It can be formulated as the following questions: what is Man? what is the way of his development? what is his goal?
The psychology of the unconscious has much to say in the way of answers.
My book Psychology and Alchemy or my little essay ”Psychology and Religion” can give you hints in that direction.
You are quite right in assuming that these questions have somehow to do with mathematics, i.e., the theory of numbers, but in the first place it will be the symbolism of numbers that has to be understood.
You are quite right in identifying the Man with 3, or the Stone With 5 , if you think of the latter as a quincunx and not as a series of numerical units.
The 4 as Tree means the unfolding of the One in 3, since the Man (Anthropos) is the visible manifestation of the original One, i.e., God.
The fact is that the numbers pre-existing in nature are presumably the most fundamental archetypes, being the very matrix of all others.
Here Pythagoras was certainly on the right track and we modern men have forgotten this aspect of the pre-existing numbers because we were only busy manipulating numbers for the sake of counting and calculating.
But Number is a factor pre-existent to man, with unforeseen qualities yet to be discovered by him.
Hoping this may shed some light on your dream,
I remain,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 325-327.

Carl Jung on the Unconscious and Properties of Whole Numbers (2015-08-30 17:36)

To Fritz Lerch
Dear Herr Lerch, 10 September 1956
Your question, concerns one of those problems that have intrigued me for years: the connection of the psychology of the unconscious with the properties of whole numbers on the one hand and the properties of matter on the other.
I first approached this knotty problem from the purely epistemological angle.
Here I must anticipate by saying that the term ”epistemological” has a Psychological flavour because I am obliged by my discipline to answer, or at least bear in mind, the question: What is happening psychologically if I either stop short at the epistemological barrier, or pronounce a transcendental judgment?
Here psychological reactions take place which the epistemologist has hardly considered until now, if at all.
The reason for this is that he does not know of the existence of an unconscious psyche.
If, therefore, my cognitive process comes to a stop at one point or another, this does not mean that the underlying psychological process has also stopped.
Experience shows that it continues regardless.
When the physicist, for instance, can form no picture of the structure of the atom from the data at hand, something suddenly flashes into his mind-a model, perhaps the planetary model-as a product of unconscious associative activity.
This flash or ”hunch” must be considered a psychic statement, which is ordinarily called intuition and is a common product of the external data and psychological apperception.
Wherever the inquiring mind comes up against a darkness in which objects are only dimly discernible, it fills the gap with previous experiences or, if these are lacking, with imaginative, that is with archetypal or mythic, material.

In the construction of physical theories you will therefore find the closest analogies with the psychology of the unconscious, since this too is up against the same difficulties.
Our psychic foundations are shrouded in such great and inchoate darkness that, as soon as you peer into it, it is instantly compensated by mythic forms.
When these compensations become too obvious, we naturally try to obviate them and replace them by ”logical” concepts.
But this is justified only when these concepts really do give adequate expression to what we have dimly discerned.
Generally they don’t.
Hence the borderline concepts in both sciences are partly mythological.
This would be a good reason for an epistemological-cum-psychological examination of their fundamental concepts.
Unfortunately I am not in a position to demonstrate, from the physical side, facts which have clearly discernible connections or analogies with the facts of psychology.
I can do this only from the psychological side.
Broadly speaking, atoms can be described as the elementary building blocks of physical nature.
Here we have a still very problematical analogy in the psychology of the unconscious, namely in mandala symbolism, expressed in medieval terms as the quadratura circuli.
The model for such configurations is based on the spontaneous self-representation of this archetype in pictorial form.
It is a mathematical structure, which first made me hit on the idea that the unconscious somehow avails itself of the properties of whole numbers.
In order to see my way more clearly, I tried to compile a list of the properties of whole numbers, beginning with the known, unquestionable mathematical properties.
From this it appears that whole numbers are individuals, and that they Possess properties which cannot be explained on the assumption that they are multiple units.
The idea that numbers were invented for counting is obviously untenable, since they are not only pre-existent to judgment but possess properties which were discovered only in the course of the centuries, and presumably possess a number of others which will be brought to light only by the future development of mathematics.
Like all the inner foundations of judgment, numbers are archetypal by nature and consequently partake of the psychic qualities of the archetype.
This, as we know, possesses a certain degree of autonomy which enables it to influence consciousness spontaneously.
The same must be said of numbers, which brings us back to Pythagoras.
When we are confronted with this dark aspect of numbers, the unconscious gives an answer, that is, it compensates their darkness by statements which I call ”indispensable” or ”inescapable.”
The number 1 says that it is one among many.
At the same time it says that it is ”the One.”
Hence it is the smallest and the greatest, the part and the whole.
I am only hinting at these statements; if you think through the first five numbers in this way you will come to the remarkable conclusion that we have here a sort of creation myth which is an integral part of the inalienable properties of whole numbers.
In this respect Number proves to be a fundamental element not only of physics but also of the objective psyche.
It would be a worthy task for a mathematician to collect all the known properties of numbers and also all their ”inescapable” statements- which should be quite possible up to 10-and in this way project a biological picture of whole numbers.
For the psychologist it is not so simple.
Apart from the above-mentioned question of epistemology, the possibilities open to him are still on the level of elementary experiences.
They can be formulated as follows: What are the psychic compensations when a task confronts us with darkness?
Here the necessary material on intuitions, visions, and dreams would first have to be collected.
I do not doubt that quite fundamental connections exist between physics and psychology, and that the objective psyche contains images that would elucidate the secret of matter.

These connections are discernible in synchronistic phenomena and their acausality.
Today these things are only pale phantoms and it remains for the future to collect, with much painstaking work, the experiences which could shed light on this darkness.
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung
P.S. I have just seen that Rob Oppenheimer has published an article in The American Psychologist (Vol. XI, 3, 1956) on the conceptual data in physics. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 327-329.

Carl Jung on Wotan and the Pied Piper (2015-08-31 08:06)

To Melvin J. Lasky
Dear Mr. Lasky, September 1956

Best thanks for sending me the three issues of Der Monat with James P. O'Donnell's article "Der Rattenfiinger von Hameln"and the replies by Hans Scholz and Dr. E. Schmitz-Cliever.
I have read them with great interest and can fully concur with the views of the latter two writers.
The historical facts reported by O'Donnell would never have sufficed to give rise to so strange and uncanny a legend.
In contributing-at your request-a few words to the discussion, I would like to lay stress on the reality around which the legend revolves.
H . Scholz has done this too, and rightly warned against over-looking it.
As a psychiatrist, I give due weight to the reality at work here: to a power emanating from the unconscious, the nature of which I discussed years ago in my essay "Wotan" an essay which is not always read with pleasure.
The psychic powers at whose mercy men found themselves were in former times called "gods," and this had the advantage of assuring them the necessary fear and devotion.
Wotan is a restless wanderer, an ancient god of storm and wind, unleashing passion and frenzy.
His name means literally "Lord and Maker of Fury."
Adam of Bremen wrote in 1070 or thereabouts: "Wodan id est furor."
His essence is ecstasy; he is a turbulent spirit, a tempest that sets everything in motion and causes "movements."
Among these were the orgiastic midsummer's day dances mentioned by Dr. Schmitz-Cliever; the religious movements of the Middle Ages named by H. Scholz also bore the mark of this perturbing spirit.
The exodus of the children from Hamelin comes into this category.
It should be noted that music is a primitive means of putting people into a state of frenzy; one has only to think of the drumming at the dances of shamans and medicine-men, or of the flute-playing at the Dionysian orgies.
Leibniz mentioned St. Vitus's dance as a possible cause of the events at Hamelin.
In this connection I would like to draw attention to a related, though far more dangerous, manifestation of collective frenzy upon which Wotan has likewise left his mark.
This is the "going berserk" of Wotan's followers, a regular seizure that drove them to madness and gave them supernatural strength.
Not only single individuals were seized in this way, but whole crowds were swept along and infected with the "berserker rage."
It was a mass frenzy, to which other people gave the expressive name furor Teutonicus.
The exodus of the children from Hamelin may be conceived as a less brutal movement activated by the same "ecstatic" spirit.
The rat-catching Pied Piper himself must have been possessed by the spirit of Wotan, which swept all those who were liable to such transports-in this case children-into a state of collective frenzy.
As to the disappearance of the children in the mountain, it should be remembered that legends often banish into a mountain certain heroes in whose death the populace cannot or will not believe, and whose return is expected, with fear or hope, in the distant future.
For the psychologist this is an apt way of saying that though the forces represented by the banished and vanished children have momentarily disappeared from consciousness, they are still very much alive in the unconscious.
The unconscious is perfectly symbolized by the dark, unknown interior of the mountain.
It scarcely needs mentioning that a reawakening of these forces has actually taken place.
Another aspect of this disappearance is the state of "being lost to the world" which is frequently reported in connection with ecstasy and more particularly with "going berserk."
According to legend, the hero becomes invisible or is transported to another place, or occasionally his double appears, as when he is seen in battle, while in reality he is sunk in trance-like slumber.
That reports like these may have to do with parapsychological phenomena should not be dismissed out of hand, for such phenomena are associated to a great extent with highly emotional states.
But as yet there is no possibility of a scientific explanation.
From a psychological point of view the motif of the rats, which seems to have been added afterwards, is an indication of Wotan's connection with the daemonic and chthonic realm, and with evil.
Wotan was banished by Christianity to the realm of the devil, or identified with him, and the devil is the Lord of rats and flies.

The story of the Pied Piper, as well as the medieval movements mentioned by H. Scholz and Dr. Schmitz-Cliever, are symptoms of a pagan spirit working in the unconscious and not yet domesticated by Christianity.
There are other such symptoms, of a more pacific nature -alchemy is one of them-which I have investigated at considerable length in my writings.
This spirit the more readily takes possession of our consciousness the less our consciousness is willing to reflect upon its origins and roots.
With kind regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 330-332.

Carl Jung not a member of a "Fantastical Organization." (2015-08-31 08:50)

Dear Sir, 10 October 1956
I don't know where you picked up this rather childish yarn about directors of world affairs located in Tibetan lamaseries.
It would be a difficult task if anybody should venture to ask you for the slightest evidence in this respect.
At all events I can tell you that I am not a member of such a wholly fantastical organization.
I have not even heard of its existence, and I would not be foolish enough to believe in it even if a dozen theosophical societies declared their faith in such an obvious swindle.
Have you ever seen even one true Tibetan rimpoche?
I have, and even one that has studied for 20 years in Lhasa.

They know many interesting things, but they are miles from where we in the Western world think they are.
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung: If the Reformation is a heresy, I am certainly a heretic too. (2015-08-31 09:40)

To the Rev. H. L. Philp
Dear Mr. Philp, 26 October 1956
Thank you very much for calling my attention to this new concoction Christian Essays in Psychiatry.
The idea that I convert people, as it were, to the new denomination ”Jungianism” or better ”Jungian Church” is sheer defamation.
I know a considerable number of people that have converted to the Catholic Church after they were analysed by myself.
A smaller number of Catholics that had become indifferent to the Church before felt completely out of it and adopted the standpoint more or less similar to mine, which I regard as a sort of left-wing Protestantism.
I am definitely inside Christianity and, as far as I am capable of judging about myself, on the direct line of historical development.
If the Pope adds a new and thoroughly unhistorical dogma to Catholicism, I add a symbolic interpretation of all Christian symbols.

7300

At least I am trying to.
If the Reformation is a heresy, I am certainly a heretic too.
There is nothing to be done about it, as once it was a heresy even to suggest that the earth turns round the sun.
It is of course a thorn in the flesh of the churches that I do not belong to any of the recognized sects.
Looked at from a strictly Catholic point of view I make very heretical statements indeed; but there are plenty of reformers that have done the same thing, including the present Pope, declaring the dogma without the slightest apostolic authority and without the consent even of his own Church, which has emphatically resisted any such declaration during at least the 600 years of its early history.
The absolute number of conversions having taken place under my direct or indirect influence is insignificant in comparison with that of the people returning to their original faith, including Parsees returning to their fire-temple, Jews appreciating again the deep significance of their own religion, Chinamen and Hindus understanding again the meaning of their forgotten Taoism and their religious philosophy.
These facts have even prompted my critics to accuse me of a particular lack of character and even of betrayal of my Christian faith.
They all want me therefore to confess my definite belief in certain metaphysical statements and complain bitterly that I do not comply with their wishes.
The trouble with them is that they don't want to think about their own beliefs.
Whereas I am insisting, with certain Fathers of the Church, that we ought to think about religious matters and that the way to the cognition of God begins with the cognition of oneself.
As nearly everybody does, they also want to circumvent this odious task of self-cognition.
But, I am afraid, we don't get anywhere by remaining blind in this respect.
I consider it downright immoral to shut one's eyes to the truth about oneself.
Thus far I am a Protestant in my soul and body, even if most of the Protestant theologians are just as childishly prejudiced as the Catholic priests.
I am busy dictating answers to your questions, but I am not yet Through.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 334-335.

Carl Jung on the Hungarian Revolution (2015-09-01 04:19)

To Jolande Jacobi
Dear Dr. Jacobi, 6 November 1956
In these terrible days when evil is once again inundating the world in every conceivable form, I want you to know that I am thinking of you and of your family in Hungary, and hope with you that the avenging angel will pass by their door.
The fate of Hungary cries to heaven, and in the West stupidity and delusion have reached a fatal climax.
De profundis clamavi ad te Domine-In affection,
Sincerely yours,

Carl Jung on Teuton Man (2015-09-01 04:30)

To Pere Bruno de Jesus-Marie
Dear Pere Bruno, 20 November 1956
I have thought over our conversation for a long time and have come to the conclusion that, just as it is the foremost task of the individual to become conscious of himself, it should also be the chiefest concern of a gathering of distinguished personalities to become conscious of their meaning within the greater society.
As I have intimated to you, the spiritual scope of your Academy embraces the whole North , from the North Cape to the Alps, that is to say all those countries which were only partly Romanized, or not at all, and therefore had only indirect or sporadic contacts with the entirely different Mediterranean culture.
In France there is a noticeable difference between the spiritually active North and the static life of the South , which it shares with Spain and Italy.
Southern Europe remained stationary for many centuries after an initial contact had been made between the peoples of the West and the then flourishing Islamic culture.
But when the West had assimilated the remnants of classical culture that were still kept alive by Islam, a state of spiritual coexistence set in, and there were no more contacts between Islam and Christianity.
Both cultures remained mutually isolated and cross-fertilization Ceased.
For the spiritually more mobile West, i.e. , the Latin culture of the northern Mediterranean countries, had now found a different antagonist-the Teuton.
Not cast in the Latin mould, he confronted the civilized Latin peoples with all the diversity of a barbaric, tribally oriented social order.
He brought with him a primitive tradition which had developed autochthonously within his tribes, presumably from the time of the Stone Age, and which despite the curiosity of the youthful barbarian never quite succumbed to the influence of Latin culture.
Mediterranean culture is founded on a three- to four-thousand-year-old rule of order, both political and religious, which had long outgrown the locally conditioned, semi-barbarian forms of society.

Thus the ”esprit latin” has secure foundations guaranteeing a relatively problematical state of consciousness.
The Teutonic man of the North, on the contrary, is driven around by the adventurous nomadic restlessness of those who have their roots in a different soil from the one they want to live on.
Whether he will or no, there is a continual conflict in him over his foundations.
He is always seeking his own, for what he usurped some 1500 years ago as a binding form of life would not harmonize with what he brought with him as a usurper.
His polydaemonism had not yet reached the level and clarity of Mediterranean polytheism, and in this state he was suddenly confronted with a religion and view of the world that had sprung from the decay of Olympus and the transformation of the gods into philosophical and theological ideas.
His still undifferentiated barbarian world, bursting with the vital seeds of possible future developments, sank down reviled but not explained.
No bridge led from one to the other.
Here, it seems to me, is the source of that Teutonic turmoil which has more than once violently forced its way to the surface.
Here is that tension of opposites which supplies the energy for physical and spiritual adventures.
This is the man who, driven by his inner conflicts, was actually the first to discover the earth and take possession of it.
At this centre of antagonistic forces lies your Academy, under whose auspices are united the most important representatives of Northern culture.
It seems to me that its most urgent task is to create a differentiated consciousness of this state of affairs and to publicize it.
It would be rendering Western man a service of which he stands in the most urgent need at present-a knowledge of himself as he actually is, and who is the cause of the tremendous spiritual confusion of our time.
As soon as I can I will send you a copy of my ”Present and Future” as a further illustration of my point of view.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 336-338.

Carl Jung on Sleep and Dream (2015-09-01 04:37)

To H. J. Barrett
Dear Mr. Barrett, 27 December 1956
Thank you for your interesting letter. It is indeed an important question, the question of sleep and dream.
As far as my knowledge goes we are aware in dreams of our other life that consists in the first place of all the things we have not yet lived or experienced in the flesh.
Beyond that material we are also aware of things we never can realize in the flesh and not in this life.
Things belonging to the past of mankind and presumably to its future also.
The latter can be realized only very rarely as future events, because we have no means, or very few, to recognize and identify future events before they have happened, as we also cannot understand thoughts we never had before.
All the things which are not yet realized in our daylight experience are in a peculiar state, namely in the condition of living and autonomous figures, sometimes as if spirits of the dead, sometimes as if former incarnations.
These formulations are probably auxiliary means supplied by our unconscious mind to express forms of psychic existence we do not really understand.

I am sorry my time does not allow me to comment in detail about your experiences.
I hope my general observations will help you to a certain extent.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 341

Carl Jung: I am concerned with the world as it is today,namely godless and spiritually disoriented.
(2015-09-01 12:38)

Anonymous
Dear Mrs. N., 8 February 1957
Thank you very much for your friendly letter with its kind advice.
You can rest assured that having studied the Gospels for a life-time
(I am nearly 83!)
I am pretty well acquainted with the foundations of our Christianity.

Surely the times of primitive Christianity were bad too, but not as bad as the world is now.
Our plight is decidedly worse, and we have to learn about things the old Fathers of the Church did not even dream of.
I am concerned with the world as it is today, namely godless and spiritually disoriented.
In history there is never a way back.
To be optimistic would mean to pull the wool over the eyes of the world.
This would lead nowhere as it would confirm the childishness of people still more.
They should realize in our days how much depends upon themselves and to what purpose they have been created.
When you are still on the battlefield you cannot think of the good things that may come afterwards.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 346.

Carl Jung on God and a God-Image (2015-09-01 12:49)

Anonymous
Dear Dr. N., 2 January 1957
Many thanks for your detailed letter, the contents of which interested me very much.
I was impressed above all by the fact that in the discussion between you and Frau X there is constant talk of ”God” and of what he does or what he is.
I miss any explicit recognition of the epistemological threshold.
We cannot speak of ”God” but only of a God-image which appears to us or which we make.
If, for instance, we were to create a myth, we would say that ”God” has two aspects, spiritual and chthonic, or rather: material.
He appears to us as the world-moving spirit (= wind) and as the material of the world.
That is the image we create for ourselves of the prima causa.
But in reality we can say nothing at all about ”God.”

We can only project a conception of him that corresponds to our own constitution: a body perceived by the senses and a spirit (= psyche) directly conscious of itself.
After this model we build our God-image.
Coming now to cosmogony, we can assert nothing except that the body of the world and its psyche are a reflection of the God we imagine.
The split in this image is an unavoidable trick of consciousness for making us aware of anything at all.
But we cannot assert that this split actually exists in the objective world.
Rather, we have every reason to suppose that there is only one world, where matter and psyche are the same thing, which we discriminate for the purpose of cognition.
As regards the Incarnation, the idea of God's descent into human nature is a true mythologem.
What we can experience empirically as underlying this image is the individuation process, which gives us clear intimations of a greater "Man" than our ego.
The unconscious itself characterizes this "Man" with the same symbols it applies to God, from which we can conclude that this figure corresponds to the Anthropos, in other words God's son, or God represented in the form of a man.
The greater "Man" (the self) does not become identical with the empirical man in such wise that the ego is replaced by the self.
The self becomes only a determining factor, and it is not bounded by its apparent entry into consciousness; in spite of this it remains an ideal, i.e., purely imagined, entity dwelling essentially in the background, just as we also imagine God existing in his original boundless totality in spite of the Creation and Incarnation.
So far as the integration of personality components are concerned, it must be borne in mind that the ego-personality as such does not include the archetypes but is only influenced by them; for the archetypes are universal and belong to the collective psyche over which the ego has no control.
Thus animus and anima are images representing archetypal figures which mediate between consciousness and the unconscious.
Though they can be made conscious they cannot be integrated into the ego-personality, since as archetypes they are also autonomous.
They behave like the God-image, which while objectivating itself in the world nevertheless subsists of itself in the Unus Mundus.
These are problems that cannot be discussed at all if epistemology is disregarded.
They can be tackled only if you are constantly aware of epistemological criticism, in other words, if you do not forget that absolute reality can be conceived only in psychological terms.
At the same time the psyche, or rather consciousness, introduces the prerequisites for cognition into the picture-the discrimination of particulars or qualities which are not necessarily separated in the self-subsistent world.
We distinguish an organic and an inorganic world, for example.
The one is alive, the other is dead; the one has psyche, the other not.
But who can guarantee that the same vital principle which is at work in the organic body is not active in the crystal?
It seems to me that due regard for the epistemological standpoint would make discussions with Frau X considerably easier.
With best greetings,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Intuition and Intuitives. Anthology (2015-09-02 04:34)

As a natural scientist, thinking and sensation were uppermost in me and intuition and feeling were in the unconscious and contaminated by the collective unconscious. Carl Jung, Analytical Psychology: Notes of the Seminar Given in 1925, Page 69.

I most certainly was characterized by thinking … and I had a great deal of Intuition, too. And I had a definite difficulty with Feeling. And my relation to reality was not particularly brilliant. … I was often at variance with the reality of things. Now that gives you all the necessary data for diagnosis. Carl Jung, C.G. Jung, Speaking, Pages 435-6.

We can never reach the level of our intuitions and should therefore not identify ourselves with them. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 114.

We should not rise above the earth with the aid of ”spiritual” intuitions and run away from hard reality, as so often happens with people who have brilliant intuitions. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 114.

In the light of the possibilities revealed by intuition, man’s earthliness is certainly a lamentable imperfection; but this very imperfection is part of his innate being, of his reality. Carl Jung, Psychology and Alchemy, Page 114.

Half of the psychogenetic diseases occur where it is a matter of too much intuition, because intuition has this peculiar quality of taking people out of their ordinary reality. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 808.

The angels are a strange genus: they are precisely what they are and cannot be anything else. They are in themselves soulless beings who represent nothing but the thoughts and intuitions of their Lord. Carl Jung, Memories Dreams and Reflections, Pages 327-328.

Abstraction is an activity pertaining to the psychological functions in general. There is an abstract thinking, just as there is abstract feeling, sensation, and intuition. Abstract thinking singles out the rational, logical qualities of a given content from its intellectually irrelevant components. Abstract feeling does the same with a content characterized by its feeling-values . . . . Abstract sensation would be aesthetic as opposed to sensuous sensation, and abstract intuition would be symbolic as opposed to fantastic intuition. Carl Jung; ”Definitions,” CW 6, par. 678.

I have always advised analysts: ”Have a father confessor, or a mother confessor!” Women are particularly gifted for playing such a part. They often have excellent intuition and critical insight, and can see what men have up their sleeves, at times see also into men’s anima intrigues. They see aspects that the man does not see. That is why no woman has ever been convinced that her husband is a superman! Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Page 134.

The capacity for directed thinking I call intellect; the capacity for passive or undirected thinking I call intellectual intuition. Carl Jung; “Definitions” Ibid. par. 832.

Our dreams are continually saying things beyond our conscious comprehension. We have intimations and intuitions from unknown sources. Fears, moods, plans, and hopes come to us with no visible causation. These concrete experiences are at the bottom of our feeling that we know ourselves very little; at the bottom, too, of the painful conjecture that we might have surprises in store for ourselves. Carl Jung; Aion; CW 9i para. 299.

Intuition [is] perception via the unconscious. Carl Jung; ”The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious”, 1950.

My psychological experience has shown time and again that certain contents issue from a psyche that is more complete than consciousness. They often contain a superior analysis or insight or knowledge which consciousness has not been able to produce. We have a suitable word for such occurrences-intuition.. Carl Jung; Psychology and Religion; Page 49.

Neurosis is an inner cleavage-the state of being at war with one- self. ... What drives people to war with themselves is the intuition or the knowledge that they consist of two persons in opposition to one another. Carl Jung; Modern Man in Search of a Soul

When Freud coined the phrase that the ego was ”the true seat of anxiety,” he was giving voice to a very true and profound intuition. Carl Jung, Psychological, CW 11, Page 849.

As you know I call intuition any kind of perception which takes place in a way that cannot be explained by the function of the senses. Carl Jung, Letters Volume 1, Pages 420-422.

One source is the unconscious, which spontaneously produces such fantasies; the other source is life, which, if lived with complete devotion, brings an intuition of the self, the individual being. Carl Jung, Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 99

This serpent does not represent ”reason” or anything approaching it, but rather symbolises a peculiar autonomous mind which can possess one completely, a spirit of revelation which gives us ”Intuitionen” (intuitions). Carl Jung, ETH, Alchemy, Page 215.

In the West we are always using our intuition on outward things, but the East turns their Sangskara-skandha inwards. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 13Jan1939, Page 56.

We can understand thinking, feeling and sensation but intuition is another thing. We do not know how we arrive at an intuition, it is perception by way of the unconscious. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture 3Mar1939, Page 99.

The history of energetics is largely intuitive, it starts primitively as intuitions of archetypes, first they were beings, now they are mathematical formulas. Carl Jung, Lecture III, 4May1934, Page 100.

Without knowing it man is always concerned with God. What some people call instinct or intuition is nothing other than God. God is that voice inside us which tells us what to do and what not to do. In other words, our conscience. Carl Jung, C.G. Jung Speaking, Page 249.

Intuition is not mere perception, or vision, but an active, creative process that puts into the object just as much as it takes out. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 610.

Nobody has ever been entirely liberated from the opposites, because no living being could possibly attain to such a state, as nobody escapes pain and pleasure as long as he functions physiologically. He may have occasional ecstatic experiences when he gets the intuition of a complete liberation, f.i. in reaching the state of sat-chit-ananda. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 303.

Intuitives don’t have substance; they have inventiveness, imagination. They don’t complete anything. It is necessary for them to acquire this faculty. C. G. Jung, Emma Jung and Toni Wolff - A Collection of Remembrances; Pages 51-70.

many animals also have this last power. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 100.
Therefore intuitives develop all sorts of physical trouble, intestinal disturbances for instance, ulcers of the stomach or other really grave physical troubles. Because they overleap the body, it reacts against them. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Pages 1391-1392.
Why is psychology the youngest of the empirical sciences? Why have we not long since discovered the unconscious and raised up its treasure-house of eternal images? Simply because we had a religious formula for everything psychic — and one that is far more beautiful and comprehensive than immediate experience. Though the Christian view of the world has paled for many people, the symbolic treasure-rooms of the East are still full of marvels that can nourish for a long time to come the passion for show and new clothes. What is more, these images — are they Christian or Buddhist or what you will — are lovely, mysterious, and richly intuitive. Carl Jung; The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious; Pages 7-8.
What he is describing here is the libido, which is not only creative and procreative, but possesses an intuitive faculty, a strange power to "smell the right place," almost as if it were a live creature with an independent life of its own (which is why it is so easily personified). It is purposive, like sexuality itself, a favorite object of comparison. Carl Jung; CW 5; Symbols of Transformation; para. 182.
While studying astrology I have applied it to concrete cases many times. ... The experiment is most suggestive to a versatile mind, unreliable in the hands of the unimaginative, and dangerous in the hands of a fool, as those intuitive methods always are. . . . Carl Jung: “The archetypes have a life of their own…” (2015-09-02 05:17)

To Karl Schmid
Dear Professor Schmid, 26 January 1957
Sincerest thanks for kindly sending me your rectoral address, Neuere Aspekte der Geistesgeschichte.
I had already got some idea of its content from the report in the Neue Zurcher Zeitung, but I missed the essential details.
The complete copy of your address has now filled in all the gaps and confirmed my first impression of the very understanding way in which you have treated the social and spiritual implications of my basically medical and empirical work.
I found your differential definition of the historical and psychological approach most illuminating, and I can only agree with what you say.

I must add, however, that this applies only to a psychology which is still exclusively concerned with culture-promoting personalities and is therefore restricted to the sphere of individual phenomena.
This is an aspect of psychology which affords us the greatest insight and is at the same time the unavoidable path leading down to the deeper levels from which those biological masterpieces we call personalities are produced.
At these greater depths more general laws become discernible and more comprehensive figures stand out which eliminate the divisive factor of individual development and give psychology a homogeneity or inner coherence which raises it to the rank of a biological science.
By these deeper levels I mean the determining archetypes which are supraordinate to, or underlie, individual development and presumably are responsible for the supreme meaning of individual life.
Seen from this level, not only is psychological experience a continuum, but the psychological approach also enables us to gain some knowledge of the inner connection between historical events
The archetypes have a life of their own which extends through the centuries and gives the aeons their peculiar stamp.
Perhaps I may draw your attention to my historical contribution in Aion, where I have attempted to outline the evolutionary history of the Anthropos, which begins with the earliest Egyptian records.
The material I have presented there may serve to illustrate these remarks of mine.
May I take this opportunity to express the modest wish to make your personal acquaintance?
I would very much like to discuss these far-reaching questions with you sometime.
Thanking you again,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on Sigmund Freud's Psychological Type. (2015-09-02 05:28)

To Ernst Hanhart
Dear Colleague, 18 February 1957
Very many thanks for kindly sending me your offprint, which I have read with great interest.
The fate of children born of incest was most interesting and instructive.
With regard to your questions, I much regret that I am no longer in a position to see you personally.
Your letter arrived at the moment of my departure.
The question of the identity of psychological and physiological types is a complicated one.
Kretschmer's type are based primarily on somatic criteria.
My typology is based exclusively on psychological premises which can hardly coincide with physiological or somatic qualities.
Somatic characteristics are permanent and virtually unalterable facts, whereas psychological ones are subject to various alterations in the course of personality development and also to neurotic disturbances.
Even though assignment to a particular type may in certain cases have lifelong validity, in other very frequent cases it is so dependent on so many external and internal factors that the diagnosis is valid only for certain periods of time.
Freud was just such a case.
On the basis of an accurate knowledge of his character, I consider him to have been originally an introverted feeling type with inferior thinking.
When I got to know him in 1907 this original type was already neurotically blurred.
In observing a neurotic, one does not know at first whether one is observing the conscious or the unconscious character.
Freud, then as later, presented the picture of an extraverted thinker and empiricist.
His overvaluation of thinking coupled with his irresponsible manner of observation aroused my doubts as to his type.
The subjective overvaluation of his thinking is illustrated by his dictum: "This must be correct because I have thought it."
His irresponsible manner of observation is demonstrated by the fact, for instance, that not one of his cases of "traumatic" hysteria was verified.
He relied on the veracity of his hysterical patients.
When I analysed Freud a bit further in 1909 on account of a neurotic symptom, I discovered traces which led me to infer a marked injury to his feeling life.
Experience shows that at such moments a feeling type switches over to thinking as the counterfunction, together with the compensatory overvaluation.
The original auxiliary function -in this case intuition-is replaced by a somewhat deficient "function du reel ."
This transformation has been described by the French as "simulation dans la charactere."
Freud, when one got to know him better, was distinguished by a markedly differentiated feeling function.
His "sense of values" showed itself in his love of precious stones, jade, malachite, etc.
He also had considerable intuition.
Yet the superficial picture he presented to the world was that of an extraverted thinker and empiricist who derived his philosophy of life from the man in the street, which is supposed to be modern.
This mutability of the psychological type makes the question of its relation to the somatic type an extremely complicated problem.
And when we take the results of personality development into account, the crude features of introversion and extraversion are also reversed.
The case of a man of 36 with a cardiac neurosis may serve as an example.
He was an obviously extraverted type, and his wife was introverted to a pathological degree.
They got a divorce.
He then married an extremely extraverted woman, lost his cardiac neurosis, and became a typical introvert with the feeling that this was his true nature.
He was a successful businessman who from humble beginnings had worked his way to the top.

His originally introverted disposition was kept under by his hard struggle and energetic will, but had to be married in the form of an introverted wife and paid for with a cardiac neurosis.
I hope these few hints will show you why I regard the identity of somatic and psychological types, if not exactly as a question of incommensurables, then at least as a problem that at present remains completely unsolved.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on "Dali's Genius." (2015-09-02 05:38)

To Frances G. Wickes

Dear Mrs. Wickes, 14 December 1956
I am sorry to hear that you have been laid up for a long time.
Age is indeed a pleasure with a double face.
The decreasing of physical forces is a problem one is not quite adjusted to, and one only painfully learns to settle down to an ever-increasing restriction.
I got the picture you sent me and I thank you very much for it.
It is indeed very interesting and not at all orthodox, since the figure of the Anthropos is rising from the water and the earth and denotes its corporeality by the definitely fleshly aspect of the upper part of the body.
It is also noteworthy that the head is cut off by the frame.
Thus the emphasis is on the body.
It is, though, quite understandable as the spiritus Mercurialis, the Anthropos of the alchemists.
This spirit adds the chthonic reality of the creation to a purely spiritual conception in a way that would shake the very foundations of our medieval Christianity if people only would think about what they do.
The picture could have been painted by someone who knew about the secret developments in our unconscious mind in the last 1000 years.
Dali's genius translates the spiritual background of the concrete symbol of transmutation into visibility.
This also explains the somewhat shocking and unorthodox representation of Christ as the blond Hero Thank you very much for sending me this tell-tale picture.
It is quite on the line.
Hoping your condition, whatever it is, will improve and that you will enjoy better health in the coming New Year, I remain,
Yours cordially,
C.G. Jung
P.S. I a m reasonably well and I complain only of the increasing unreliability of my memory. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 338-341

Carl Jung on “Tao” Anthology (2015-09-02 14:02)

Only in this spiritual centre is there any possibility of salvation. The concept of the centre was called by the Chinese Tao, which the Jesuits in their day translated as Deus. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 470-471.
Taoist meditation is mainly concerned with the curious transformations of Yang and Yin. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Page 43.
The ”Processing” is the alchemistic procedure; this, Taoism and the Book of Changes are all the same thing, according to Wei Po-Yang. Carl Jung, ETH, Lecture XIII, Page 109.
Confucianism was the recognised state religion in China, it subordinates the interests of the individual to those of the state, whereas Taoism is essentially a religion for the individual. Carl Jung, ETH, Page 142.
The central idea of Taoism is no moral question, but is the Tao, the indefinable essence of the right way, and this is also the mystery of alchemy. Carl Jung, ETH, Page 142.
The goal of alchemy is not merely material, it is partly in ”the Beyond”, and is almost exactly similar to the goal of Taoism, where the whole effort is directed towards finding or creating Tao. Carl Jung, ETH, Page 143.
’The subtlest secret of the Tao is human nature and life.’ Hui Ming Ching, Cited Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 94.
According to the Hui Ming Ching, the ancient sages knew how to bridge the gap between consciousness and life because they cultivated both. In this way the shelf, the immortal body, is ’melted out’, and in this way ’the great Tao is completed'. Carl Jung, Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 95.

Without doubt, also, the realization of the opposite hidden in the unconscious, i.e. the 'reversal', signifies reunion with the unconscious laws of being, and the purpose of this reunion is the attainment of conscious life or, expressed in Chinese terms, the bringing about of the Tao. Carl Jung, Secret of the Golden Flower, Pages 95-96.

Hun [Animus], then, would be the discriminating light of consciousness and of reason in man, originally coming from the logos spermatikos of hsing, and returning after death through shen to the Tao. Carl Jung, Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 116.

Eternal is the Golden Flower only, which grows out of inner liberation from all bondage to things. A man who reaches this stage transposes his ego; he is no longer limited to the monad, but penetrates the magic circle of the polar duality of all phenomena and returns to the undivided One, Tao. Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 18.

In Buddhism, this return to Nirvana is connected with a complete annihilation of the ego, which, like the world, is only illusion...In Taoism, on the other hand, the goal is to preserve in a transfigured form, the idea of the person, the "traces" left by experience. Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 18.

A man who holds to the way of conservation all through life may reach the stage of the "Golden Flower" which then frees the ego from the conflict of the opposites, and it again becomes part of Tao, the undivided, Great One. The Secret of the Golden Flower, Page 73.

Taoism degenerated terribly but has lately undergone a renaissance while Confucianism is at present degenerating. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture III, 17May 1935, Pages 209.

Taoism has also a kind of Yoga but it is less well known than the Indian. The Chinese Yoga is very much less founded on dogma, the Yogin is left to find his own way through his difficult experiences. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture III, 17May 1935, Pages 209.

As the Chinese would say, the archetype is only the name of Tao, not Tao itself. Just as the Jesuits translated Tao as "God," so we can describe the "emptiness" of the center as "god." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 258-259.

The third degree of [Alchemical] conjunction is universal: it is relation or identity of the personal with the supra-personal atman, and of the individual tao with the universal tao. . . . Carl Jung, CW 14, Para 762.

Only my intellect has anything to do with purusha-atman or Tao, but not my living thralldom. This is local, barbaric, infantile, and abysmally unscientific. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 32-35.

As the Chinese would say, the archetype is only the name of Tao, not Tao itself. Just as the Jesuits translated Tao as "God," so we can describe the "emptiness" of the centre as "God." Emptiness in this sense doesn't mean "absence" or "vacancy," but something unknowable which is endowed with the highest intensity. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 257-264.

In China, for instance, a philosopher like Hu Shih is ashamed to know anything of the I Ching, the profound significance of Tao has got lost, and instead people worship locomotives and aeroplanes. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 322.

Dr. Jung on Freud and Adler (2015-09-03 05:12)

To Ernst Hanhart
Dear Colleague, 2 March 1957
Best thanks for your explanatory remarks.
With your permission, I will annotate your MS in places
I should be glad if you would treat my analysis of Freud's character with discretion.
I have communicated my views to you sub secreta medici.
Since my views spring from my intimate acquaintance with him, and in addition point to a rather delicate background for persons in the know, I would prefer discretion to prevail in this matter.
People always assume anyway that my critical set-to with Freud was the result of a merely personal animosity on my part.
Instead of using Freud and Adler as paradigms, you could use Nietzsche and Wagner as representing the Dionysian and Apollinian, or else Jordan's descriptions.
It should also be noted that my characterization of Adler and Freud as, respectively, introverted and extraverted does not refer to them personally but only to their outward demeanour.
The question of the real personal type still remains open.

I had little personal knowledge of Adler and so can say little about his real personality.
Freud, on the other hand, I knew very well.
He was unquestionably a neurotic.
As I said before, I know from experience that in neurotic cases it is often extraordinarily difficult to make out the real type, because at first and for a long time afterwards you don't know what you are observing, the conscious or the unconscious behaviour.
Freud's thinking had a definitely extraverted character, i.e., pleasure and unpleasure in the object.
Adler's character, on the contrary, was introverted in so far as he gave paramount importance to the power of the ego.
As for your main question, the problem of small but decisive chance events, perhaps I may point out that I have not only never denied them but have even made them the subject of a special investigation (my essay in The Interpretation of Nature and the Psyche which I brought out with W. Pauli).
Adler, by the way, once coined the nickname "iunctim"4 for these Phenomena.
As meaningful coincidences, they present us with the quite special problem of "acausal arrangements" -if I may risk such a paradox.
As regards the tendency to self-punishment it would, for the sake of scientific accuracy, have to be divested of its ego character.
Since it operates unconsciously, no participation by the ego can be proved.
It is rather that objective processes not chosen by the ego take place, which in view of the one-sidedness of the ego have a complementary or compensatory character.
The term "self-punishment" is therefore misleading on closer examination since it imputes to the ego an intention which in reality does not exist.
What does in fact exist seems to be an objective psychic background, the unconscious, which predates consciousness and exists independently alongside it.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 349-350

Carl Jung: Matter and psyche are thus the terminal points of a polarity. (2015-09-03 05:24)

To Werner Nowacki
Dear Professor Nowacki, 22 March 1957
I don't want to miss the chance of thanking you for your thoughtfulness in sending me your interesting article.
Your ideas go back, in modern form, to the familiar world of Plato's Timaeus, which was a sacrosanct authority for medieval science-and rightly so!
Our modern attempts at a unitary view, to which your article makes very important contributions, do indeed lead to the question of the cosmic demiurge and the psychic aspect of whole numbers.
From the fact that matter has a mainly quantitative aspect and at the same time a qualitative one, even though this appears to be secondary, you draw the weighty conclusion, which I heartily applaud, that, besides its obviously qualitative nature, the psyche has an as yet hidden quantitative aspect.
Matter and psyche are thus the terminal points of a polarity.
The still largely unexplored area between them forms the terra incognita of future research.
Here tremendous problems open out which you have approached from the physical side.
It seems to me that for the time being I have exhausted my psychological ammunition.
I have got stuck, on the one hand, in the a causality (or "synchronicity") of certain phenomena of unconscious provenance and, on the other hand, in the qualitative statements of numbers, for here I set foot on territories where

I cannot advance without the help and understanding of the other disciplines.
In this respect your article is uncommonly valuable and stimulating.
I am particularly grateful to you for your appreciation of the transcendent ”arranger.”
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 351-352.

Psychoanalysis is in essence a cure through love. Sigmund Freud - letter to Carl Jung (1906)
One day, in retrospect, the years of struggle will strike you as the most beautiful. Sigmund Freud Letter to Carl Jung, September 19, 1907.
So long as the self is unconscious, it corresponds to Freud’s superego and is a source of perpetual moral conflict. If, however, it is withdrawn from projection and is no longer identical with public opinion, then one is truly one's own yea and nay. The self then functions as a union of opposites and thus constitutes the most immediate experience of the Divine that it is psychologically possible to imagine. Carl Jung; "Transformation Symbolism in the Mass"; CW 11, par. 396.

Freud and Josef Breuer recognized that neurotic symptoms... are in fact symbolically meaningful. They are one way in which the unconscious mind expresses itself. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols; Page 9.

I . . . have the feeling that this is a time full of marvels, and, if the auguries do not deceive us, it may very well be that . . . we are on the threshold of something really sensational, which I scarcely know how to describe except with the Gnostic concept of [Sophia], an Alexandrian term particularly suited to the reincarnation of ancient wisdom in the shape of ΨA. Carl Jung, The Freud/Jung Letters, Page 439

After the disgraceful defection of Adler, a gifted thinker but a malicious paranoiac, I am now in trouble with our friend, Jung, who apparently has not outgrown his own neurosis." Sigmund Freud to James Jackson Putnam, 20Aug1912.

It is a pity that you did not meet or speak to Jung. You could have told him from me that he is at perfect liberty to develop views divergent from mine, and that I ask him to do so without a bad conscience. Sigmund Freud to Oskar Pfister, April 7, 1912.

I hope you agree with the Nuremberg decisions and will stand loyally by our Jung. I want him to acquire an authority that will later qualify him for leadership of the whole movement. Sigmund Freud to Oskar Pfister, Feb. 5, 1910.

If Jung were to obtain the professorship without the administrative duties, it would of course be a huge gain for us, but I think that he himself regards it as improbable. Sigmund Freud to Oskar Pfister, Feb 5, 1912.

Freud found out that neurotics must be regarded as individuals. You were really annoyed by my letter, weren't you? I was too, and now I am cured of my megalomania and am wondering why the devil the unconscious had to make you, of all people, the victim of this madness. Emma Jung to S. Freud, Freud/Jung Letters Pages 455-7.

Gross and Spielrein are bitter experiences. To none of my patients have I extended so much friendship and from none have I reaped so much sorrow. Jung to Freud, Freud/Jung Letters pp. 228-229.

Adler's letter is stupid chatter and can safely be ignored. We aren't children here. If Adler ever says anything sensible or worth listening to I shall take note of it, even though I don't think much of him as a person. Carl Jung,Freud/Jung Letters, Page 532.

You will be accused of mysticism, but the reputation you won with the Dementia will hold up for quite some time against that. Sigmund Freud to Carl Jung Letter May 1911

And then I wrote a book about psychology of dementia praecox, as it was called then— now it is schizophrenia—and I sent the book to Freud, writing to him about my association experiments and how they confirmed his theory thus far. That is how my friendship with Freud began. Carl Jung, Conversations Evans, Page 11.

Freud was a successful man; he was on top, and so he was interested only in pleasure and the pleasure principle, and Adler was interested in the power drive. Carl Jung, Conversations [Evans], Page 12.

I think, you see, that when Freud says that one of the first interests, and the foremost interest is to feed, he doesn't need such a peculiar kind of terminology like "oral zone." Of course, they put it into the mouth— Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 13.

That is the first archetype [Oedipus] Freud discovered; the first and the only one. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 13.

No one is hampered by one's self. And that's what he [Freud] never could admit to me. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 14.

Now, Freud refers very little to Pierre Janet, but I studied with him while in Paris and he very much helped form my ideas. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 15.

Now you see, the subjective factor, which is very characteristic, was understood by Freud as a sort of pathological auto-egotism. Now this is a mistake. The psyche has two conditions, two important conditions. The one is environmental influence and the other is the given fact of the psyche as it is born. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22.

And there I was, in between the two. I could see the justification of Freud's view, and also could see the same for Adler; and I knew that there were plenty of other ways in which things could be envisaged. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22.

What Freud calls 'the dream façade' is the dream's obscurity, and this is really only a projection of our own lack of understanding. We say that the dream has a false front only because we fail to see into it. Carl Jung, CW 16, Par. 319.

Freud's letters in my possession are not particularly important. . Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 40-41.

My personal recollections on the other hand are a chapter for itself. They have very much to do with Freud's psychology, but since there is no witness except myself I prefer to refrain from unsubstantiated tales about the dead. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 40-41.

Now, this derogatory way of judging Amenophis IV got my goat and I expressed myself pretty strongly. That was the immediate cause of Freud's accident. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 133.

Nobody ever asks me how things really were; one only gives a one-sided and twisted representation of my relation to him [Freud]. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 133.

Did it never occur to you that in my analysis we talked very little of "resistance," while in the Freudian analysis it is the term that most frequently occurs? Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 148-150.

I shall always remember the time when Freud disturbed the peaceful slumber of the medical and philosophical faculties by his shocking discoveries, which are now taken into serious consideration. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 184-187.

The healing function is not necessarily a characteristic of individuation; it is a thing in itself. It also doesn't work exclusively through transference; that is a Freudian prejudice. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 227-229

The way in which the scientific world reacts reminds me strongly of those remote times when I stood up all alone for Freud against a world blindfolded by prejudice, and ever since I have been the subject of calumny, irritation, and contempt, although I have harvested a good deal of appreciation paradoxically enough just from universities (among them Oxford and Harvard). Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 230-232.

No matter whether it was a Jewish or a Christian or any other belief, he [Freud] was unable to admit anything beyond the horizon of his scientific materialism. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 295-296.

Naturally he [Freud] assumed that my more positive ideas about religion and its importance for our psychological life were nothing but an outcrop of my unrealized resistances against my clergyman father, whereas in reality my problem and my personal prejudice were never centred in my father but most emphatically in my mother. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 295-296.

I have always wondered how it comes that just the theologians are often so particularly fond of the Freudian theory, as one could hardly find anything more hostile to their alleged beliefs. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 295-296.

The problem nearest to Freud's heart was unquestionably the psychology of the unconscious, but none of his immediate followers has done anything about it.I happen to be the only one of his heirs that has carried out some further research along the lines he intuitively foresaw. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 306-310.

Carl Jung: I have finished painting the ceiling in Bollingen... (2015-09-03 16:32)

Dear Aniela, 18 March 1957
Here too the weather has been indescribably beautiful, and this has most effectively prevented me from writing letters, but instead I have finished painting the ceiling in Bollingen and done more work on my inscription and-last but not least-rebricked the rivulets to prevent seepage and cooked some good meals and found and bought an excellent wine.
All this has rested me and cured me of various vexations.

7326

But I won’t speak of that.
Thank heavens I have no idea how great is the disorder or order of my correspondence.
My memory has the most astonishing holes in it, so that I often catch myself forgetting not only what I have done but more especially what I have not done.
It is therefore with a sigh of relief that I see from your letter that, what with the good weather and the necessary rest, you are gradually recuperating and hold out prospects of returning to Kusnacht.
I have just got back from the timelessness of Bollingen and found your letter and the very interesting article by Nowacki!
It is of great importance.
But I must give it a thorough thinking over.
I must stop now and say goodbye till Friday (hopefully).
Go on enjoying the spring in Tessin: here the weather has changed.
With cordial greetings and best wishes,
Yours, C.G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 351.

Carl Jung and I Ching's "Youthful Folly." (2015-09-03 16:45)

To Michael Fordham
Dear Fordham, 3 January 1957
I am glad to hear that your two book are ready and going to press.
My congratulations!
I will write the introduction as soon as possible.
For the time being I am nailed down to a revision of a paper I wrote in spring 1956, which should appear this month but as soon as I have finished this work I shall try to fulfil my promise.
In view of my old age I don't trust my powers any more.
I easily get tired and my creative ability, I am afraid, has become very faint indeed.
By the way, I have just read your paper on " Synchronicity."
I must say, this is the most intelligent thing that has been said hitherto about this remote subject.
I have enjoyed it very much.
The experience you had with the I Ching, calling you to order when trying to tempt it a second time also happened to me in 1920 when I first experimented with it.

It also gave me a wholesome shock and at the same time it opened wholly new vistas to me.
I well understand that you prefer to emphasize the archetypal implication in synchronicity.
This aspect is certainly most important from the psychological angle, but I must say that I am equally interested, at times even more so, in the metaphysical aspect of the phenomena, and in the question: how does it come that even inanimate objects are capable of behaving as if they were acquainted with my thoughts?
This is, as the above formulation shows, a thoroughly paranoid speculation which one had better not ventilate in public, but I cannot deny my fervent interest in this aspect of the problem.
My best wishes for the New Year,
Cordially yours,
C.G. Jung
Note: As he recounts in New Developments (p.49) , F. had consulted the I Ching for clarification on a certain problem, and after getting an answer immediately consulted it again.
He obtained Hexagram 4, ”Youthful Folly,” where The Judgment says:
” the young fool seeks me.
At the first oracle I inform him .
If he asks two or three times, it is importunity.
If he importunes, I give him no information.” Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 343-344

Carl Jung: This is the truth stated by astrology... (2015-09-04 05:54)

To H . J . Barrett
Dear Mr. Barrett, 26 March 1957
Thank you for your interesting letter.
The probability of a very impressive parallelism between individuals is considerable inasmuch as the possibility of divergence and variations is rather limited owing to the fact that we belong to the species Homo sapiens and the subdivision of white man.
Beside the enormous similarity or likeness the differences are so slight that to a complete outsider they almost disappear.
So when you look at a crowd of Chinamen for the first time, they all look the same and you can only make out individual characteristics by a careful scrutiny.
If anybody is born on the same day and possibly in the same hour, he is like a grape of the same vineyard ripening at the same time.
All the grapes of the same site produce about the same wine.

7330

This is the truth stated by astrology and experience since time immemorial.
Thus it is very probable that you have quite a lot of things in common with Mr. Percy who was born on the same day as you.
If you go critically through your list you will find a number of points in common not only with Mr. Percy but with any amount of other individuals (f.i. the Buddhist trend).
There are many contributions to the New Republic, there are also many students at Harvard, and so on.
I regard such a case not at all as a Doppelganger, which would be to me an unaccountable phenomenon, but rather as a peculiar synchronistic fact, if anything at all.
I am not dense enough to overlook the curious fact of the considerable number of coincidences and particularly not the remarkable fact of swallowing a stone, but I hold that there are quite a number of individuals born at the same time with an equally remarkable biographical likeness to you.
I remember having read a case of a man born in the vicinity of Buckingham Palace on the same day and at the same hour as Edward VII.
His life was the most ridiculous and close-fitting caricature of the King's life.
I don't want to offend you but I should like to call your attention to astrology, which has dealt with such phenomena for about 5000 years.
I don't know whether you know the little book I have published with the physicist Prof. W. Pauli : Nature and the Psyche, where I make an attempt to cope with phenomena of this kind.
I am afraid it is not quite simple apparently, but there are some physicists that seem to understand it.
In a Swiss journal recently an article appeared about an interesting case of coincidence: a man celebrating his birth-day; his wife had given him a new pipe as a present.
He took a walk, sitting down on a bench under a tree.
Another elderly man came along and sat down beside him, smoking the same kind of pipe. Mr. A. drew Mr. B .'s attention to the fact that they both smoked the same pipe, whereupon Mr. B. told him that he was celebrating his birthday on the same date and had received the pipe from his wife.
He introduced himself and it turned out that both had the same Christian name Fritz . - The rest is darkness!
Mr. A. had the feeling that possibly a superior intelligence was at work.
It would be most desirable to know a lot more about the psychology of the two fellows and what the possible reason was for this coincidence.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 353-355.

Carl Jung: Here epistemology sets us absolute limits. (2015-09-04 06:10)

To Robert Dietrich
Dear Herr Dietrich, 27 March 1957
If a person knows something, or thinks he does, he can and will speak of his knowledge regardless of whether the object of his knowledge is thereby devalued or not.
Compensatory contents rise up from the unconscious precisely because they possess healing power and are necessary to consciousness.
There is no reason why whole numbers possess certain meanings or qualities, and no reason why elephants or men should exist.
These arrangements are simply there as given facts, like the crystalline systems or the discontinuities of physics, even as the whole of creation is a ”just-so story.”
Your remark that ”the real discoveries in the field of knowledge become ever fewer” astounds me.
I have the impression that there are more and more of them, and that they become more and more difficult.
Where the determinants of all being come from is an unanswerable question before which I come to a halt, without pretending to know better or a feeling of sacred awe.
Here epistemology sets us absolute limits.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 355.

Carl Jung: ... you have been misled by newspaper reports. (2015-09-04 06:26)

To Walter Cimbal
Dear Colleague, 28 March 1957
I was very glad to hear that you are following the developments in psychiatry with so much interest and attention.
I see, however, that you have been misled by newspaper reports.
I am sorry to tell you, first, that these reports were not put out into the world by me but by a person or persons unknown, and second, that they are not only mistaken but in part downright untrue.
The facts underlying these rumours are as follows:
Prof. Manfred Bleuler asked me to set down my experiences in the field of schizophrenia in a paper for the coming International Congress for Psychiatry in Zurich.
This I have done-so far as is possible in the framework of a paper-while confining myself to essentials.
In it I have mentioned only in passing the extent to which the toxin hypothesis appears probable to me.
The possibility of a toxin was already in the air 50 years ago, as you have set forth at such length.
I well remember the cobra poison reaction, which was often discussed at Bleuler's clinic.
I cannot claim to be an authority on this matter.
The question of the toxin itself interested me far less than its connection with the psychogenesis of schizophrenia.
You will find all this discussed in the multigraph I am sending you by the same post.
I cannot regret that a false rumour has led you to write your long and painstaking letter, for it has brought back many old memories of that seminal time and also of our enjoyable collaboration.
So many things were going well until the political madness severed all continuity of meaning.
With cordial thanks and kindest regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 355-357.

Carl Jung: I could never have published what I have discovered without a highly differentiated language (2015-09-04 06:40)

To Traugott Egloff
Dear Herr Egloff, 23 April 1957
Many thanks for your kind letters, which I greatly enjoyed.
It would indeed be desirable if my ideas could be expressed in a simple form everyone could understand.
In conversation with certain individuals I can do this easily enough, but then it depends on the individual.
Since my language is a reflection of my thinking and feeling, I cannot, when faced with a wider public, express myself otherwise than as I am, and I am anything but uncomplicated.
I could never have published what I have discovered without a highly differentiated language, which I had to polish endlessly for this purpose,so much so that finally, when I try to express my ideas, I can no longer speak in any other way-unless, as I have said, it be to a particular individual with whom I can enter into an empathetic relationship.

I can do this only up to a point with the general public, and then I always relapse into my generalizing and very differentiated conceptual terminology, which is the medium through which and into which I can translate my thoughts.
Anyone who wanted to do what you propose would himself have to be on the same level and in the same medium as the general public.
You yourself are in an excellent position to do this, for from the letters you have written me I have never got the impression that language causes you any difficulties.
I know of course that your language would not have come out as it did if it had not caused you the greatest trouble beforehand.
But as Horace says in his Ars Poetica, the best poem is the one that does not make you aware of the difficulties of its composition, and this is also true of such writings of yours as I have seen, namely your letters.
You express yourself very clearly and simply, and I believe you when you say that you are able to reach the ear and understanding of your fellow.
I know very well that I could never do so myself, and that the man needed for this can only be found among people like you.
Why then, I ask you, don't you take up your pen and try to bring to the many what I can communicate in complicated language only to the few?
For me and people like me my language is simple and intelligible, but they are all people who have the same necessarily complicated assumptions.
With such readers I can afford the luxury of describing things with bare hints and allusions which for other readers are bound to remain obscure for the simple reason that they have never heard of them.
I see this even with my medical colleagues, for whom philosophical, historical, religious, etc. allusions are so much Chinese.
It needs in fact people like you, who are inwardly gripped by the idea and have experienced its value, to find the form of expression which everyone can understand.
I would therefore suggest in all seriousness that you make at least a tentative attempt to describe the essential features of my psychology.
I am convinced that it would lie well within your powers.
With best regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 357-358.

Carl Jung: For a real understanding of the Jewish component in Freud's outlook.. (2015-09-04 11:04)

To Edith Schroder
Dear Colleague, April [?] 1957

7336

In reply to your letter of the 26th inst. I must remark that many important things could be said about the theme you propose, ”The Significance of Freud’s Jewish Descent for the Origin, Content, and Acceptance of Psychoanalysis,” if only the problem could be treated on a very high level.
Racial theories and the like would be a most unsatisfactory foundation, quite apart from the futility of such speculations.
For a real understanding of the Jewish component in Freud’s outlook a thorough knowledge would be needed of the specifically Jewish assumptions in regard to history, culture and religion.
Since Freud calls for an extremely serious assessment on all these levels, one would have to take a deep plunge into the history of the Jewish mind.
This would carry us beyond Jewish orthodoxy into the subterranean workings of Hasidism (e.g., the sects of Sabbatai Zwi), and then into the intricacies of the Kabbalah, which still remains unexplored psychologically.
The Mediterranean man, to whom the Jews also belong, is not exclusively characterized and moulded by Christianity and the Kabbalah, but still carries within him a living heritage of paganism which could not be stamped out by the Christian Reformation.
I had the privilege of knowing Freud personally and have realized that one must take all these facts into consideration in order to gain a real understanding of psychoanalysis in its Freudian form.
I do not know how far you are acquainted with these various sources, but I can assure you that I myself could carry out such a task only in collaboration with a Jewish scholar since unfortunately I have no knowledge of Hebrew.
In view of the blood-bespattered shadow that hangs over the so-called ”Aryan understanding of the Jew,” any assessment that fell below the level of these-as it may seem to you-high-falutin conditions would be nothing but a regrettable misunderstanding, especially on German soil.
Despite the blatant misjudgment I have suffered at Freud’s hands, I cannot fail to recognize, even in the teeth of my resentment, his significance as a cultural critic and psychological pioneer.
A true assessment of Freud’s achievement would take us far afield, into dark areas of the mind which concern not only the Jew but European man in general, and which I have sought to illuminate in my writings.
Without Freud’s ”psychoanalysis” I wouldn’t have had a clue.
I am sorry that I have nothing but difficulties to offer you, but superficiality would be worse than silence.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 358-359.

Carl Jung and Nature answering itself (2015-09-05 04:04)

Anonymous
Dear Sir, 20 May 1957

7338

Please excuse the delay in my answer.
I am a very busy man.
Many thanks for so kindly sending me your drawings.
This is one of those imaginative series which I always scrutinize in cases where an unconscious fantasy has been granted free expression.
While you were, consciously, starting out on architectural problems you constellated a reaction of the unconscious, which is characteristic in such a case.
Whenever and wherever you turn to some extent towards the unconscious it seldom or never answers as one would expect; it is rather as if nature itself were answering.
Its answer does not necessarily refer to that piece of reality you have in mind, it is reacting to the whole man and brings into sight what the whole man should know, in other words, it compensates for an insight lacking in consciousness.
Since it has to do with the whole man, its answer also concerns the whole; something fundamentally important is being imparted.
But this kind of answer is so personal and so often hits the weakest spot that no one, except during analytic treatment, can presume the right to comment upon it.
So it is on these grounds that I do not go further into the nature of the reaction.
I must leave the further exposition of the unconscious statement to your own best judgment and meditation.
With the highest regards and best thanks,
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 360-361.

Carl Jung: Nothing isolates us more than power and prestige. (2015-09-05 04:15)

To Mrs. C.
Dear Mrs . C., 21 May 1957
Sorry to hear that you are having such a difficult time with X.
Apparently you are not yet in such a state of simplicity that you could accept the helpful intentions of those knowing less than you.
The more you know, the more you will grow out of the number of children needing parents.
It seems to me as if there were something fateful about the so-called misunderstandings with X. (. . .)
Such things usually occur when the time has come to give up the infantile way and to learn about the adult way, when one creates those people and those relationships one really needs.
I am sure you have some amongst your friends to whom you might be able to talk and to explain yourself.
One has no authority when one cannot risk it, and you will be quite astonished how very helpful people we might consider inferior can be.
Even the Pope has a Father Confessor who is a simple priest and by no means one of the Cardinals.
If you are all alone then it is because you isolate yourself; if you are humble enough you are never alone.
Nothing isolates us more than power and prestige.
Try to come down and be humble and you are never alone!
I could easily contrive to be marvellously alone, because I never had the chance to get a superior Father Confessor.
Not being able to get the necessary help from above, I need to fetch it from below, and what I was able to do you might do also.
Try not to be tempted too much to draw help from me; it is so very much more useful to get it indirectly from yourself, from those who got it originally from yourself.
My best wishes,
Yours,

Carl Jung: As at least 90% of our sins are those of omission, I am no exception! (2015-09-05 15:28)

To M. Esther Harding

Dear Dr. Harding, 30 May 1957

Your letter is a reminder that I have not written to you as I should have done about your book and thanked you expressis verbis for your very kind dedication. As at least 90 % of our sins are those of omission, I am no exception!

As a matter of fact I began reading your book in December, but too much work of all sorts overwhelmed me and set me adrift.

The deeper reason was that I was then occupied with the English translation of a paper of mine, "Present and Future." It has since appeared this spring in German (Gegenwart und Zukunft) and I am going to send you a copy.

The English version is not yet out.

Part of it should appear in Atlantic Monthly and the whole afterwards.

The trouble is that I have to read so many manuscripts or offprints of my pupils that I simply can't keep up any more. The burden of 82 years is rather noticeable.

After I had accomplished the task of writing the paper that was expected from me, I indulged in the vain hope that having fed the world of men by my paper, my own unconscious would spare me as it has done for about three years, spare me, namely, new ideas.

As a matter of fact nothing new from within has happened, as it has done so often before, but somebody lifted the iron lid that has been clamped down over my head from without and in came the question: what do you think about the Flying Saucers?

This is the thing that carried me away as soon as I had finished the other work, and again the already frightening pile of unanswered letters and unread manuscripts grew higher.

Ever since I have been busy on this new errand.

It is most adventurous and has carried me further than I ever expected.

But please keep this news under the hat.

Otherwise people get funny ideas about my senility.

I don't know why these unpopular things have this uncanny attraction for me.

Now I hope, having come to an end with this new task, I shall be able to devote my available time to your book again. For the time being there is nothing in sight that could lure me away from a quiet and friendly occupation.

I have heard quite a little about a certain awakening in theological circles in U.S.A.

One could not say the same thing about theologians over here.

They much prefer existentialist philosophy because it is very much up to date and entirely harmless. (. . .)

Our Christianity with its Summum Bonum conception has entirely Forgotten that one of the main aspects of real religion is fear.

No charity in all the world can take away the divine terror.

It could not even do away with the H-Bomb!

Please don't mind my negligence.

The prerogative of old age is to be tolerated.

Please give my best regards to Eleanor Bertine, as well as my thanks for her book.

My best wishes to you both,

Cordially yours,

C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 362-363.

Carl Jung: Psychology as I understand it is a science and not an opinion. (2015-09-05 15:41)

To Bernhard Lang
Dear Colleague, 14 June 1957
Your letter astounded me.
What Buber knows of me is based exclusively on my writings, or rather only on bits of them.
He has completely misunderstood them because he has no conception of psychology.
Psychology as I understand it is a science and not an opinion.
So when we are dealing with a metaphysical statement we are dealing with the fact that the psyche makes such a statement.
A descriptive science will therefore say: it is of the nature of the psyche to make such statements, no matter what their content may be.
It doesn't matter whether it states a truth or not.
Thus when I remain within the confines of my science, the established truth consists in my proof that such statements are made, but not that they are true or untrue in the philosophical or religious sense.
Over and above this, psychology can establish in what relation these statements stand to the life of the psyche, and it will distinguish whether they are merely individual opinions or collectively valid ideas.
Taking the God-concept as an example, this is demonstrably grounded on archetypal premises corresponding essentially to the instincts.
They are given and inherited structures, the instinctual bases of psychic behaviour as well as of thinking.
These structures possess a natural numinosity (i.e., emotional value) and consequently a certain degree of autonomy.
When, for instance, a so-called epiphany occurs, it is the projected appearance of this psychic structure, that is, of an image based on the archetypal structure.
Owing to the autonomy and numinosity of the structure it appears as if it had a life of its own, different from my life.
We then say: God has appeared.
What can be established is not that God has appeared, but on closer examination the structure of an archetype.
Thus far can science go.

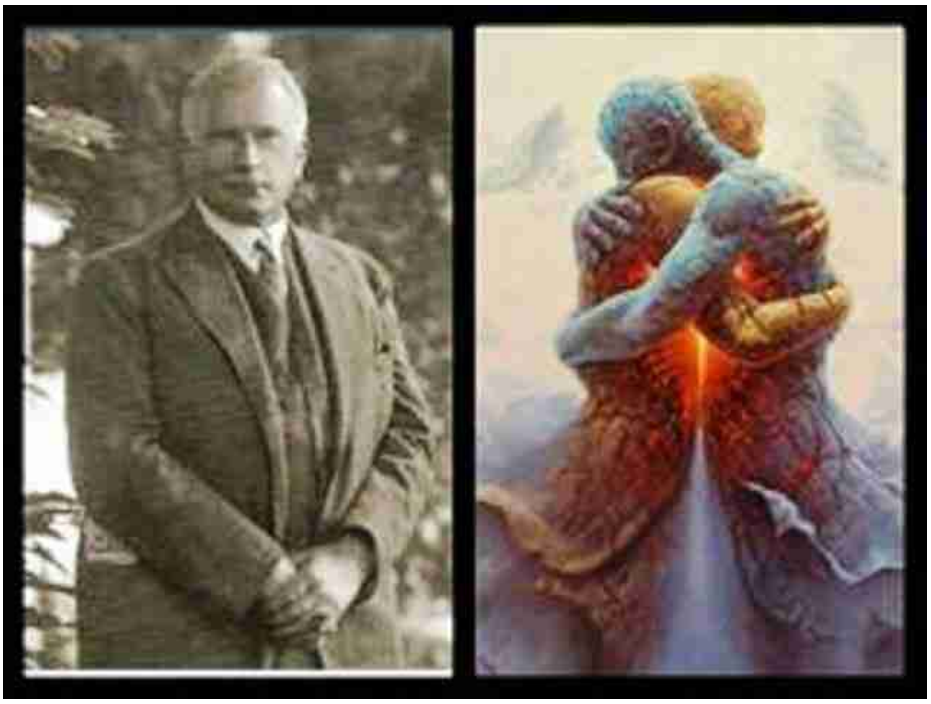
7342

It cannot cross this threshold and assert that it was God himself.
Only belief can do that.
I do not appeal to this belief.
In view of my human imperfection, I am satisfied with the statement that I have seen a divine image, but I am unable to make out whether it is God himself.
Outside this image and its dynamic qualities, it is utterly impossible for me to make out anything about the nature of God.
So when I say (in ”The Undiscovered Self”) that the social and political independence of the individual is guaranteed only by the feeling that he is ”anchored in God,” I mean that he divines the relationship through this intense inner experience.
No one in his right senses would assert that the idea he has formed of a thing through his experience of it is identical with the nature of that thing.
If he did, he would immediately collide with the fact that there are thousands of other opinions about this same thing, some of them like his own, others totally different, because no man can agree with another to the point where their respective ideas would be identical.
Buber completely overlooks the existence of the individual psyche.
He also thinks he can override all other ideas of God by assuming that his God-image is the God-image.
I am far from denying the possibility that our psychic structure projects an image of something.
But there is no reason whatever to suppose that the psychic image reflects the nature of its unknowable background either completely or in part or not at all; we cannot jump over our own heads since all we can ever assert is our own conception.
No one can get round the self-limitation of human judgment; it is part of our human limitation in general.
The psyche has its own intrinsic reality which cannot be got rid of by believing in something.
What I assert is not belief but knowledge, not of God himself but of the facts of the psyche.
Apparently they are totally unknown to Buber, even though Plato has expounded this whole problem with unsurpassable clarity in his parable of the cave.
To return to the psychic structure which projects the images or makes ”metaphysical statements,” we do not know what it itself rests on.
We only know that something is there.
From this we may postulate that beyond the psychic structure there is something-a substrate, an ousia-about which it is impossible in principle to make any assertion because it would only be yet another conception.
Hoping I have expressed myself with sufficient clarity,
I remain,
with collegial regards,
Yours sincerely, c. G. J u N c Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 370-372.

Carl Jung: I am sorry you knocked at my door in vain... (2015-09-06 05:18)

To Ralf Winkler
Dear Herr Winkler, 5 June 1957
I am sorry you knocked at my door in vain, and that my secretary may not have made the true state of affairs sufficiently clear to you.
I understand your need for people very well, also your wish to make contact with people who really have something to say.
At the age of nearly 82 perhaps I may say without being presumptuous that in my long life I have seen so many people, and also helped them, that my present seclusion seems to me well-earned and ought not to be grudged.
The obligation to be there for others must now be taken over by others who have more strength.
This has nothing to do with ”lack of humanity” on my part, rather I appeal to your humanity to understand my situation.
Perhaps you also will one day understand that it is only the man who is really capable of being alone, and without bitterness, who attracts other people.
Then he doesn’t need to seek them anymore, they come all by themselves, among them the very ones whom he himself needs.
With my best wishes,
Yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 366-367

Carl Jung: Since no human need is without a reason, (2015-09-06 07:50)



To Bernhard Lang
Dear Colleague, 8 June 1957
Sincerest thanks for your kind letter.
An author is always delighted to learn that his voice has been heard.
He could wish for nothing better.
I should be grateful if you would tell me again what you think Martin Buber was trying to prove to me.
I could not decipher the word.
Buber is of the erroneous opinion that a metaphysical assertion is either true or untrue, and he doesn't understand that as a psychologist and psychiatrist I regard what is said and believed primarily as a statement which, though a fact in itself, cannot be asserted to be true or untrue.
For instance, I can examine the statement that Christ rose up at Easter in the body from the psychological standpoint without at the same time maintaining it is true or untrue.
One can say of all metaphysical statements that their factuality Consists in the fact of their being asserted, but none of them can be proved to be true or untrue.
It does not come within the scope of a science like psychology to ascertain the truth or untruth of metaphysical assertions.
It is a thoroughly outmoded standpoint, and has been so ever since the time of Immanuel Kant, to think that it lies within the power of man to assert a metaphysical truth.
This is and remains the prerogative of belief.
Belief in turn is a psychological fact, though it is far from being a proof.
The most it tells us is that such a belief exists, and that the belief meets a psychological need.
Since no human need is without a reason, we may also expect That the need for metaphysical assertions is based on a corresponding reason, even if we are not conscious of this reason.

Nothing is thereby asserted, nothing denied, and this is just what Buber doesn't understand; for he is a theologian who naively thinks that what he believes must necessarily be so.
We shall never be able to understand other philosophies or religions if everyone thinks his conviction is the only right one.
Thus Buber blandly assumes that everyone thinks the same as he does when he says "God."
But in reality Buber means Yahweh, the orthodox Christian means the Trinity, the Mohammedan Allah, the Buddhist Buddha, the Taoist Tao, and so on.
Everyone insists on his standpoint and imagines he possesses the sole truth; therefore I counsel modesty, or rather the willingness to suppose that God can express himself in different languages.
But it is the theologians of every variety who buttonhole God and Prescribe to him what he has to be like in their estimation.
This leads to no understanding between men, of which we stand in such dire need today.
My apparent scepticism is only a recognition of the epistemological barrier, of which Buber doesn't seem to possess the ghost of an idea.
When I say that God is first and foremost our conception, this is twisted into God is "nothing but our conception."
In reality there is a background of existence which we can intuit at most but cannot transpose into the sphere of our knowledge.
In any case a serious science should not succumb to this arrogance.
The relation with transcendence is certainly a necessity for us, but gives us no power over it.
With collegial regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 367-368

Carl Jung: It is really a question of recognizing God's will and wanting to do it. (2015-09-06 15:10)

To Roswitha N.
Dear Miss Roswitha, 17 August 1957

Many thanks for the kind letter you sent me on my birthday.
I have heard with great sorrow of your father's illness and can only hope that it will soon take a turn for the better.
I was very interested to hear of the success of your lecture.
My little book on Job is naturally meant for older people, and especially for those who have some knowledge of my psychology.
They must also have pondered a good deal on religious questions in order to understand it properly.
Because there are very few people who meet these conditions, my book has been widely misunderstood.
They should also know something about the unconscious.
As an introduction to this I would recommend another little book of mine, "On the Psychology of the Unconscious," and, on the religious problem,"Psychology and Religion." Symbolik des Geistes and Von den Wurzeln des Bewusstseins probe rather more deeply into these matters.
You are undoubtedly right to tackle the problem of society first.
There you learn the ways of other people and are forced to find a common basis of understanding.
The question of the young architect as to what it might mean for God if he demands Christianity of us: first one must understand what Christianity means.
This is obviously the psychology of the Christian and that is a complicated phenomenon which cannot be taken for granted.
And what something might mean for God we cannot know at all, for we are not God.
One must always remember that God is a mystery, and everything we say about it is said and believed by human beings.
We make images and concepts, and when I speak of God I always mean the image man has made of him.
But no one knows what he is like, or he would be a god himself.
Looking at it in one way, however, we do indeed partake of divinity, as Christ himself pointed out when he said: "Ye are gods."
You will find a lot about this in Answer to Job.
Your question why it is more difficult for us to do good than to do evil is not quite rightly put, because doing good is as a rule easier than doing evil.
True, it is not always easy to do good, but the consequences of doing good are so much more pleasant than those of doing evil that if only for practical reasons one eventually learns to do good and eschew evil.
Of course evil thwarts our good intentions and, to our sorrow, cannot always be avoided.
The task is then to understand why this is so and how it can be endured.
In the end good and evil are human judgments, and what is good for one man is evil for another.
But good and evil are not thereby abolished; this conflict is always going on everywhere and is bound up with the will of God.
It is really a question of recognizing God's will and wanting to do it.
The other question of what meaning the Bible ascribes to society is of great importance, for the solidarity and communal life of mankind go to the roots of existence.
But the question is complicated by the fact that the individual should also be able to maintain his independence, and this is possible only if society is accorded a relative value.
Otherwise it swamps and eventually destroys the individual, and then there is no longer any society either.
In other words: a genuine society must be composed of independent individuals, who can be social beings only up to a certain point.
They alone can fulfil the divine will implanted in each of us.
The paths leading to a common truth are many.
Therefore each of us has first to stand by his own truth, which is then gradually reduced to a common truth by mutual discussion.
All this requires psychological understanding and empathy with the other's point of view.
A common task for every group in quest of a common truth.
With best greetings,
Yours sincerely,

Carl Jung on “Sin.” (2015-09-07 06:20)

To the Rev . H. L. Philp
Dear Mr. Philp, 11 June 1957
The question about ”sin” etc. you ask me seems to me difficult to answer, as I don’t understand where you see a difficulty in my way of using these ”theological” terms.
I beg your pardon, but speaking of ”sin” or ”evil” can be quite colloquial, at least this is the case with myself.
I talk of them in a quite ordinary way so that everybody can understand what I mean.
The same is the case when I mention the ”Fall.”
It is Adam’s story as we read it in Genesis.
Thus I mean by ”sin” an offence against our moral code, by ”evil” the black fiend ever working in man’s nature, and by ”Fall” the disobedience against, and the deviation of the primordial Man from, God’s command.
These terms designate simple and recognizable psychological situations forever repeating themselves in all human lives.
The ”Fall” f.i. covers the regular experience that I find myself deviating from the prescribed way from the very start.
I am tempted and even possessed by evil forces (like St. Paul) time and again, and sin is nolens volens mingled with my daily bread.
You find such statements moreover everywhere in all imaginable forms.
It is f.i. bad and even evil to step on the chief’s shadow or over a sleeping man.
It is sinful to scrape a skin with an iron knife instead of a flint.

Whoever has bothered himself about the eternal problem of whence evil has invented the story of a primordial awkwardness.
A modern man with a yellow streak will explain himself f.i. by the fact that his grandfather's brother suffered from epilepsy and the alienist will nod his head: "I told you so."
The terms "sin" and "evil" are under no conditions "meaningless"and they are in no way in need of any particular framework, as little as the terms "good" and "bad," since they are merely emphatic expressions of an emotional, negative reaction in their colloquial or everyday use.
However, where strong affects are in question we can expect unmistakable traces of a religious framework, i.e., a "theological" system of reference.
But anybody, provided he is mad enough, can say "God damn it" without being conscious of a particular framework beyond colloquial habits.
When I speak of "original sin" I mean what the doctrine of the Church calls the peccatum originale, Adam's sin, i.e., man's Disobedience clearly visible in everybody's life, his inevitable Deviation from the state of grace, where there has been no sin yet.
The latter begins with the dawn of consciousness, which implies "conscience," i .e., moral awareness and discrimination.
Cases in which this function is absent are pathological (moral insanity).
Of course I am unable, as anybody is, to define what evil is in itself.
There is nothing which at times cannot be called evil.
It is a subjective qualification supported by a more or less general consent.
Deviation from the numen seems to be universally understood as being the worst and the most original sin.
This is, as I hope, an elucidation of my approach to the matter in question.
The early part of October would suit me perfectly.
Sincerely yours,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 369-370

Carl Jung on Rainer Maria Rilke (2015-09-07 06:35)

To Ellen Gregori
Dear Fraulein Gregori, 3 August 1957
I have read with much interest your essay on ”Rilke’s Psychological Knowledge in the Light of Jungian Theory.”
Your argument and the beautiful quotations make it very clear that Rilke drew from the same deep springs as I did-the collective unconscious.
He as a poet or visionary, I as a psychologist and empiricist.
I hope you will allow me-as a token of my esteem for your work-to add a few remarks that came into my head as I was reading.
I cannot escape the feeling that for all his high poetic gifts and intuition Rilke was never quite a contemporary.
Of course poets are timeless phenomena, and the lack of modernity in Rilke is a badge of genuine poetry-craft.
Often he reminds me of a medieval man: half troubadour, half monk.
His language and the form he gave his images have something transparent about them, like the windows of Gothic cathedrals.
But he doesn’t have what it takes to make a man complete: body, weight, shadow. His high ethos, his capacity for abnegation, and perhaps also his physical frailty naturally led him towards a goal of completeness, but not of perfection.
Perfection, it seems to me, would have broken him.
I wish somebody could be found who would set the inner and outer data of this life in order and interpret it with the necessary psychological understanding.
It would certainly be well worth doing.
Again with best thanks for your essay and kind regards,
Yours sincerely,
C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 381-382.

Carl Jung: I am dependent on God's verdict, not he on mine. (2015-09-08 05:35)

To Aniela Jaffe
Dear Aniela, Bollingen, 9 July 1957
Unlike me, you torment yourself with the ethical problem.
I am tormented by it.
It is a problem that cannot be caught in any formula, twist and turn it as I may; for what we are dealing with here is the living will of God.
Since it is always stronger than mine, I find it always confronting me; I do not hurl myself upon it, it hurls itself upon me; I put up no resistance yet am compelled to fight against it, for God's power is greater than my will.
I can only be its servant, but a servant with knowledge who can make infinitesimal corrections for better or worse.
I am dependent on God's verdict, not he on mine.
Therefore I cannot reason about ethics.
I feel it unethical because it is a presumption.
God presents me with facts I have to get along with.
If he doesn't reject them, I cannot.
I can only modify them the tiniest bit.
Good holidays!

Carl Jung: Perfectly normal people can have visions in certain moments. (2015-09-08 13:11)

To J . G. Thompson
Dear Mr. Thompson, 23 July 1957

If somebody has a vision it doesn't mean that he is necessarily insane.
Perfectly normal people can have visions in certain moments.
St. Paul was definitely not insane nor was his vision extraordinary.
I know quite a number of cases of visions of Christ or auditions of a voice from within.
Being a highly religious man St. Paul was almost expected to have such experiences, as he had also received his Gospel through immediate revelation.
As experience shows, the figure one sees is not necessarily identical with the person one identifies with it, just as the picture by an artist is not identical with the original; but it is obvious that the vision of Christ was a most important religious experience to St. Paul.
Being a rather old man I am not capable of answering any letters.
If you should have some more questions, important to your spiritual welfare, my secretary will be answering them.
Faithfully yours, C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 380.
